THE NEW YEAR.

ENGLAND is an old country, and, like all old countries, has many difficulties to encounter which are partly the legacy of generations that took a wrong course, and are partly due to the subtlety and complication of the ties by which the different members of an ancient community are necessarily bound to each other, and by which that community is bound to other communities more or less like it. When, therefore, we begin to think of the political prospects which a new year offers to Englishmen, we are inevitably led to think more of the dangers that lie before us than of the hopes which we may justly conceive. A prudent man who has passed into the period of human life corresponding by an imperfect analogy to what we may imagine to be the period of English existence, cannot possibly enter on a new year with very buoyant spirits. He knows that life has not very much to offer him, and that a year just beginning must bring with it many disappointments and many sorrows. He feels that he ought to be very thankful if he starts on the year with fair health and without pecuniary pressure, and his first thought will be to consider, not how he can gain new good things, so much as how by patience and foresight and good temper he can avert evils. No imminent political dangers seem to be pressing on England just now. We are on good terms with all foreign nations; we have a trade which is not only very great, but very sound; we have the staple food of the country in abundance and at a moderate price; and we have a strong Ministry, backed by a very large majority in the House of Commons. If, therefore, it came natural to us at the beginning of the year to take a sanguine view of things, we could find more cause, perhaps, for being sanguine now than we could find usually at the beginning of a year. But the long experience of English history, and the sadness in contemplating human life which Christianity has taught to the modern world, forbid us to find much pleasure, at the beginning of any new period, in cheering ourselves and making merry, and shouting out what a fine, prosperous, noble people we are. There are times for such things as, for example, when Yankees or Frenchmen seem not to understand our superiority to them; but the beginning of a new year is not one of them. And if there are no imminent dangers now pressing on England, there are dangers of a somewhat remote kind which must fill us with anxiety when we think of them. Patience and foresight and good-humour will, we trust, carry us safely through them; but at least we may be sure that they will afford us ample room for exercising these qualities to as full a degree as we are capable of exercising them. Many special causes of apprehension might probably be found to exist at present if we went below the surface of English politics, but it will be enough to mention two or three of the most striking. There are, for example, the present position of the House of Lords, and the present position of Prussia in Europe. If we begin to reflect on any one of these subjects, we soon find that it is full of thorny and complicated questions, and that it is only by resolutely showing patience, foresight, and good-humour that England can hope to arrive at a proper solution of them. What are we to do with our good poor, with our half-good poor, with our bad poor, with our criminal poor? Those are not questions of a remote and speculative interest. Londoners find that they are crushed by rates, the burden of which increases every month, and the payment of which only seems to intensify the misery it is destined to relieve, and they walk about in a city where life and property are not much [illegible] in Mexico or Bologna. How is it possible for any [illegible] for the sort of people who believe, on the faith [illegible] and Christmas extra-numbers, that they are [illegible] be jolly at this season, to exalt much or whoop over the new year, when we know that starvation is going on all around us, and that if we try to diminish the evil by giving money we only aggravate it, and that almost the only people who can walk about London with perfect comfort and impunity are the fortunate beings who have been twice convicted of a felonious offence?

It would be ridiculous to say that the Peers make us anything like as anxious as the paupers; but if we are to survey the prospects that lie before the country, we cannot contemplate the present position of the House of Lords without anxiety. The exact state of things in which we now find ourselves is, that a new House of Commons has been returned, a large majority of which is pledged to carry a measure of which two-thirds of the House of Lords last year signified their utter disapproval. Let us assume that a Bill will pass the Commons this Session for disestablishing and disendowing the Irish Church; for, if not, the House of Commons will prove itself incompetent to carry out the declared wishes of the nation. When this measure reaches the House of Lords, the Peers must either reject it, or agree to it, or try to alter it. The consequences of their rejecting it would be so serious that it is painful even to imagine them. The English Constitution as it exists at present offers no means by which the Government of the country can be carried on in face of a hostile majority in the House of Commons. In order that administration should flow on at all in its daily course, it must be conducted on the understanding that a Ministry supported by a majority in the House of Commons shall have its way. If the opinion of the country remains as it is now, and the majority in the Commons coheres, the Peers must give way. But then the precise mode in which, according to precedent, they will be made to give way would be by the PRIME MINISTER obtaining leave to create a hundred Peers just before the Bill which he wishes to carry came on for the second reading. An institution which was put into the false position of being the subject of a coup d'état of this sort cannot long stand modern criticism. If the House of Lords rejects the Irish Church Bill, and is made by sheer compulsion to yield, its days are numbered. This is so obvious that, however fiercely Tory Peers may talk at present, the probability is that, when it comes to the point, the Peers will pass the second reading, and try to recover some of the ground they have lost by amendments. But this would prove a very unsatisfactory course. So long as these amendments only extend to improving the language of the Bill, which, after being hacked about in the Commons, is sure to be very imperfect, or are only intended to provide for cases that have been omitted, or to do more ample justice to individuals or corporate bodies, the Peers will be perfectly safe. They will be only acting as a Court for the Revision of Parliamentary drafts, a function discharged in France by the Council of State; and no one would think of objecting so far. But it is exceedingly probable that they will not be content with so humble a function. They will perhaps try to alter the Bill so as to make it somewhat more in harmony with their way of thinking, and they may try to enforce their views exactly up to the point which they think the Ministry will stand, rather than not get the Bill through in this Session. In other words, they will spoil the Bill as much as they can, and make its supporters pay as heavily as possible for having it carried. This is exactly what happens every day in the private legislation of Parliament, and is one of its most aggravating features. A Bill is proposed which purports to be conceived in the public interests, and to be shaped so as to promote those interests as much as possible. The Committee to which the Bill is referred is inclined to think that the Bill as it stands would be conducive to the public interests, when in steps some powerful individual or company, who chooses to think the Bill likely to hurt him or it in some way, and worries and threatens and argues and spends unlimited money, until clauses are stuck into the Bill which certainly protect private interests, but spoil the value of the Bill to the public. The House of Lords, by taking the same course in dealing with the Irish Church Bill, might perhaps be for the moment successful, although with a determined Ministry that is doubtful; but it would only be successful at the hazard of provoking the nation to consider whether an Upper House that distinguished itself by lessening the value of important Bills to the public was exactly the Upper House that was wanted.

Why the present position of Prussia in Europe should cause anxiety, when we pass from considering the domestic to considering the foreign policy of England, is obvious. We do not in the least grudge Prussia her gains, or object to her future advancement. On the contrary, nothing could be more advantageous to England, or more conducive to the peace of Europe, and to the best interests, as we in England think, even of France herself, than that Prussia should consolidate Germany into one great country, able to protect itself against its big neighbours both on the right hand and on the left. The difficulty we have to face is the difficulty of avoiding everything like thwarting the establishment of a state of things so desirable, without giving up other objects of very great importance to us. The quarrel between Greece and Turkey appears likely for the moment to die out. The Great Powers have been so very liberal with their dust that the little bees cannot go on stinging each other. But what is the real reason openly assigned for this quiet ending of a troublesome matter? It is that Russia is not ready for war. Her railway system linking her Northern and Southern ports is not complete; she has still too much of the old-fashioned description of guns and cannon; her fleet is frozen up and cannot get to sea. The integrity of the Ottoman Empire is therefore to be respected, and the obligations of international law are to be enforced. Russia might have been ready now, and some day she certainly will be ready. We should be in a most embarrassing position if a war intended to settle the Eastern Question were to break out now. It might come to our having to choose between going to war with Prussia and seeing Russia quietly occupying Constantinople. There are people who would see no difficulty in the matter. Some would think nothing of fighting Prussia on the ground that Prussian officials hurt the feelings of bold freely-behaved Britons on their travels. Others would say that it was nothing to us who held Constantinople, and that the Porte and its city and everything else belonging to it might "perish," like Savoy, rather than that England should spend a farthing or lose a man in its defence. But views like these are only the first promptings of carelessness or ignorance. Discussion would soon show that England would be going against all her most solid interests in lessening the power of Prussia, and that, on the other hand, to let Russia get Constantinople without any opposition on our part would be to back out of our engagements, to take a most humiliating position in Europe, and probably to ensure our having some day to fight for our highway to the East when we in our turn should have no allies. The best chance of our being able to avoid so embarrassing a choice is that, before the Eastern Question ends in war, Prussia may have so far consolidated herself as to be permitted, if she pleases, to remain neutral. But it is difficult to suppose that this time has come yet, and therefore, when a new year breaks with a Turkish fleet actually blockading a Greek port, we cannot escape the nervous feeling that a state of things might arise when, after France had forced Austria to join her against Russia, and Russia had forced Prussia to join her against France, we should be called on to leave off playing the part of a frugal bystander and choose which side we would take.

LEGISLATION IN INDIA.

THE account of his conversations with SCINDIA, the well-known chief of Gwalior, which has been published by the British Resident in Gwalior, Colonel DALY, is full of interest. SCINDIA is not only a faithful ally to our Government, but he piques himself on being the very type and model of perfect fidelity to us. "What we wish, that [illegible] be done," is the sentiment ever on his lips, and he acts up to his word. His obedience has lately been put to a severe test. He had collected a small army at his capital, recruiting it, not from his own [illegible], but from a distance. He organized it upon the [illegible] model; he spent his whole time in bringing it to [illegible] state of efficiency; he found the greatest delight in [illegible] English officers how admirably it could manœuvre, and what a perfect state of discipline it was in. But unfortunately he was a little too successful. Sir JOHN LAWRENCE paid the brilliant native force the high compliment of coming to inspect it. He saw it at its best, was shown all its capabilities, and admired it so much that he came to the conclusion that it had better not go on any more. In the kindest possible manner he intimated to SCINDIA that of his beloved troops he had better turn a portion into policemen, send a portion into remote parts of his territory, and only keep a limited portion at his capital. SCINDIA was deeply grieved, and for some time hoped that the consideration of his long and great services might prevail, and that he might be allowed to retain what was so great a source of pleasure and amusement to him. But the VICEROY was inexorable, and SCINDIA obeyed. This obedience must have cost him a painful struggle, but he had always professed readiness to make any sacrifice the British Government might demand of him, and he kept his word. At the same time this chief, so obedient and so faithful, is a man of so much ability and originality that the English who have to do with him retain the highest respect for him. He never descends to be the puppet of the British Government, even when he obeys its most unwelcome orders. Such a man, therefore, when he discusses the relations of the British Government with the natives of India, and tells us frankly what he and others think of our rule, deserves to have his words well weighed. His general criticisms are, however, so completely in harmony with all that we have already learnt on the subject, that we may pass over them without much remark. That we keep the peace all over India with surprising success, and that to the best of our judgment we administer strict justice, but that the natives do not like us and our rule even while owning that they profit by it, is the general result at which SCINDIA, and almost all other competent observers, have arrived. There are, however, two minor points in SCINDIA's criticisms which seem to deserve attention. One of these is the continuity of character which he sees to be imparted to the English Government by the completeness of the written records which it preserves in every department of administration. A native Government is as capricious as it is temporary. It does not know, and does not care, what has been done by its predecessors, or what will be done by its successors. The utility of maintaining a thorough system of recording all acts, decisions, and reasons for acting and deciding, in writings sufficiently elaborate and copious to be intelligible at some distance of time, and the beneficial influence of this system on the Government itself and on the character of its servants, deserve the most serious consideration at the present moment. The Civil servants of India are now selected by competition—a plan which has many advantages, but which has this great disadvantage, that those selected have not, previously to their arrival in India, any common ties of birth, education, or religion. If this great defect is found in practice to be surmounted, and if the Civil Service of the future works as well and in as high a spirit as the Civil Service of the past, we are inclined to think that one chief cause of this happy result will lie in the minuteness and elaborateness of the system of recording everything connected with Government, which compels each member of the Service to associate himself with the traditions and pass under the influence of the Service in the past. It is possible, of course, that there may be too much writing in India, as everywhere else; but to underrate the immense importance of writing on Indian administration is one of the first impulses of English ignorance. When, just before he left England, Lord MAYO assured a deputation that he thought the time for writing had passed and the time for acting had come, he gave, we fear, a sign, not of energy, but of that perfect blankness of mind as to everything Indian which is no reproach to him as an Irish peer, but which may be reckoned as a drawback and offset to his qualifications for Governor-General, whatever they may be.

The other part of SCINDIA's conversation which seems worth especial attention is that in which he expressed a very decided opinion that we are too prolific of legislation. We never give the natives any rest. Every month introduces a change in their habits, in their tenure of property, in their social usages, for which they are quite unprepared, and which they detest. Probably these changes are very good and wise in themselves, but this incessant activity in making the natives better by passing Act after Act to improve them is, as SCINDIA thinks, not only painful to them, but not prudent. We worry and harass them rather than do them good. This is an opinion which very many of the best and most sensible of the members of the English Civil Service in India fully share. That legislation is too rapid and too incessant is the observation they have deduced from their own experience. The natives, they say, never know how they stand, or what they may do or may not do. Even if they think they begin to understand a little of what they are expected to do or not to do on any point, out comes a new law from the Viceregal Council and upsets their feeble notions. Perhaps Mr. DISRAELI might have been influenced by this sort of argument, and have thought to himself, that after so active a Governor-General as Sir JOHN LAWRENCE, a Governor-General who was not likely to do much would be a wholesome change. What truth there is in the general statement, that of late Indian legislation has been too rapid and too incessant, few persons in England can pretend to say; but on such a matter the opinion of a man like SCINDIA ought to go for something. But, on the other hand, it is only when we examine into the facts of each case that we see how irresistibly the Indian Government is driven to legislate, and how the enactment of one law necessarily leads to another. A Bill that has lately been introduced for legalizing certain marriages among the natives who are not Christians, supplies a good example. An Act was lately passed regulating and legalizing the marriages of native converts to Christianity; and it would be obviously absurd, and in the last degree unjust, that a Christian Government should not accord to persons who choose to adopt the Christian religion the power to contract a valid marriage in a cheap, easy, and indisputable way. But it appeared on further inquiry that although the natives might each be married according to their several religions, and native Christians might also be married in a prescribed form, yet there was a class of persons for whom no provision was made. There were natives who did not like the peculiar religious ceremonies necessary to marriage according to the creed to which they belonged, or who were not considered by those charged with conducting these ceremonies sufficiently thoroughgoing in their religious beliefs. The consequence was that the more fanatical members of each sect, if a majority, could practically decide that the less fanatical minority should not marry, nor be able to transmit property to their children. That natives placed in this embarrassing position ought to be protected by the Legislature seems perfectly clear. How is it possible for a Government like ours to say to a man that unless he goes to the full extent into idolatrous ceremonies, he shall not be permitted by the law to have a legitimate child? It is quite obvious that the Government of India was right, directly it discovered this omitted case, to provide for it, and to establish a mode of relief for persons thus accidentally and unnecessarily excluded from some of the most important civil rights. Mr. MAINE, to whose department the introduction of the necessary Act belonged, assigned his reasons for doing so in a speech which, while full of suggestive remarks as to the difference between Eastern and Western nations in many of their conceptions with regard to the marriage tie, was quite unanswerable in showing that the Bill was really needed. And yet the Bill had excited much opposition among the natives, and had alarmed the leaders of many of the chief sects; and it is exactly the sort of Bill which affords a sort of ground for saying that the social and religious customs of the natives are always being tampered with, and that one Native Marriage Bill is no sooner passed than another is introduced.

Sometimes, however, Indian legislation, if not really too rapid and incessant, appears to be so, not only to native, but to English, critics in India. That these English critics have any solid ground for their criticism, or are at all competent to judge, is far more than any one acquainted with what may be termed the outsiders of Anglo-Indian life would undertake to say. But they sometimes bring facts before us which make us not so much incline to their views, as wish to know the true account of the matter. As an instance, we may give a description of the passing of what is known as the Punjab Tenancy Bill last October. The account was written by a person who professed to have been an eye-witness, and was inserted in the Times of India. Its author made no secret of his hostility to the Bill, which he considered far too favourable to the tenants. The tenure of land presents many questions of great difficulty in India as elsewhere, and the respective rights of landlord and tenant are very hard to determine justly, as there is no positive standard of law or custom by which to go. Probably, with the very best intentions we should always do some injustice in whatever way we undertook to deal with them. But, as is very natural, the practical decision is approached with different sets of prepossessions according as those who have to make the decision incline, either from theories as to ancient Hindoo right, or from social sympathies, or from considerations of utility, to the landlord or the tenant side of the question. The passing of the Punjab Tenancy Bill was reckoned a great triumph for the friends of the tenants, and a great rebuff for the friends of the landlords. The Viceregal Council appears to have been nearly equally divided, and the conflicting views were very fully and warmly advocated by different members. Finally it appeared that the supporters of the Bill had a majority, although a very narrow one, and the Bill was passed there and then, as the eye-witness puts it, although the minority pressed for further time, and that more opportunity for general discussion might be given—a request which the VICEROY himself at first appears to have considered reasonable, although he ultimately gave way. Now it would be ridiculous for any one in England to say that all this was not quite right. That Sir JOHN LAWRENCE not only sanctioned the Bill, but permitted it to pass in this very speedy and summary way, is enough to show that there were very weighty reasons for the course taken. But it is not going very far to say, that this plan of semi-public legislation, when, in the presence of a casual auditor, two or three Englishmen support one set of opinions, and then two or three other Englishmen support the opposite, and then the majority straightway embodies its views in the shape of a Bill affecting the fortunes of hundreds of thousands of natives, is at least calculated to impress the natives with an unfavourable opinion of our Indian legislation. It may be necessary, and on the authority of Sir JOHN LAWRENCE we are quite content to believe that it was in this case necessary, to legislate so rapidly in a very difficult and debatable matter, when so strong a difference of opinion existed in the Council itself. But it is an unfortunate necessity, and we can scarcely wonder that natives should grumble a little at this sort of law-making, and should even complain far more than they would do if everything were done in secret and without any discussion at all, and if new laws were promulgated as the edicts of a despot.

THE EASTERN CONFERENCE.

THE idea of a Conference is too closely connected with useless negotiations and delusive guarantees to allow of more than a momentary sense of relief at the news that another has been summoned. In this instance there is, strictly speaking, nothing for a Conference to do. No one believes that Turkey and Greece will fight unless one or other of them counts on external support; and if they do belie expectation, and go to war on their own account, the interests of the Great Powers in the East are so conflicting that all the diplomacy in the world would hardly reduce them to harmony. On the first assumption, a Conference is unnecessary; on the second, it is useless. There is, however, a third supposition which does leave some little room for the introduction of this favourite expedient. It may be that there have been influences at work during the autumn, the authors of which did not calculate quite accurately the moment at which the train would be fired. It is very pleasant to feel that you have an Eastern Question ready to be let off whenever it suits your purpose. But if the explosion comes too soon it may give rise to considerable inconvenience, and then you may be as anxious to stifle it as you were a short time before to prepare for it. When great Powers find themselves in this predicament, they naturally cast about them for some means of drawing back with dignity. If there are other great Powers who wish peace to be maintained, the conspirators evince a sudden desire to listen to good advice. As this is usually to be had for the asking, and sometimes even without it, they can soon make out a sufficient case for telling their too precipitate instruments that they have been prematurely active. That something of this sort has been going on during the last month, seems rather probable than not. There is an abundance of reasons why this or that Power should have something to say on the Eastern Question, but there are also several reasons why none of them should wish to say it at this moment. France, for example, might conceivably have views the execution of which would wholly depend upon her success in detaching Russia from Prussia; or Russia, again, might have reckoned upon a revolution in the Eastern policy of France, and then found that she had a little anticipated the change. On either hypothesis both Governments would have been disconcerted by the unforeseen action of Turkey, and would now be anxious to gain time for the broth to simmer. And on either hypothesis Prussia would be quite willing to co-operate with them for this end, since to Prussia it is above all things important that a European war should come, if come it must, on German and not on Eastern ground. There is no difficulty, therefore, in devising reasons why the Conference should have been convoked, or in understanding that they are not to be looked for either at Athens or at Constantinople.

It is impossible not to feel some pity for the Porte when it finds itself reduced once more to the position from which it had tried to emancipate itself. No man likes to be treated as a baby, but it is much harder in the case of an old man than of a young one. The latter has, or thinks he has, his future before him. The former sees second childhood awaiting him, and knows that it is only by a struggle that he will be allowed even to die his own master. But there are situations which seem too much even for self-will, and the position of Turkey in relation to the Great Powers is emphatically one of them. She has been dandled upon their knees so long that they cannot let her go even if they would. She would rather perhaps be suffered to run alone, no matter at what cost to herself. One can conceive a Sultan of Turkey thinking that life after all is a little wearisome, and that there might be more real pleasure in raising once more the old war-cry of his creed, and dying in harness, if die he must. But the surroundings of his throne would be too much for a determination which at bottom might only have been half-formed, and the successor of the Prophet would find himself once more sending envoys to Paris or London, and submitting to have his conduct regulated to suit the convenience of others. The one thing that seems certain about the Conference is that Turkey can only lose by it. Supposing that Greece is forced to yield all the five points in the ultimatum—it is more likely that she will have to concede three—she will have made the sacrifice at the bidding, not of Turkey, but of the European Powers. The result of this will be to confirm the very sentiment which it is so important for the Porte to put an end to. The Greeks will feel more strongly than ever that, no matter what they may do, Turkey will not be suffered to take the law into her own hands. They will console themselves with the assurance that they have only plucked the pear before it was ripe. They will look forward as eagerly as ever to the time when a more decided policy on the part of Russia or France will usher in that catastrophe at Constantinople for which the preparations are still incomplete. All that Turkey hoped to win by the sudden assumption of an independent attitude is hopelessly lost by the turn that affairs have taken. If she gets all she asks, she gets it as the result of a European arrangement, not by the exhibition of her own determination. If she puts up with less than she asks, she is reduced from holding the sword at the throat of Greece to being a party to an amicable compromise. If, feeling this, she insists upon standing by her ultimatum, she will have offended all her allies, and gained the character of an obstinate disturber of the peace of Europe.

At the same time, it may be admitted that, taking all the circumstances into account, a Conference affords the only way of escape from the immediate difficulty. To say that it settles nothing, that it leaves the roots of the mischief untouched, that it is simply an expedient invented to serve a momentary purpose, is true enough. But, after all, this is only another way of saying that the Eastern Question is at present incapable of a conclusive solution. The Conference does not introduce any new complications. At the worst it is only tantamount to a confession that the case is one which admits of nothing but palliatives. Still this admission is, as far as it goes, a reason rather for applying the palliatives than for withholding them. We know that a European war would be a great disaster; and though, if the Eastern Question could be finally and satisfactorily got rid of, it might be worth even that sacrifice, this is no reason for incurring so great a risk while we are ignorant what the event would be. In keeping the peace for the time we gain a certain good, and if this result can be achieved through the medium of a Conference, the fact that nothing else is achieved by it constitutes no argument against the experiment. That, supposing the Conference to be resolved on, it was prudent for England to concur with Turkey in confining the proceedings within the narrowest possible limits, does not need proof. A European discussion of the whole Eastern Question must necessarily turn to the account of those Powers who have a distinct policy in connexion with it. England has objects which she is compelled to insist upon, but she cannot as yet be said to have any precise policy through which to insist on them. Consequently, England more than any other Power would have suffered by the discussion being taken now. It is to be hoped that, by the time the Eastern Question does come on for final hearing, our ideas on the subject will have cleared.

The consideration of the points of the Turkish ultimatum to which the labours of the Conference are to be restricted will raise some curious points of international law. The whole subject of the complicity of one Government in the aid rendered by its subjects to persons in insurrection against another Government is extremely thorny. Scarcely a rebellion has taken place in Europe without English volunteers having borne a part in it, and it would be difficult to show that the British Government made any effective demonstration against either the raising or the departure of the English Garibaldian legion. Blockade-running was a regular branch of British trade during the American civil war, and we doubt whether any official declaration against it went further than the statement of the Greek Minister for Foreign Affairs, that any steamer captured while running the blockade, resisting the Ottoman cruisers, or carrying contraband of war, may be seized as lawful prize. The Italian plenipotentiary may be conscious of a slight inconsistency in the Power which profited by a certain invasion of Sicily, and was not wholly innocent of a more recent invasion of the Papal States, sitting in judgment on Greece for practising the same arts on a smaller scale. It is unfortunate that the United States are not likely to be represented, as a glimpse might then have been afforded of an unfamiliar aspect of the American mind on the belligerent status of insurgents. The Conference will not be without its value if it teaches the useful, but hardly learnt, lesson, that those who play fast and loose with international law must be prepared to find it less efficacious than they might desire when it suits them to appeal to its provisions.

THE CHIEF OF THE POLICE.

WHILE journalists and the public were discussing the merits and failings of the Metropolitan Police, its Chief was dying. Since then a brief but painful disease has consummated that which forty years of unrelieved public work had failed to effect, and the illness and death of Sir R. MAYNE are simultaneously made known to the world. That Sir R. MAYNE was, either jointly or singly, at the head of the Metropolitan Force for the first forty years of its establishment, is his best eulogy. No man could have moulded and formed an institution of this kind, so novel, so foreign to general ideas and prejudices, without possessing administrative qualities of a very high character. That the Force is far from perfect is less his fault than the fault of those who planned and circumscribed it. That it can hardly be called popular is perhaps its highest praise. A popular constabulary, like a popular Proctor, would owe its general acceptance to a neglect of its most obvious duties. Whatever its unpopularity and its imperfections, it is infinitely better than anything that preceded it; and we know that its late chief gave forty years' unremitting attention to its management, shared its hardest labours and its most perilous duties, and was almost destitute of that intelligent assistance which his own position and the public exigencies required; and finally, that he died in harness.

Now that he is gone, it is for the Government to appoint a proper successor. This is not easy. The Head of the Police ought never to be popular, but at the same time he ought not to be ungracious or personally unpopular. He has an irksome office to fill, and unpleasant duties to discharge. His deportment and address should be such as not to aggravate the obnoxiousness of the one or the difficulty of discharging the other. He should be zealous without being fussy; firm without being obstinate or bullying; strict without being a martinet; and, above all things, he should be reticent and reserved. He should be able to win the entire confidence of his men by his calm and unimpassioned deportment, his discrimination of character, and his judicious estimate of services performed. It is superfluous to say that he should be diligent and punctual in his attendance at his office. It is the curse of the organization which he will have to superintend that prevents us from adding that he ought to be as familiar with the beats of his men as any sergeant of police. This is impossible as the department is at present constituted; and this very impossibility suggests the important changes which ought to be made in the organization of the force before it can attain the true standard of a Metropolitan Police.

One chief want which we have already indicated is the want of a body of commissioned officers between the three Commissioners and the sergeants and superintendents who correspond to the non-commissioned officers of the army. There is between the three gentlemen in Scotland Yard and these non-commissioned officers no person to rule and direct the 7,000 constables who guard the metropolis and its suburbs. Now, as many of these sergeants have been deservedly promoted from the ranks, they do not exercise that moral influence over the privates which commissioned officers exercise over soldiers. The men regard them either as comrades or as spies upon themselves; and, too frequently, the inhabitants regard them as accomplices with the men in oppression or in corruption. If they are strict, they are suspected of seeking for bribes; if they are lax, of having received bribes. They are, in most cases, honest and upright officers; but, not being under the constant supervision of recognized superiors, they naturally contract easy and idle habits. They know that they are not liable to the sudden visits of the Commissioners at any moment. They make their own reports of their own and their men's doings. It is evident that in many ways this want of a proper staff affects the Force injuriously. In the first place, all men are the better for being watched and inspected. The greater the area of their duties, the greater the difficulty and need of watching them. In the next place, the authority of a superior officer would support the authority of the subordinate officer; in the third place, the interference of the superior officer would escape the imputations of spite, favouritism, and general unfairness which are so lavishly heaped upon the inferior. We are speaking now of the ordinary duties devolved upon the police by seventy different Acts of Parliament. The honest discharge of these duties implies the exercise of a very obnoxious and unpopular vigilance. It requires both courage and conscientiousness to see that taverns and saloons are closed at the prescribed hours, that beer is not sold at illegal seasons, that nuisances are not suffered to obstruct legitimate traffic, that lodging-houses are not crowded to the prejudice of health and decency, that notorious vagrants are not dodging timid folks, that pawnbrokers have not in possession goods suspected to be stolen, or, at any rate, have complied with the letter of the law in that respect; and fifty other matters which the law has placed within the sphere of police duties. Even in these things the counsel and countenance of a supreme officer are worth much. But there are other and rarer cases in which they are indispensable; in street riots, or in the assemblage of large crowds for objects ostensibly legitimate, but substantially illegal. In none of these matters has the private constable any authority to consult except his superintendent, and the superintendent has no one to whom he may refer except three gentlemen in Scotland Yard, from which he may be five or six miles distant. Is it surprising that, under such circumstances, signs of partiality should be exhibited, or of indiscreet zeal, or of culpable indifference? Is it wonderful that of the 2,000 men who are on daily duty, or of the 4,000 who are on duty at night, a certain proportion should execute their orders improperly, and others should not execute them at all? Or is it strange that that great lâche of which Mr. J. S. Mill speaks with exceptionally just severity in his last self-opinionated letter should have grown up in a body of men which knows little or nothing of superior authority? To be "tipped" for simply doing one's duty is not, indeed, so heinous a fault as being bribed to do something contrary to one's duty or beyond one's duty. But it shows a very imperfect sense of duty when men who are paid by the public to serve the public take money for their services from individual members of the public. The only defence of such misconduct (after that of insufficient supervision) is to be found in the fact that men enter the Police only for a short time, and wish to make the most out of it in that short time.

This leads us to another reform, of which we have spoken before, and which is of great importance. At present the Police is the refuge of destitute workmen who cannot find other employment, and who become constables till they can find work at their normal trades. Then they give the prescribed month's warning, and are at liberty to quit the Force. Now, so long as this facility of admission and discharge exists, so long will the police want that solidity and substance which it is so desirable that it should possess. No man cares for a vocation which he takes up as a pis-aller. The Police force should not be so easy either of admission or relinquishment. And the only way to ensure its reception and retention of good men is to make it worth their while to remain in the Force. Now two means of securing these results present themselves; one is by giving promotion, the other is by giving pensions. But only a limited number of privates can hope, even under the most favourable circumstances, to become inspectors and superintendents. The main body must look only to the alternative of continuing to earn their present pay so long as their health lasts, or of resuming some trade which will pay them better so long as they can work at it. Neither of these conditions is favourable to the introduction of intelligence or the encouragement of zeal. Each of them is darkened by the prospect of destitution in old age and death in the Poorhouse. If good men are to be brought into the constabulary, they must be induced to remain in it by the certainty of a decent provision in their declining years. The same prospect which secures a perpetual succession of good clerks in the public offices, and of good soldiers in the army, will secure a succession of good policemen. In classes of men whose earnings do not allow them to save money, a certain provision for their declining years is a weighty consideration.

We have spoken of two reforms which seem to us as indispensable to the efficiency of the Metropolitan Police. We admit that they both require money, and that the ratepayers—who, in the suburbs at any rate, are already clamouring against the yearly augmentation of their burdens—are not likely to be propitiated in their favour. We are willing to rest their advocacy on the ground of true economy. London will soon have a population of four millions of human beings. It will be fully double the very highest estimate of the population of Rome at the time when Juvenal described it to be dangerous for a decent citizen to walk the streets at night. It will be five times the lowest estimate of that population. It will include the most accomplished of the criminal and the most impracticable of the semi-criminal class; the most ferocious of the "roughs" and the most incurable of casual and vagrants. It will absorb the roguery, the violence, and the mendicancy of the whole kingdom. It will tax the energy and zeal of its 6,000 available policemen to the utmost. The choice lies between having a police incapable, and one that is capable of coping with the exigencies of the situation. Some sort of police, all are agreed, there must be. Whatever there is must be paid for. Shall we pay 8*d.* in the pound for an inefficient, or 1*s.* in the pound for an efficient, police? That is the question. Is it better to save our fourpennies and to go on seeing our streets unguarded, the patrols negligently kept, and our doors besieged by importunate mendicants; or to sacrifice our fourpennies for the certainty of regular and effective protection? Let people bear in mind that on the discipline, cohesion, and mobility of the police depends the security of metropolitan life and property. Let them then ask themselves whether this object is or is not worth paying for.

While we have pointed out two changes in the internal organization of the force which are indispensable to its usefulness, we cannot forget that, without some external changes, these will be comparatively sterile. The police may be drilled into a celerity of action which will succeed in pouncing on every third or fourth criminal in the actual commission of crime. But so long as notorious criminals who have already been twice or thrice convicted are living without any obvious honest calling; so long as they and their associates herd together in comfort and competence, secure against the inquiries of the police; so long, too, as those pawnbrokers and other receivers—reputable ratepayers many of them—who are justly termed the "capitalists of crime," are shielded by the beneficent protection of British law from any impertinent examination by the police, so long will the internal defences of felonry remain untouched and impregnable. The conservatism of lawyers, the rooted prejudices in favour of the least applicable principles of our criminal jurisprudence, the weighty name of Mr. J. S. Mill, and the popular antipathy to surveillance, will long prevent any change in the direction indicated. But people must be just; and when they complain of the inefficiency of the constabulary, they must remember that its action is impeded and its vigour impaired by restrictions which are not known, and would not be tolerated, by any Continental nation.

SPAIN AND THE DUKE OF MONTPENSIER.

If the Duke of Montpensier really wishes to be King of Spain he cannot be complimented on the means he has taken to attain his end. There is only one circumstance that could possibly have made it prudent for him to put himself prominently forward in Spanish affairs. If at the beginning of the Revolution the Provisional Government had adopted him as its candidate, he might perhaps have exercised a candidate's usual privilege, and issued an address to the electors. But when the Provisional Government decided to leave the matter in the hands of the Cortes, the most absolute silence became at once the truest policy. By maintaining a rigid silence upon the subject of his claims, the Duke of Montpensier might certainly have saved his dignity and possibly gained a throne. If he wanted to demonstrate his readiness to accept the part of a simple Spanish citizen, he had nothing to do but to wait. A new Government is never anxious unnecessarily to multiply exiles, and as soon as the constitutional questions now awaiting an answer had been disposed of the DUKE would, without any effort of his own, have regained the rights he professes to value so highly. If, on the other hand, his ambition is greater than he avows, his course was equally simple. There was no fear of his being forgotten when the merits of different claimants came to be compared. His position as the brother-in-law of the late QUEEN marked him out for consideration of some kind. The greater the reserve displayed by him on the subject, the better would be the chance of this consideration taking a favourable turn. A character for reserve and want of ambition does occasionally serve a man in time of revolution. The world gets tired of candidates whose virtues are incessantly proclaimed by themselves or their friends, and when this happens, the crown may be offered by a sudden popular impulse to the one man who has shown no desire to possess it. This, at all events, was the combination for which the Duke of MONTPENSIER should have played. The same cause that secured his name being kept before the public—his relationship to the ex-QUEEN—operated as a primâ facie disqualification. By a judicious abstinence from Spanish politics, the force of this disqualification would have been reduced to a minimum, and at length, amidst the obvious objections to which other claimants are obnoxious, and the many difficulties which would follow upon the proclamation of a Republic, it might have altogether disappeared.

Instead of following the dictates alike of prudence and self-respect, the Duke of MONTPENSIER has acted in a way which will probably prove even more disastrous to his prospects than the most open canvass for the throne. His recent journey to Cordova was ingeniously calculated to aggravate the suspicions of the Spanish people; and if his published defence of the step has lessened the public alarm, it has lessened, in at least an equal degree, the estimation in which he has hitherto been held. The reasons which the Duke gives for "offering his sword to the Provisional Govern-"ment," on the occasion of the insurrection at Cadiz, are singularly lame. His case is that the newspaper accounts of the outbreak led him to a wrong conclusion as to its nature. He regarded it as "the result of a combination between the "several elements opposed to the Revolution." Thereupon he thought it his duty to place himself at the disposal of the Government. The natural way of doing this would have been to write or telegraph to Madrid, but, "in the conviction that "it was more honourable in a soldier to wait for orders at the "immediate centre of danger rather than at a long distance," he said nothing about his intention until he arrived at Cordova. There he learned that the insurrection was over, and that it had not contained any reactionary element. Upon making this discovery a new "duty" presented itself. This was "to "abstain from any interference in the deplorable conflict "between the Liberal parties," and in conformity with this view he immediately returned to Lisbon. Throughout the affair he only exercised the right of a citizen, and fulfilled the duty of a soldier, and he is greatly distressed to find that his natural and straightforward conduct should have given rise to unworthy suspicions. Indeed, there is so much about rights and duties in this eminently unwise letter, that it reads like a compendium of ethics. In spite, however, of its exalted morality, few people will believe that the Duke of MONTPENSIER really thought his services as a soldier so important to the Provisional Government that he was bound in conscience to proffer them. He might have been sure that if the authorities wanted him, they would have taken care to acquaint him with the fact. No matter what "combination of elements" there might have been at Cadiz, his support would neither have added strength to the Government nor called forth enthusiasm in the people. Indeed, as it turned out, the Duke's presence in the field would indirectly have aided the insurgents. The Republican leaders could ask for no more fortunate coincidence than the adhesion of a BOURBON Prince to the cause of the Government against which they were fighting. It would have supplied them with just the evidence they wanted to the existence of a secret design to force a monarchy upon Spain. We have criticized the Duke of MONTPENSIER's conduct on the assumption that it was the product of his unassisted brain. According to another hypothesis, it was the result of an arrangement between him and some members of the Provisional Government. In that case the Duke has been ill-advised as well as foolish. In the friends of a man in his situation discretion is at least as valuable a quality as zeal itself.

The Duke of MONTPENSIER's blunder has naturally been turned to account by the Spanish Republicans. That this party is preparing to make a serious struggle for power may now be taken as certain. It has carried a large majority of the recent municipal elections, and unless the peasantry should show an unexpected devotion to the monarchical principle, there is reason to anticipate that the elections for the Cortes will result in a similar triumph. If this turns out to be the case, the Provisional Government will find it very difficult to oppose a conclusion which they have themselves practically invited. How to do without a king is a lesson quickly learnt, and the Duke of SERRANO and General PRIM have taken care that the Spanish people should have full time to study it. Had a king been proclaimed early in the Revolution, a great many Spaniards who are now ardent Republicans would never have shaken off their traditional impressions. The smoothness with which events have gone on for the last three months has enabled them to see that even in Spain a monarch is not a necessary of life. The fact is not, under present circumstances, one to be much regretted. When the chief of a revolutionary executive is a man of great ability and resolution, it is perhaps better that he should be called King rather than President. In the latter position he will be subject to constant temptations either to extend the tenure or to increase the powers of his office; in the former, he will already hold the throne for life, and he will consequently no longer have before his eyes any necessary object of ambition. If NAPOLEON III. had started as King of the French, he might never have developed into an Emperor. But where there is no ruler forthcoming of any energy of intellect or character, while at the same time Republican principles have made considerable progress in the country, to put an incapable man at the head of affairs is to provoke conspiracies and disturbances of all kinds. A strong and capable Government will always in the long run secure the support of the people in the face of a merely theoretical Opposition. But where this recommendation does not exist, the effect of royalty is merely to supply the Republican propagandists with a constant instance with which to point their arguments.

The want of a candidate of any conspicuous merit is perhaps a reason with the members of the Provisional Government for clinging to monarchical institutions. At least it is unintelligible that they should display any devotion to the abstract idea, unless they see in its triumph an ultimate exaltation of themselves. No class of men like to lose power after they have once possessed it, and the authors of a military revolution are rarely exceptions to this rule. The Duke of SERRANO and General PRIM may differ as to the forms under which the Government shall be carried on, but they will probably be found to agree that the question is one which ought to be determined by the army. If the Republican party has made up its mind to put the army under the effective control of the civil power, the struggle between these two theories can hardly fail to be formidable. Unfortunately, if the Republicans prevail they are almost sure to lay the foundations, even in the moment of victory, of a tremendous reaction. There is no ground for supposing that the majority of the party advocate either communism or atheism; but there are certainly some members of it with whom hostility to property and to religion is an essential article of faith. As the Revolution goes forward, these men are more and more likely to gain the upper hand, and in that case the first work of the Republic will be to unite against itself all who hold property and all who believe in the Church. So long as neither of these classes are attacked, the great mass of the respectable Catholic population will remain practically neutral between the contending parties. But when once the rich and the devout are animated by a common alarm, they will range themselves on the side of order. It was by their support, more even than by that of the army, that the coup d'état was achieved in France, and the same causes may be safely trusted to produce the same result elsewhere. If the Republican party intends to rule Spain, it should set itself first of all to restrain the excesses of individual Republicans. For every house sacked, every church pillaged, every priest mobbed, every image turned into a target, a score of neutral politicians will be converted into confirmed foes. Taken by themselves they may be powerless to retaliate, but they will bide their time, and they have sufficient passive weight to give irresistible force to the man who makes himself their champion. No revolution runs its course unchecked without bringing a "saviour of society" in its train; and if in Spain neither a first nor a second NAPOLEON has yet turned up, we may expect that one or the other will be forthcoming so soon as circumstances are favourable to his advent.

THE NEW OXFORD STATUTE.

THE gravest changes often spring from the most apparently trivial causes. It is easy to sneer at the idea of the whole Christian world being set by the ears by the insertion or omission of an iota, or to laugh at the early martyrs for preferring to be burnt rather than throw a few grains of incense on the sacrificial fire. The natural inference would be, not that the Christians were little better than raving lunatics, but that the iota and the incense, however trifling to all appearance, really involved an important principle. When, therefore, we were lately told by an Oxford Professor that the new lodging-house statute constitutes an era in the history of the University, and is an event of great national as well as great academical importance, it would be irrelevant to reply that a statute enabling some few dozen undergraduates to live in lodgings in the town, instead of being obliged to spend their first three years of residence within college walls, can hardly have such momentous results as he anticipates. At the same time we are inclined to think, for reasons which will appear presently, that Mr. BONAMY PRICE, and those whose opinions in this case he represents, have very largely over-estimated the actual consequences likely to follow from the change. Nor are we at all sure that, if their expectation were realized, it would be an unmixed benefit. That it was desirable, even in the interest of the colleges themselves, to abolish the legal monopoly of the colleges first established by LAUD, there can be little doubt, nor was there much difference of opinion on the subject among Oxford residents, whether of the Liberal or Conservative school. A similar proposal was indeed recently rejected at Cambridge, but more from objections raised to some of its details than on any ground of abstract principle. As yet the only observable effect of the change at Oxford has been to bring some sixteen "unattached" students into residence, and to enable some of the colleges to relegate a few supernumerary freshmen into licensed lodgings till there are rooms vacant for them in college. But the statute has only been in operation during a single term, and any attempt to judge of its working would obviously at present be premature. It is more to the purpose to inquire what are the expectations formed by those most sanguine about the probable improvements to be effected by the measure, and how far such expectations are reasonable.

For some time past complaints have been heard from the most opposite quarters of the growing idleness and luxury of Oxford life, and two distinguished authorities, differing in much else, have prescribed the somewhat homœopathic remedy of abolishing pass examinations, with the avowed object, however, of eventually getting rid of the passmen. We are far from sympathizing with the veteran M.A. who observed, when he voted against Mr. GLADSTONE, that "he always had gone "against those d——d intellectuals, and he always would"; but for alma mater to exclude from her embrace all but the most intellectual of her children does certainly look very like abdicating a very important branch of her functions. To say that no one who cannot or will not rise beyond the standard of the pass schools shall be admitted to Oxford at all, is to exclude from the many civilizing and elevating influences of the place a very large number of those who stand in the greatest need of them. The fact that the University has hitherto been too much of a lounge for the wealthy and indolent classes is no reason for closing its doors against all who have not the stimulus to industry afforded by distinctly intellectual tastes, or by the necessity of making their own way in the world. Such, at least, is not the error of those who anticipate great things from the destruction of the college monopoly. On the contrary, they insist that, if Oxford is to be really national, the bulk of the students must always be passmen, and that the pass degree is the matter to be chiefly thought of. And they look for an immense increase in the number of students, from the diminished expense and altered system of instruction likely to be brought about by the removal of compulsory collegiate residence. This last is, of course, a question which only experience can decide. But there are some very obvious considerations which may fairly be taken into account to moderate over sanguine hopes. In the first place, any such numerical accession as those who are fond of contrasting modern with mediæval Oxford sometimes talk about, would make discipline next to impossible. "Thirty "thousand," it has been pertinently observed, and by an ardent Oxford reformer, "are the legendary object of our "aspirations; five thousand would probably be an anarchy." Eton with its eight or nine hundred boys has almost become too unwieldy for efficient control, and was called some years ago, by Sir J. COLERIDGE, "a boy university." But five thousand undergraduates would be far more unmanageable than a thousand schoolboys, because the same kind of discipline cannot be applied to them. But this is not all. Supposing the ideal multitude of students could be properly managed if they came, is it likely that they will come merely because they can come into lodgings, instead of into college? We suspect not. The grand plea urged for thinking so is the diminished cost of the University curriculum under the new regulations. But why are lodgings less expensive than residence within college walls? Not, surely, because the direct expenses are necessarily smaller. A pamphlet appeared the other day from the pen of an experienced Tutor of St. John's, Cambridge, urging that colleges can provide a cheaper dinner than lodginghouse-keepers, owing to the large number they have to provide for. And it is clear on the face of it that he is right. He accordingly advocates the enlargement of college accommodation to its utmost possible limits, the cutting down of expenses, and the restriction of pecuniary rewards as far as possible to those who need them most. The latter point involves too wide a discussion to be entered upon here, but in his former suggestions Mr. TORRY will find many to agree with him in both Universities. An important step has already been taken in that direction, by the leading college at Cambridge, in the erection of a new block of buildings for about a hundred students from funds bequeathed by the late Master, Dr. WHEWELL. Still it is quite true, as a fact, that residence in college is dear, and that students are able, if they choose, to live more cheaply in lodgings. But that is partly because the scale of college expenditure has to be more or less adapted to the convenience of the wealthier class, and much more because the habits of society in college are expensive. This is the real root of the difficulty. And the lodging-house solution only unties the knot by cutting it. True, it relieves the out-college student from the social expenses of college life, but then it relieves him from the society too. And the question is, whether any large number of men will care to come to the University to undergo this kind of social ostracism. There is such a thing as propter vitam vivendi perdere causas. And there can be no doubt whatever that on at least two-thirds of those who now go to Oxford the indirect education of the place, through the conflict of mind with mind and "keen encounter of their wits," leaves to the full as indelible a mark as the direct education of lectures and examinations. And then, again, there are the opportunities afforded of forming useful or desirable connexions, which are to many parents one main attraction in sending their sons there; and from this advantage the undergraduate in lodgings would ordinarily be excluded.

There is one answer sometimes made to all such objections which has a certain hypothetical force. It is said that a sufficient number of these new students will make their appearance to constitute a separate society by themselves. In other words, there would be a sort of Scotch or German University, composed chiefly of youths of a lower social position, existing side by side with the old collegiate University. It may fairly be questioned whether such a result would be beneficial if it were attained. But we need not discuss that here. The probability of its attainment is, according to all human calculation, infinitesimal. The wealth, the name, the prestige of the colleges, and the traditions of some four centuries—for LAUD did little more than authenticate and stereotype accomplished facts—are against it. Oxford, to use the words of Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH, "is a University of Colleges, and a University of Colleges it will remain." But, moreover, in all calculations about the number of students who will come up into lodgings, based on the supposed analogy of Scotch or German Universities, the most essential factors of the comparison are tacitly ignored. The Scotch Universities answer more to our public schools than to Oxford or Cambridge. Boys of fifteen often come to study there, instead of youths of nineteen or twenty. And of those who come or remain later, a very considerable proportion are preparing for ordination in the Presbyterian Church. In the German Universities there is no fixed term of residence, and there are no regular examinations, either for pass or class. Few of the students, except those who are going into the Church, take a degree at all. And of the rest a large number are destined for Government offices, for which the University curriculum is required. No trustworthy inference can be drawn from the lecture-rooms of Heidelberg or Glasgow as to the number of poor students who would resort to a cheapened Oxford simply for the educational advantages of the University course, unless other and much more fundamental changes than any involved in the exemption from collegiate residence are first introduced. To men who have to make their living, time is money. And a poor man cannot afford to wait till he is twenty-two or twenty-three before beginning to earn his livelihood. This is one main ingredient in the expensiveness of Oxford, and no mere rearrangement of the tariff touches it. If the degree examinations were put back practically to an earlier age, and the education were made professional instead of liberal, as to a great extent it is at the German Universities, the matter would be different. But as long as it is admitted that mental power and general information, not utility, are the proper objects and tests of University education, this cannot be done without revolutionizing the whole system. Special studies, or the more elementary and scientific branches of them, might indeed be domesticated at Oxford in fact, where they already exist in name; but, if the traditional character of the system is to be maintained, they would have to supervene on a general course of education, not to become its substitute.

We have chiefly confined ourselves here to the financial aspects of the question. There are other points, connected with the operation of the new statute in its bearing on the teaching of the University, of very great importance, and we may perhaps take another opportunity of adverting to them. In the meantime, let it be clearly understood that we are very far from meaning to imply any sort of censure on the change already introduced. It was clearly right to abolish an unreasonable restriction, even if very little comes of it practically. Some of those who may claim to speak with authority think, as we observed on a previous occasion, that a great deal will come of it; and, at all events, the experiment of attracting those who are deterred from entering the University by the expense of college life is quite worth making, even if only a few should avail themselves of the opportunity offered. The other experiment of a cheap college, which is also about to be tried, is in some respects more hopeful. If it should turn out to be chiefly sought after by intending candidates for orders who are unable to bear the cost of the present colleges, and if a large percentage of the new lodgers should belong to the same class, an important service will be rendered to the Church in diminishing the percentage of Literates and St. Bees men among her ministers. There is no reason why other new colleges should not be founded, or the existing colleges enlarge their area, whether by additional buildings, as has already been done at Christ Church and Merton, or by a partial adoption of the Cambridge system of allowing their surplus undergraduates to live in licensed lodgings. The affiliation of local colleges is another possible method of making the influence of Oxford more widely felt in the country. That the available limits of University Extension, by any or all of these plans, will fall considerably short of what some of their advocates reckon upon, we see good grounds for believing. Nor are we sure that the University would be in all respects benefited if their hopes were realized; for a University has other functions to discharge besides that of teaching the greatest possible number of young men. But that is no reason for not attempting whatever can be done consistently with the character of the place and the due administration of necessary discipline. Solvitur ambulando.

RITUALISM AND THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

IT is not our intention to comment on the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of MARTIN v. MAKONOCHIE. The decision of a Court of final appeal is beyond the reach of criticism, unless there is any reason to suppose that, if it can be shown to be erroneous, there is a legislative remedy within reach. All the casuistical skill that the Ritualists can muster has been employed for the last ten days in picking holes in Lord CAIRNS's law; and if it is true that Lord WESTBURY and Sir WILLIAM ERLE dissented from the conclusion arrived at by the majority of the Committee, the process may not be difficult. But the triumph will at best be a barren one. Parliament will certainly not supply a statutable interpretation of the rubrics in the Book of Common Prayer more favourable to Mr. MACKONOCHIE than the judicial interpretation of Lord CAIRNS and his colleagues. Be the judgment good or bad, it is the authoritative exposition of the ecclesiastical law on the subject, and to it, with a good or bad grace, the defendant will have to submit. The real interest of the matter lies in the effect which the judgment will have upon the position of the Ritualists in the Church of England. What changes will they be compelled to make in their manner of conducting public worship, and what will probably be the influence of these compulsory changes on those who have to submit to them?

The decision of the Privy Council, taken in connexion with the previous decision of the Dean of the ARCHES, has been regarded by a good many people as absolutely fatal to the continuance of Ritualist services. There can be no doubt that the two judgments do prohibit for the future several of the most significant and striking ceremonies which have been in use at St. Alban's and elsewhere. There can be no "censing of persons or things," no mixing of water with the sacramental wine, no conspicuous elevation of the consecrated elements, no kneeling after the consecration of the bread, no lighting of candles on the altar, except for the purpose of giving light. When the first two of these practices were forbidden by the Dean of the ARCHES, the defeated party comforted themselves with the reflection that they had gained the two points of greatest doctrinal and symbolical moment — the kneeling in the middle of the consecration prayer, and the use of lighted candles in the day time. Now this consolation is taken from them. A partial victory has been converted into a complete defeat. Every one of the ceremonies objected to by the prosecutor has been condemned; and more than this, the Court has made all further resuscitation of pre-Reformation ceremonies impossible by deciding that every such ceremony which is not retained in the present Prayer Book must be held to be abolished by the terms of the Acts of Uniformity. For the future, therefore—so some of our contemporaries argue—the services of the Ritualist churches must be brought down to the usual Protestant level, and, if the Ritualist clergy are consistent, their only choice will be between becoming Roman Catholics and setting up a free church themselves. Which will they do?

We believe, for our own part, that they will do neither, and for this reason. Even when the judgment of the Judicial Committee has been strictly obeyed, the worship at St. Alban's and other churches of the same school will be of a perfectly different type from that which has usually been adopted in England. The judgment of the same Court in the case of WESTERTON v. LIDDELL established the legality of the ornaments which are most disliked by the Evangelical party. The sculptured reredos, the cross behind the altar, the variously coloured altar cloths, the credence table—all those peculiarities of construction and furniture which are popularly supposed to make the chancels of many Anglican churches so indistinguishable from the corresponding portion of a Roman Catholic edifice, will "remain as they have done in times past." Nor is the position of the priest at the altar, one of the points of High Church practice which give most offence to extreme members of the opposite party, at all affected by the present judgment. Further, the principle maintained by the Court, that the only legal ornaments "of the church and of the ministers thereof" are those which were in use "by the authority "of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King EDWARD "the Sixth," and that by this term "ornaments" is meant such articles as are prescribed by the Prayer Book of 1549, brings into new prominence the absolute legality of what are known in ultra-Protestant circles as "mass vestments." If there is one thing more than another which to ordinary eyes differentiates the Roman mass from the Anglican Communion service, it is the dress of the priest; and now the Court of final appeal has again declared that in the intention of the law this is substantially identical in the two cases. It is not improbable, therefore, that one of the first results of the judgment in MARTIN v. MACKONOCHIE will be a more extensive use of vestments. Hitherto many of the clergy have considered the use of lighted candles a sufficient concession to the Ritualist principle, and have consequently not discarded the customary surplice. Now that this compromise has been made impossible, they may be expected shortly to appear in all the glory of chasubles and tunicles. Nor, again, does the judgment touch in any way the position or gestures of the assistant ministers. Consequently the grouping, so to speak, of the clergy in front of the altar will remain the same, and all but the actual celebrant will be at liberty to express their devotion by kneeling how and when they please. The result of all this seems to be that the actual changes in the service will be of far less moment than people think. A man who has found himself unable to attend St. Alban's on Sunday mornings will not have his course made much the easier by the Privy Council. The altar candles will not be lighted, and the officiating priest will not kneel till after he has consecrated both the elements. This is the amount of the alteration, and to speak of it as an utter subversion of Ritualist ceremonial is, to say the least, an immense exaggeration.

But, it is argued, the importance of the judgment lies in the fact that it forbids all expression by gesture of the doctrine of the Real Presence; and since to the clergy concerned this is an essential article of belief, they cannot consistently remain ministers of a church which imposes such a prohibition. When this reasoning comes to be looked into, it appears that this very wide conclusion is held to follow from a somewhat small fact. In the opinion of the Judicial Committee, the Church of England does not prescribe, and therefore by implication forbids, the priest to kneel during the Prayer of Consecration. After the Prayer of Consecration he may kneel, indeed is ordered to kneel, but he must not, as at St. Alban's he has heretofore done, kneel for a moment between the consecration of the two elements. But every ritual must set some limit to the outward devotion of the minister, or else no two services would be alike. In the Roman Church the gestures of the priest at mass are carefully prescribed, and in so far as they are prescribed the use of any other is forbidden. It is not uncommon to hear Ritualists say that the Roman Catholic service strikes them as less reverent than their own, and if this is examined, it usually turns out to mean that the priest, being told exactly what he is to do, has much less opportunity of exhibiting his individual devotion than has hitherto been enjoyed by the clergy of the Church of England. But the mere imposition of a particular gesture at a particular moment cannot fairly be taken as equivalent to the prohibition of the doctrine supposed to be symbolized by some other gesture. If we suppose that the Anglican Church regards the consecration of the elements as one and the same act, there ceases to be anything significant in her not ordering the consecrator to kneel until the act is complete. To convert this into an implicit denial of the doctrine of the Real Presence is as illogical as it would be to draw a similar inference from the fact that the Roman Church orders the celebrating priest to communicate standing.

Looking at the matter all round, therefore, we hold, as we have held from the time the suit was instituted, that the judgment in MARTIN v. MACKONOCHIE is of very small practical moment. Indeed, in one respect it does the Ritualists a service, by bringing out the fact more prominently that on two points—the non-use of vestments and the omitting to stand during the Prayer of Consecration "before the table," that is, with his back to the people—the law is broken by every Evangelical clergyman every time he administers the Communion. If Ritualism is to be put down by law, it can only be done in one of two ways. Either a decision must be obtained from the Privy Council that certain doctrines cannot lawfully be preached in the Church of England, or an Act of Parliament must be passed to make certain alterations in the present Prayer Book. Either of these expedients will do the required work. Whether they would not do a good deal more in addition, is a question which may be profitably commended to the consideration of Lord SHAFTESBURY and his friends.

PAUPERISM AND EMIGRATION.

THE letter from Australia which appeared in the Times of Tuesday came at a very opportune moment. From various causes the enthusiasm on behalf of emigration which was so general fifteen or twenty years back has long ago died out. This fact may be accounted for in various ways. When the scheme was first suggested it was too often treated as a universal and immediate remedy; and when people found that poverty was too inveterate a disease in England to be cured in a day they grew first impatient, and next indifferent. Emigration again has become discredited owing to its indiscriminate application to all classes of the population. It has been forgotten that a new country does not require all the qualifications of which there is a superabundance in civilized society. It does not follow, because England can only find work for ten men out of twenty, that Australia should be able as a matter of course to find work for the remaining ten. As regards certain trades and professions the colonies are almost as much overstocked as the Mother-country. There is as little demand for head-work of any kind in the one as in the other. Nor, again, is there the opening there once was for the employment of small capitals. Men must not go to Australia with the notion of making their fortunes in a few years, and coming home again. In all these ways there have been a good many illusions to be dispelled, and the process has occasionally been carried on with some roughness. The consequence is that the discouragement has extended over a wider circle than that to which it is properly applicable. People hear that emigration has in many cases been a failure, and they draw a universal conclusion from a particular premiss. They do not consider that the same colony which leaves clerks and fine gentlemen to make their way home as they best can may be languishing all the time for a few shiploads of labourers or artisans. Nor has the selection of emigrants been always as prudent as it might have been. We have thought too much of the immediate relief to ourselves. Consequently, the stream has not been maintained by a continuous demand from the colonies. They are anxious to get what they want from England, but they are not on that account willing to take anything they can get. In the case of the agricultural labourer, some at least of the neglect with which projects of emigration have been regarded must be traced to the instinctive self-interest displayed by many of the farmers. By and by, no doubt, they will be joint gainers with their labourers from the advantages derived by the latter through an improvement of their material condition. They will have their work better done, and, when they find this truth out for themselves, they will no longer grudge the labourer better wages. But, in the first instance, emigration on a large scale would be a dead loss to the farmer, since he would have to pay higher wages without immediately reaping the benefit in improved work. And to many men even the consciousness of getting proportionately more for their money does not compensate for the pain of having to expend the larger sum.

The Melbourne Correspondent of the Times has wisely put side by side with his own description of the condition of the labourer in Australia, Canon GIRDLESTONE's description of the labourer in Devonshire. In Australia "the roughest and least "skilled labourers earn their 5*s.* a day." A common shepherd "gets 40*l.* a year and his rations." The progress from one class to another is rapid; "farm labourers grow into farmers "on their own account, and skilled mechanics into contractors." The commonest labourer has his Sunday suit, his little holiday finery, his weekly or even daily newspaper. Instead of giving up any of the benefits of civilization, he literally tastes them for the first time. In his new home he develops all kinds of new wants, and becomes, intellectually as well as physically, a larger man than before. There is no fear that these advantages will grow less by being shared among a greater number. "With mil- "lions of acres of untilled land, with a superfluity of every- "thing necessary to the existence of man, you cannot easily "overdo this country with human hands." The Australians are trying to find a market for some of their superfluous meat by sending it preserved to England. It is certainly worth considering whether the same end might not be better answered by sending a few hundred thousand Englishmen to eat it fresh in Australia. For what, after all, is there to detain them in this country? The inducements offered in North Devon are very well summed up by Canon GIRDLESTONE in an article in Fraser's Magazine for December. An agricultural labourer gets 9*s.* a week—till within the last year 8*s.* was the usual figure—and from three pints to two quarts of cider a day. Part of his wages is sometimes paid in grist, or in wheat too small in grain to be sent to market, an arrangement which is beneficial or the reverse according as wheat is high or low. He works from seven in the morning to five or half-past five in the evening—less an hour and a-half for meals; but he is often kept two or three hours later without its being counted as overtime. In winter he is liable to frequent deductions from the week's pay, owing to the weather being too bad to work in. He is miserably housed, miserably clad, and miserably fed. His breakfast consists of slices of bread soaked in a pint and a half of hot water, with occasionally a little milk added. These occasions, however, are extremely few, for of late years milk has been scarcely attainable in rural districts. The farmer has now so many opportunities of disposing of it wholesale that it does not answer his purpose to retail it, except at a higher price than the labourer can afford to give. For luncheon and dinner he has bread and skim-milk cheese. At supper he does get his one hot meal in the shape of potatoes and cabbage, flavoured, if he is able to keep a pig, with a little bacon. He is absolutely at the farmer's mercy, for, if he is turned away, he may find it difficult to get other employment; and besides, his cottage often belongs to his master, and if he quarrels with him, he runs the risk of being turned out on the road. Of course there are many parts of England to which this description does not apply. It is on this fact that Canon GIRDLESTONE has built the scheme, of which we have more than once spoken, of making provision for transplanting labourers and their families from North Devon and 9*s.* a week, to other counties where the wages range from 12*s.* to 20*s.* a week. But even supposing this benevolent idea could be systematically carried out, it would soon defeat its own object. If by distributing the labourers of England more equally over the country the minimum of wages can be raised, it is obvious that this can only be done on a large scale by means of a corresponding reduction of the maximum. A mere rearrangement of the wage fund can only benefit those who are worst off by taking nothing from those who are best off. Even this would be an improvement on the present state of things, since, if the agricultural labourer uniformly received 15s. a week, the standard of comfort prevailing among the class generally would probably be higher than when, as at present, there is so great a distance between the highest and lowest extremes. Still, the utmost success that could attend upon Canon GIRDLESTONE's plan would be attained far more effectually by a well-organized scheme of emigration.

There is another class of persons to whom a fresh start in a colony would be of inestimable importance. This is the pauper population of the East of London. We drew attention not long since to the very serious evils which are impending over that district. That emigration is the only remedy that can really deal with the mischief hardly admits of question. Pauperism in East London is no mere temporary infliction; it is rapidly becoming, if indeed it has not already become, the normal condition of many thousands. Charity, as the word is ordinarily understood, only aggravates the evil. The Poor Law is powerless to deal with it, partly because, as the law stands at present, the requisite amount of relief cannot be raised from the East-end parishes without reducing many of the ratepayers to beggary, and partly because a population supported from any other source than its own labour constantly tends to become more numerous. The disease grows with the remedy. In the extension of emigration to this class, very much more caution would be necessary than in dealing with the agricultural labourer. The selection of unfit subjects for the experiment might easily bring the process into discredit both at home and in the colonies; and in the case of a district which has already to a considerable extent been drained of its able-bodied inhabitants, it will be requisite to take great care not to increase the number of those whom the loss of a son or a brother would condemn to absolute helplessness. We have no doubt that the East-end Emigration Committee is thoroughly alive to the importance of avoiding these dangers, but we would suggest to them that the publication of a detailed statement of the method on which they proceed might greatly enhance the flow of public liberality. It is quite time, however, that the Government should again take up the whole subject. It is not one which can be adequately handled by any subordinate agency. The interests opposed to any extensive emigration, especially of the agricultural population, are too numerous to be opposed with success, except by that complete organization which only official persons can command. Lord GRANVILLE could not better signalize his tenure of the Colonial Office than by the construction, in concert with the Colonial authorities, of a system by which the opportunity of emigration should be offered to those with whom the first condition of any moral or intellectual improvement is the amelioration of that physical wretchedness in which they now live.

TARES.

THE French have a characteristically neat phrase for the incidental weaknesses of a strong nature, whether specially or generally strong, when they say of a man that he has les défauts de ses qualités. The theory underlying this phrase is that every virtue has attendant upon it its own particular fault, that the qualities which give a man this or that superiority bring in their train accompanying qualities that tend to inferiority, that we pay for exceptional gifts by a special price; or, to put it metaphorically, that along with the wheat nature, who is as much an enemy as a friend, is pretty sure to have sown a due crop of tares. Tares belong to wheat, on this theory; no wheat without them. This is something different from the commonplace saying that every man has his faults, that nobody is wholly good, and the like. Such faults as are implied in this accepted platitude are not the defects of one's qualities, but of one's humanity; and to say of anybody that he has these is to indulge in the sterile philosophy of the tea-table, and to say sometimes less than nothing. Tares are not merely the weaknesses of fallible mortals as such, but the weaknesses which belong to unusual excellence of any kind, and which spring up alongside of extraordinarily valuable products of character, as if by the selfsame process and law of growth. They are the cost or the penalty, if you like, of any given excellence. If you have uncommon strength on one side, be sure that it has been purchased, consciously or unconsciously, by weakness in some other quarter; that an excessive development here has subtracted so much from the normal development there. It would be an extremely serviceable thing if somebody would draw up a list of virtues, and would then proceed to assign to each of them its private and peculiar defect; we should then know on which side to be wary, both for ourselves and for other people. Conscious of some particular merit, we should then be conscious at the same moment of the likelihood of our [illegible]cular demerit corresponding to it, and, thus forewarn[ed], it would, at any rate, be our own fault if we should not be also forearmed. As it is, for lack of such a list of virtues and corresponding vices—Aristotle's is only an outline, after all—we are forced to trust to personal experience, and the worst of the lessons of experience is that they mostly come too late to be very useful. Men find out that it is a mistake to foster this viper or that, after the brute has bitten them, and the venom has got well into the current of their veins. Still, in recognising the tares that have grown up, in watching against them, in carefully extirpating them, a man might fairly be expected to show himself assiduous, careful, unremitting, because all the time he might be consoled in reflecting that they are the signs and attendants of good grain, and that it is only because he has exceptional virtues that he is bound to be more on his guard than other men against the failings which belong to them. It is sorry work paying for pleasures that have been enjoyed, but who will grudge the constant labour of checking the too luxuriant growth of qualities which only exist because he is better than other people in other qualities, and every check upon which is an immediate help to those other qualities in which he is superior? The reward is direct, and the impulse sufficiently stimulating.

The table of the "defects of qualities," or the catalogue of the various species of tares which belong to the various species of good moral or intellectual grain, if it is to be anything like exhaustive, will be long and complicated, though there is no reason why it should be too complicated to be intelligible. Its leading divisions and classes, especially in the moral order, will be very plain indeed. The most superficial observation of men discloses certain traits which seem invariably to co-exist with certain other traits. For example, rapidity of intelligence is a gift of very great value, and it is not common. The rarity of it is one of the main reasons why the world moves forward so slowly. Most people desire to follow the best course in politics, in knowledge, in belief; but then to know the best course it is indispensable that we should have gone through a long series of successive and distinct efforts of intelligence. For want of rapidity, natural or acquired by training, men make no way; the slowness with which they succeed in making one or two efforts wearies and discourages them, and they fall back into the sluggish ways of cold obstruction, taking firm root at the point where their intelligence has been arrested by some combination of accident and internal défaillance, and then drawing around themselves a fixed and for ever unalterable boundary of all that is to be known and thought and felt and believed by mortal men. Besides keeping a man's mind open, rapidity of intelligence has a practical value of the most obvious kind in many other ways; but mark the tares which nearly always spring up by the side of this most attractive and serviceable quality. For one thing, you seldom find anybody possessed of it who has not also a tinge, mostly a very decided tinge indeed, of impatience with people less rapid than himself. In controversy or in conduct he cannot endure to be unequally yoked, for ever so short a time, with those of slower pace and shorter breath. This is a defect which need not be enlarged upon, if we only remember how slow the average pace of intelligence is, and, in the second place, how much a man must consort with average creatures if he wishes to do anything in the world. There is another defect, as serious intellectually as this is serious morally, and which is equally allied with rapidity. The exhilaration of swift motion over subjects is so delicious as to indispose him who has the faculty for it for laborious penetration into the darker and rockier depths of subjects. The bright and ever shifting view of wide champaigns and the sense of motion are too fascinating; they make the slow and tedious sinking of a shaft too repulsive and disgusting. There are other defects incident to the qualities of swift intelligence—all avoidable, because, to a man who is always on the alert and has real strength, there is no such thing in character as necessity; but all very apt to seize upon him by reason of his virtue, and for the same reason difficult to resist and very likely to take firm root with double speed. It is easy to see in this case with what fatal fertility the tares would be likely to grow up and gain upon the wheat, how eventually they might wholly choke it, rapidity of intelligence being made absolutely good for nothing by the attending crop of vices—of impatience, haste, superficiality, and the rest.

Take the group of qualities which belong to a keen appreciation of all the joys of sense. There are few more fruitful mental possessions than a rightly disciplined sensuousness, a capacity of finding delight by all the channels of sense, in colour, in form, in melody, in rhythm, in warmth, in brightness. Our climate is so unfavourable to this, as also is the fibre of our race, and the hardness of temper which both have combined to produce, that we do not find sensuous quality very common among us; indeed the very name seems to have something of an evil savour about it. Yet no words are needed to prove that anything which adds to the sources of delight of its possessor, and through him to those of others, must be worth having and worth praising. Still fewer words are wanted to prove that in this particular crop, at any rate, the chance of a luxuriant growth of tares is uncommonly good. The kind of tares that spring up along with a sensuous disposition is that which lies most directly in the path of the moralist, and is so glaring and conspicuous that people not seldom suppose that the whole patch is incapable of bearing anything but tares, and those, too, of the very worst description that can stifle goodness in the human mind. The popular clumsiness of dialect and inaccuracy of definition notoriously makes no difference between sensuousness proper and sensuousness low, ignoble, undisciplined and gross, which is sensuality; and there is a certain conformity to actual tendencies in this. Few good crops need such assiduous watching. In the first place, a sensuous man is as likely to impoverish his character by giving the delights of sense a rank over the satisfaction of the understanding, as a man of an opposite sort is to neglect the side of sense and cultivate his understanding only in an arid and narrow manner. In the second place, sensuousness unwatched tends to stifle the social and humane sympathies. People who lay themselves out to excess for pleasures of sense, even those which are most mixed with the most refined pleasures of intelligence, had need take care lest they begin to cherish an inhuman aversion to think of the hideous sorrows of men that lie at their door, and from which no good man can systematically turn away his eye without acquiring that deliberate callousness which is the very hatefullest of vices. In the same way, largeness and intensity of æsthetic sense in excess undoubtedly breed a perilous and dwarfing indifference to politics. Artists are notorious for their apathy about public matters—a defect which, in the eyes of persons with any theory about character and society worth discussing, is fully as disgraceful as some of those other defects on which public opinion is much more severe because they happen to be grosser in their overt manifestations.

If Englishmen are weak in their appreciation on the side of sense, they are exceedingly strong in the virtue of enterprise; and, for the same reason that quickens their sight to the tares in the field of sensuousness, they are a little blind to the flourishing crop that thrives in their own favourite field. The enterprising temper draws its possessor along a narrow path beset with several pitfalls. For example, he is in peril of valuing enterprise too highly for its own sake, until it becomes sometimes not much better than the torment of restlessness; for the sake of enterprise he forgets its causes and ends. The ideal of a serene existence, where all is in stable equilibrium, drops out of sight and mind, or is only remembered to be despised as unmanly, indolent, slothful. If you are not moving, making ever more and more money, acquiring new reputation, restlessly promoting new undertakings, extending connexions, and generally, if you are not penetrated by stir and bustle, you are considered to be as a plant or a tree in which the sap has ceased to rise. Yet the lost ideal was worth preserving; to be without it, to have put it away from among our ends, is to be paying too heavy a price for our exuberance of vigour. Take, again, the highly valuable quality of self-abnegation. In a world where pushing and stirring is so much the rule, to be ready to give way to others, to sacrifice a good to ourselves only for the sake of something which shall be a good to a great many persons as well as, or instead of, ourselves, must be, as everybody indeed confesses it to be, a virtue of priceless esteem. Yet along with it there constantly grows up the sorry tare of spiritlessness; a just resignation to hard circumstance is choked by a counterfeit and most mischievous abjectness. Finally, let us conclude these hints for a list of the thousand and one species of tares, with the most poisonous and most universal of them all—the frightful weed of pharisaism, if that is the best name for a hollow self-consciousness or unjustified spiritual pride. There is no field of human excellence on which this is not likely to make its appearance, and there is hardly an excellence which it will not neutralize, if you once let it make head.

SENSITIVENESS.

TO be negligent of what any one thinks of you, it has been well enough said, shows you to be not only arrogant, but abandoned; but the saying applies to men rather in their private than in their public capacity. It is true only in proportion to the opportunities which the critic has of forming a judgment. A public man ought not to be thin-skinned, if he consults either his comfort or his credit. Any excess of sensitiveness obscures clearness of view, obstructs action, multiplies indefinitely the anxieties inseparable from a prominent position, and provokes attack. If it is once understood that there is no such thing as getting a rise out of a man, he is let alone. It would be well if Mr. Gladstone were invested with the defensive armour of a little phlegm; but, on the contrary, custom, which deadens most sensation, seems only to quicken his; he grows more and more like Hume's portrait of Rousseau, "a skinned man among furze bushes." So at least we judge from the passage in his Chapter of Autobiography which tells the effect that an electioneering placard had on his nervous system. It was a placard, it will be remembered, issued at the Berwick election, in which the writer, by way of showing his sense of Mr. Gladstone's political inconsistency, proposed to leave this "would-be demagogue gibbeted and swinging in the winds of the fool's paradise," an object of derision and contempt. For ourselves, we did not clearly see our way through the part about the "winds of the fool's paradise." We waited to understand before we were horrified; but Mr. Gladstone seems to have mastered the difficulty, for he exclaims, "It freezes the blood, in moments of retirement and reflection, for a man to think that he can have presented a picture so hideous to the view of a fellow-creature." But did Mr. Gladstone really suppose that the author of the placard meant what he said—that he had any picture at all in his eye, any definite image? We could fancy nobody more astonished than the inditer of this fine but somewhat stale piece of rhetoric at the stab he had inflicted, and so it proves. The author of the placard, elate at his unexpected good fortune, hastens to avow himself. "Nobody," writes Captain Hans Busk, "can appreciate better than Mr. Gladstone the licence usually accorded and freely exercised in speeches, squibs, and handbills, during the period of an election; and if he considers that that licence has been exceeded in the instance he refers to, I can but assure him that I heartily regret the circumstance." Captain Hans Busk himself had clearly seen nothing in it. After reading the author's apology and justification, we can only console Mr. Gladstone with the consideration that, if he must present this "hideous picture" to the imagination of any fellow-creature, that fellow-creature may as well be Captain Hans Busk as anybody else.

Nothing could show more emphatically Mr. Gladstone's excess of sensitiveness above the British emotional average than this recoil from the most familiar of all associations—as a mere figure of speech we mean—the neck and the halter. Our criticism on the objectionable passage, as far as we can follow it, is, that it is an anachronism. Since the recent change in our laws the world has lost a right to its favourite joke. Like Acres' damns, the gallows have had their day. Hitherto there is nobody but can compare with Mr. Gladstone's shudderings his own sang froid under some touch of the same trial, whether in the form of a prophecy suggested by the delinquencies of childhood or as expressive of his deserts in later life. There are people who can only criticize character by the aid of this figure of speech, who use it as the one resource for clearing the ground of persons and opinions they don't like. It is "hang him" in impatience at every annoyance, whether aggressive or obstructive; while for more deliberate judgment on actors in things moral, political, or literary, "the sooner that fellow is hanged the better" is an exhaustive verdict, disposing of the question—the man and his work—in the only satisfactory way. And this doom may be understood literally or figuratively, according to the mood of speaker or hearer—jocular or ferocious, as people choose to take it. The world has generally agreed not to take a serious view of such allusions—as, for instance, where Charles Lamb reminds married persons insolent over his bachelorhood what sometimes becomes of their offspring, or where Cobbett discerned in people he did not like necks made to be stretched. In fact, the joke always tells. So it has done since Shakspeare's time, as doubtless it did long before. The world has been of one mind with the gravedigger, "I like thy wit well, in good faith; the gallows is well"! Not one of Walter Scott's heroes is too fine a gentleman for this contingency not to be suggested for him. It is part of a fine stalwart form that it shows a "lang craig for the gibbet." Rob Roy and the Baillie play round the idea with the relish of our pamphleteer. "Well, cousin, ye'll wear black at my burial," says the freebooter. "De'il a black coat will be there, Robin, but the corbies and the hoodie craws," is the ready rejoinder, and the repartee is appreciated. We really begin to think Mr. Gladstone was hard on his assailant, who has strung up his reputation in such good company. But over-sensitiveness must take everything personal in a tragic light, reversing the turn of English humour which evades, by some sleight of touch, the serious side of things, and contrives to detect something easy, familiar, and available for its purposes in every human transaction. It is not always necessary to realize the purport of our words to the mind's eye. When we "hang in suspense" it is not essential that we should picture the idiom to the apprehension. Perhaps acute sensitiveness is incompatible with humour. To enjoy a joke there must be ease of mind, and the over-susceptible are never in this frame. No one takes a joke against himself with a good grace who cannot serenely stand apart and survey himself as a third person. A cool, disengaged understanding shows a man the sort of things which the outside world will say of him and his conduct under peculiar circumstances. Our too sensitive statesman must have known that he was offending some persons' notions of consistency, to say the least of it. He must also have been aware that consistency is the one supreme moral and intellectual merit with people who don't trouble themselves about thinking; a notion which Mr. Gladstone's rapid progress in opinion would certainly shock and outrage. He might, therefore, have foreseen that strong things would be said, and when these strong things were to be spoken from a hustings and to a mob, or posted on dead walls for popular reading, it was a moral certainty that something would come out about swinging and gibbeting. These images still perform their old part of levellers, which has much to do with their popularity.

But leaving public life, where a panoply of phlegm is the first essential to comfort, as well as to entire efficiency, we believe that sensitiveness, whenever it is a characteristic, implies self-mistrust. Let a man once have absolute confidence in his line, whether in thought or action, and he smiles at attack. He is not wounded by the charge of inconsistency, unless there lurks an unacknowledged fear of there being something in it after all. De Quincey attributes to all men of genius the characteristic of tremulous sensibilities, while the highest talent is often below the ordinary standard of feeling; and this probably because talent can reach its ideal, while genius is but rarely satisfied with its performance. However lofty and aspiring may be the self-estimate, it is checked by misgivings, which an adverse voice can deepen into depression and temporary despair. There is no doubt that authors, as a tribe, are sensitive in an excessive degree, and this because there is no standard of capability but success—none, that is, that can be confidently appealed to. Whenever a man is really his own critic and judge, there is no morbid flinching from others' plainspeaking. Thus defended, Wordsworth calmly held his own against ridicule, and Southey maintained confidence in his Madoc, which nobody could read. With him it was always the poem "that unquestionably would stand and flourish." It may be observed that the sensitiveness of authors thrills most keenly at the verdict of strangers. A man who can listen to the unfavourable judgment of the most competent of his friends—anybody, indeed, whom he knows—because he still holds himself the better man, will lose his right reason under the adverse criticism of an unknown pen; it will assume to his shuddering imagination the hangman's office, himself the victim under the mocking stare of the world of readers. We have heard of a man taking to his bed for six weeks after an unfavourable critique of his poems, which could never have happened if he had sincerely believed in his own verses. In the case of such morbid spirits, the press is ever reviving in a degree—a faint degree, we trust—the old wonder:—

> 'Tis strange the mind, that very fiery particle, > Should let itself be snuffed out by an article.

Of course the same self-mistrust is to be detected in all persons who are very sensitive to ridicule. It is wise on this account to have all our surroundings as correct and according to precedent as we can manage to make them. When nothing in circumstances or in the outer man is open to exception, all people are more self-possessed in mind and manner. No one cares about being laughed at where he is sure of his ground. And here, again, we note the unreasonableness of a morbid sentiment. Men commonly dread ridicule in proportion as it need not really affect them. They can stand, and indeed brave, the laugh of acquaintance and belongings, while the sneers of people whom they don't know, and never will know, can inflict an exquisite sting. In questions of conduct, for a like reason, some people are preposterously sensitive to criticism. The faintest hint of disapproval, or even difference of opinion, produces a little frenzy of blustering self-assertion, through which it is not difficult to detect the white feather of self-mistrust. The girl who, in quivering indignation, thrusts into the fire a letter of advice against an injudicious marriage, tells herself that she is avenging an impertinence, but at the bottom there is a doubt of her own prudence and of her lover's worth.

The sensitiveness of all vehement characters may be regarded as a set-off against the annoyances they cause to their cooler neighbours. They are furiously sensitive to blame from others, but they are also acutely sensitive to the reproaches of conscience. Compunction and remorse show very tragically on these people. The same temper that betrays them into outrages ensures an equivalent severity of expiation. As typical examples of self-abasement, they shame our colder natures until we are reconciled to ourselves by the consideration that, if we do not repent in their sackcloth, neither do we fall with such precipitation into their errors. Sir William Napier was one of these vehement spirits; "an error on his part became an agony." Finding, when too late, that he had rashly damaged a brave man's reputation, he might be seen to throw himself on the ground bathed in tears. There is an opposite temper, timid and slow, where sensitiveness acts as a paralyser; there are people upon whom blame tells so much more acutely than praise that one rude critic can silence voice or pen, and check a career. If one or two hiss, it is no matter who claps. If one man yawns and looks at his watch, general attention goes for nothing. If one ear detects a false note, the delight of the crowd gives no pleasure.

While the world in general cannot be said to err in this direction, there are few persons, perhaps, to whom the quiverings of ultra-sensitiveness are unknown as a temporary experience. And it is well to have thus learnt sympathy for natures with which this is a normal condition. People have inevitably to bear so much from one another, owing to defective perception, that any teaching which shall give us an insight into these touchy sensibilities is well earned even at the expense of some pain, and, what may seem worse in the retrospect, some follies and absurdities. The really sensitive organization is a revelation to the observer in quite a distinct sense from ordinary physiognomies; a veil is removed; the mobile mouth, with its infinite play, its variations, fluctuations, quivering self-betrayals, is in itself a lesson, a study, an educator. Through whatever indications it may be read, this temper has a use in teaching caution and refinement to minds of less delicacy than good nature. The world more commonly causes pain through blundering than from intention. Men, like boys, are often cruel because they see the fun solely from their own point of view. And if a smile is now and then irresistible when our intellectual Samsons make sport for us modern Philistines, we should remember that ultra-sensitiveness is an evil incident to fine powers; and, in its more conspicuous examples, it is very commonly the result of an undue intellectual strain from which the mass of mankind are in little danger, and of a perpetual tension of the faculties of which they certainly know nothing.

THE WORSHIP OF ANCESTORS.

WHENEVER it chances that English missionary zeal comes into such direct collision with native heathen feeling that a hostile outbreak is the consequence, the case is certain to be prejudged over a large surface of English opinion. The whole missionary world, from its "philadelphic" centre in the Strand to its remotest village association, will at once accept and promulgate the canon that Brother So and So's views must needs be entirely right, for was he not accepted by the committee at home?—that the poor benighted heathen must be hopelessly in the wrong, or where would be the need of sending missionaries to him? And the more profane world finds in the general term of "nigger" too convenient a way of escape from all geographical and ethnological subtleties to make invidious distinctions between the civilized dwellers in what the Times was pleased the other day to describe as "Oriental latitudes," and the savages of Central Africa or the Pacific. The Englishman is of course in the right as against the "nigger," who, equally of course, is in the wrong. Any speaker or writer who should urge that there may be something, after all, to say on the heathen side of the question, would at best be regarded as holding a brief in the character of advocatus diaboli, and would be sure among the zealots of the religious world to find "the scorner's chair" brought to the front of the platform for his especial occupation. It would require a more than ordinary amount of nerve to stand up before the compact feminine phalanx of a May meeting for the purpose of uttering a word in mitigation of sentence, or even of hinting at the possibility of extenuating circumstances, in the case, to take an instance now some few years past, of the South Sea Islanders who were known to have killed, and suspected also to have eaten, a Nonconformist missionary. The majesty of British power, in the person of the naval officer in command at the nearest station, was instantly invoked to avenge the wrong; and he, if he had followed the venerable traditions of the service, would merely have been under the necessity of landing on some island in the neighbourhood—the right one if possible—and burning the first village he came to. But the officer in this instance was not satisfied with traditions and precedents, and took the trouble to make a careful inquiry into the circumstances of the affair. The actual murderer was discovered, and very properly hanged; but it was found impossible to withhold some amount of sympathy from the islanders, against whom the missionary, disappointed at the apparent want of success attending his labours, had not long before been vehemently denouncing the wrath of the Great Spirit. A French vessel at the time, being in want of a pilot, had obtained one from the island, and proved to have some disease—measles, if we remember rightly—on board, which the pilot took home with him, and which spread over the island with frightful and fatal rapidity. The poor islanders saw in the calamity the fulfilment of the white man's curse, and in the simplicity of their ignorance they sought to remove it by removing its author, whose own indiscreet zeal had thus indirectly brought about the catastrophe. The recent collision between the teaching of European missionaries and the popular feeling in China has happily led to no such tragical consequences, and has called for no such severe reprisals; but it is probable that any attempt to fix on the missionaries the slightest blame for indiscretion in their method of dealing with a firmly-rooted popular sentiment, or any intimation of an opinion that beneath that sentiment there may be a truth which commands the deepest respect and veneration of civilized society, would be set down as the most dangerous latitudinarianism, if not as rank infidelity. It is not, therefore, without some misgivings lest we should afford an occasion to writers of the Record school to prophesy out of their own hearts against us in their too familiar style, that we express our belief that the devotion of the Chinese to the spirits of their ancestors, which has been the immediate cause of offence between the missionaries and the population, is a question which the highest and most enlightened Christian teaching would approach with the deepest tenderness and the most profound respect.

In an account of the rite of ancestor-worship as now practised in China, contained in a recent number of a religious periodical, the writer, while evidently regarding it as the darkest of superstitions, has yet related the details with great fairness and candour, and has given a description of this national devotion which, allowing for some quaintness of ornament and accessories, is very touching in its simple beauty. If it be allowable to clear the question from the issues of controversial theology which it indirectly raises, it may be maintained that in the principle of ancestor-worship there is found a common bond of religious sentiment between the elaborate, though differing and almost independent, civilizations of the extremes of East and West. Throughout the greater part of Christendom the devout and tender associations which gather round the Saints of the Church, and the cultus paid to them, present an exact parallel to the reverence of a Chinese gentleman before the tomb or the shrine of his ancestors; and the charge of superstition, or of such admixture of superstition as may accompany the act in either case, will apply equally to both; while it would be unfair to deny the existence of an element of true religious sentiment in the one, which all except the very narrowest of partisans will allow to exist in the other. And, of the two cases, the motive which animates the heathen cultus is plainly more real, more natural, and appeals more closely to a man's own feeling and experience, than that which issues in devotion to the Saints of the Eastern or Western Church. A man's family descent is nearer to him, and therefore more of a reality, than any calendar can be. To recognise our indebtedness to minds or to examples of other ages in a sphere entirely independent of ourselves as far as external relations go, requires at the least a considerable exercise of the intellectual powers; while the acknowledgment of inheritance from our parents of mental character, and of indebtedness to them for training and influence, is as obvious as that of inheritance of property or of the characteristics of physical likeness. In its origin, indeed, the very devotion paid to the Saints of the Church is that of descendants towards a spiritual ancestry, the principle underlying the rite being the same in China as in Christendom. In the application of the principle the Oriental civilization is at least the more consistent of the two; for the Chinese ancestor-worship connects itself immediately with the memory of the living generation, while in the Christian hagiologies a long interval between the past and the present is indispensable to canonization. In other words, the worship is paid where in the one case it is inevitable, and in the other practically impossible, that there should be a recognition of personal relationship between the living and the dead generations. It would thus follow that, all questions of creed apart, whatever of reverential consideration the established practice of the larger part of Christendom may demand from those who do not conform to it, may be claimed with even a greater show of reason for the traditional worship of China. This is no doubt a claim which the missionary world will very readily allow; the process of tarring both with the same stick, and marking each in great black letters as "idolatry," being extremely simple and, in such circles, satisfactory. But then, as we are now frequently told, "we are living in unsettled times"; and there are minds for which the great No-Popery syllogism has failed to provide a solution of all questions in religious thought. Even the Times has lately discovered the existence of the Patriarch of Constantinople, and has expressed a wish to know more about him; and perhaps it is not too much to hope that one result of applying "the historical method" to matters of religious belief and worship will be the discovery of a clearly-marked common origin in the Commemorations and Founders'-days dear to Protestantism, and the festivals of the Calendar dear to the nations both of the Eastern and Western obedience.

It is not within our province to enter into so deeply spiritual an inquiry as that belonging to the nature of prayer; it may be sufficient here to point out that the shades of thought and expression by which commemoration passes into praise, praise and contemplation into a strong aspiration on the part of the living that they may attain to the standard of the dead, and this again into prayer, are too gradual and imperceptible to be marked off by strongly defined lines. The memory of the past, and therefore of those who lived in the past, is the basis of history and is of the essence of civilization; and the Chinese gentleman who kneels before the memorial tablet of his father, in recognition "of the root of his existence," and asks of the spirit of the dead to "grant that his posterity may be illustrious," acknowledges, in outward form at least, the channels through which the historical stream has flowed on to his own time, with the gifts of external prosperity and power, and the higher blessings of intellectual progress and refinement, which it has brought with it. It is his own fault if he fails to trace to their source whatever benefits his own life, in its outward accessories or its inward energies, has derived from his fathers, or if he takes to himself the credit of being the architect of his own fortunes, and the framer of his own intellectual and moral character. And there is in the theory of this Chinese ancestor-worship—whether it be realized in practice or not is quite another matter—a distinct advantage to be gained, which European family life, except in the few cases where its members have found a place in more or less widely known history, fails to reach. For the most part, and in the majority of cases, an Englishman's great grandfather is a mere nominis umbra to himself. He may owe to him all the stability of character, and all the acuteness of intellect which he possesses; and yet if he has not inherited this knowledge through the traditions of the intermediate generations, he may live and die in utter ignorance of the stages by which his own life has been built up. The gentleman of China who bows at the shrine of his father, as he has seen his father in his turn do before him, has at any rate the opportunity made to his hand for transmitting to his children the record of noble lives in the immediate past and in close connexion with it. And such a "worship"—we use the term without scruple as one in common use still in the experience of country gentlemen and mayors of boroughs—of ancestors is to the full as legitimate as the familiar type of the same devotion among ourselves, while it has greater practical advantages. The Englishman's ancestral shrine, if he is not permitted to cross the privileged and more sacred threshold of the Peerage, is the Landed Gentry of Sir Bernard Burke. As regards the worshipper personally, the difference in the two instances would seem to be that the Chinese in his domestic oratory worships his ancestors in their relation to himself; while the Englishman, with his Burke, worships himself in his relation to his ancestors. Some modern writer has said that the average Englishman would rather trace his descent from an outlaw who was hanged under the Plantagenets than from a successful linendraper who was Lord Mayor under the Georges; and there is a good deal of truth in the epigram. We do not intend for a moment to raise the social question involved in this preference; we quote it only for the sake of the suggestion which it affords that our national theory of ancestor-worship might possibly be regarded in China with something of the same astonishment as that with which at first sight we might look upon the practice which prevails in the great Oriental Empire. Whatever may be the form of its expression at different times and by different races, the principle which leads men to take a pride in the names and memories of those who have gone before them, and to pay a religious veneration to them whether as a natural or a spiritual ancestry, is the same, and is one which belongs to the higher part of human nature. The habit of thought which merges the visible in the invisible, and the family in the Church, has applied the principle in the worship of saints; the purely secular view which distinguishes between the world and the Church, as moving in entirely separate orbits, is represented in the heraldic honours of the family tree; while the subordination of the invisible to the visible, and the substitution of the family idea for that of the Church in the spiritual world, has its type in the singular and beautiful devotion which has recently in China given such offence to over-zealous and injudicious missionaries. Imperfect and strange as this development of religious feeling must of necessity seem to us, it reaches far more deeply into the true ground on which all hope rests in human life than the cold and barren Positivist creed which denies to the dead any separate spiritual existence, and annihilates every worthy life and deed in the past by veiling it with an unsubstantial shadow called "Humanity"; and it presents to us a borderland upon which the Oriental religions may stand together with the creeds of Christendom, and look together into the historical past as a spiritual present, not without a light shining from a higher sphere on both, and a higher harmony uniting the voices of both in obedience to the precept—itself belonging to a borderland of religious thought—"Let us now praise famous men, and our fathers that begat us." And it may be a question worthy of some consideration whether freedom from any taint of Oriental or mediæval superstitions in our relation to the dead is altogether so great a gain as men may be inclined to represent it, if they have fallen instead into the more modern habit of praising nobody except themselves.

YOUNG FRANCE UNDER DISCIPLINE.

AMONG the many good stories told of "Old Keate," perhaps the best is that of the boy who called on him to take leave. "You seem to know me very well," said the great Head-Master, "but I have no remembrance of ever having seen your face before." "You were better acquainted, sir, with my other end" was the unblushing reply. An amusing police case at Bordeaux shows at any rate the difficulty of making any such acquaintance in France. We own to a certain sympathy with the German philosopher who had only a fortnight to study England in, and spent it in the Thames Police Court. The life of England a hundred years ago lies rather in the Newgate Calendar than in the Annual Register, and we fancy that the true state of French society lies open for us not so much in the Faits Divers as in the Bulletin Judiciare. At any rate the reports of the Police Court of Bordeaux give us a queer little peep into that strange chaos of clashing creeds, sentiments, tendencies which we call France under the Empire. Boy life, Jesuit life, domestic life, legal life, all stand out in epigrammatic contrast; and the boy esprit fort, the boy devotee, the indignant father, the acquiescent father, the dignified rector, and the penitent usher, the sceptical judge, and the more than sceptical audience, tell their different tales as variously and perhaps as picturesquely as the "half-Rome," and the "other half-Rome," the Guidos and the Pompilias of Mr. Browning's last poem. The mere fact that two words seem to have set all Bordeaux on fire becomes intelligible when we remember that the two words "flogging" and "Jesuit" embody that Old France which New France has left on the other side of the gulf of '89. In England, conscious of an "Old Keate," who flogged a duke's son or an attorney's son with the same judicial impartiality, the birch was the one great national protest for social equality. France, where the noble and the roturier divided the question of blows between them by the simple process of the one class claiming to administer, and the other submitting to receive, the whipping, it is no wonder that the plebeian epidermis has ever shown itself singularly sensitive to a return of the ancien régime. The abolition of the birch was one of the first exploits of the Revolution, and its restoration, in the eyes of "M. le Président" and the sympathizing audience, would certainly bring in its train the rule of the Count de Chambord and the oldest of "old parties." Hence it is that in the minds of all friends of the Revolution there exists a certain connexion between the ideas of the birch and of the Jesuits. Behind those mysterious walls which shroud the Society from Voltairian eyes, France suspects the reverend Fathers of constantly hankering after "Old Keate's" acquaintance with "the other end." And certainly the famous Bordeaux case justifies, to a certain extent, the suspicions of France.

It is time, however, to let the different groups tell their own tale, and necessarily the victims come first. Master Joseph Ségéral, of the ripe age of thirteen and a-half, seems to have waged a fierce war with a schoolfellow over a contested debt of threepence, which ended in an unfortunate accident. "Dans notre dispute je relevai brusquement le coude qui le frappe au nez et le fit saigner." The close of morning school found Master Ségéral a prisoner in a cell lighted only by a window from the corridor. The furniture must be described in Master Joseph's own picturesque words as we find them in the procès verbal:—"Le sol est bitumé. Il n'y avait aucun siége, aucun meuble, rien qu'un vase de nuit." A crust of bread at four—he had fasted since breakfast—varied existence till the arrival of le Père Commire at ten; and with the reverend Father came "la discipline." The discipline (Keate's "birch" shrinks humbled before the grandeur of such a title) consists of "une réunion de cordes solidement tressées, qui se terminent par plusieurs brins à nœuds." The discipline proved too much for Master Ségéral, and he rushed, a little sansculotte for the nonce, into the bed-chamber of Père de la Judie for protection.

The bed, however, was eminently convenient for the purposes of chastisement. Master Joseph found his cries smothered in the mattrass, and Father Commire finished the execution "à son gré." Obviously this Ségéral, of thirteen and a-half, is an esprit fort upon whom the teaching of the reverend fathers has had little effect. On the martyrs who succeed its traces are more evident. Master de Connat, who has made a similar deposition, and who has even recorded a wonderful declaration of le P. Commire—"Je suis l'exécuteur; je n'ai contre vous aucun motif de haine; mais il faut que je vous fustige"—declares the story a little exaggerated, and attributes the unfortunate rents "de mon pantalon" to the nails of a desk, "sur laquelle je m'agitais beaucoup" during the operation. Trimming such as this, however, is cast contemptuously away by Master Léon de Montfort. This remarkable boy, conscious of his fault, seems absolutely to have asked for a whipping. We take refuge in the Report:—

Quatrième témoin.—Léon de Montfort, âgé de treize ans et demi, élève de l'école des PP. Jésuites à Tivoli: Un jour de l'année derniere, comme je venais de commettre une faute grave, après en avoir commis un certain nombre depuis très-peu de temps, je demandai au P. Commire de me châtier en m'administrant des coups de discipline. Il a fait ce que je lui demandai, il me les a donnés. (Hilarité.)

D. Mon enfant, si ce que vous dites là est vrai, il faut avouer que vous êtes l'écolier le plus extraordinaire, le plus singulier, le plus excentrique, non seulement de Bordeaux, mais encore peut-être du monde entier. Comment! c'est vous qui demandez à votre maître de vous administrer le fouet! c'est vous qui priez qu'on veuille bien vous fouetter!—R. Oui, Monsieur.

D. Et vous avez reçu, avez-vous dit, dans l'instruction, soixante coups de fouet?—R. Oh! ceci est bien sans doute un peu exagéré. Je ne pense pas en avoir reçu autant.

D. Enfin, quel que soit le nombre, cela vous a-t-il fait du mal?—R. Non, Monsieur.

D. Tout au contraire, sans doute. Vous en avez été très-satisfait?—R. Oui, Monsieur.

D. Je répète que vous êtes un prodigieux écolier!

It is in vain that the insidious advocate points out the contradiction between Master Léon's latest theory of the discipline and his earlier deposition, in which he represented the reverend Father as offering, and not himself as demanding, this chastisement. The grandeur of his reply rouses the President to action:—

Dans l'instruction, votre déposition, légèrement différente de celle que vous venez de faire, quoique encore bien étonnante, serait cependant plus croyable. Vous y disiez que le P. Commire vous ayant offert de vous administrer la discipline, vous y aviez consenti. Aujourd'hui, vous renchérissez là-dessus. Ce n'est plus le P. Commire qui vous a offert, c'est vous qui avez demandé. Je dois dire que votre premiere version est conforme, et non pas celle d'Aujourd'hui, à la déclaration du P. Commire.—R. Monsieur le président, qui accepte, demande! (Mouvement très-marqué dans l'auditoire.)

M. le Président: Qui accepte, demande! dites-vous. C'est là, mon enfant, une singulière maxime, et que ne vous a pas suggérée une connaissance loyale du sens des mots. A moins d'avoir les notions perverties ou d'être le dernier de votre classe en synonymie, vous devez savoir qu'accepter n'est pas du tout la même chose que demander. Par conséquent, en disant l'un pour l'autre, vous ne dites pas du tout la vérité.

Master Léon was, indeed, far from telling the whole truth. If Père de la Judie is to be believed, he is a child of a far more extraordinary nature than even the astonished advocate could have imagined. "C'est un enfant très-singulier, très-extraordinaire. Il lui arrivera, par exemple, au réfectoire, à l'étude, au milieu du silence, d'entonner la préface de la Messe, ou la Kyrie Eléison. Sa nature ne se peut comparer à aucune autre." We sincerely trust not. But the figure was wanted to complete the picture. A boy like this, after all, is the "Young France" which the reverend fathers can do something with. He has in him the makings of a fine enthusiast, although his spontaneous outbursts at the dinner-table are a little inconvenient in his earlier years. And it is an enthusiasm which will never forget the bounds of a dexterous prudence. Suarez himself could not have excelled that "M. le Président, qui accepte, demande!"

The President, however, only comes into full play when the parents make their appearance. He conducts a running fight with an old naval officer, M. de Longat, whose theories about corporal punishment are utterly at variance with the theories of '89. It is in vain that the President condemns, in the name of the law, parents who "abuse their authority and their strength to rage cruelly against a being weaker than themselves," that he declares that fathers have no right to beat their children, still less to delegate such a right to others. M. de Longat takes his stand upon facts, and the facts are certainly telling. "I prefer that my son should be whipped at twelve, than that he should be a scoundrel at thirty." We can hardly wonder that such a perfectly illogical mode of treating the question rouses the indignation of the Court:—

M. le Président,—Mais admettriez-vous donc, Monsieur, qu'on eût agi envers votre fils comme on l'a fait envers le jeune Ségéral; que l'on eût déchiré sa chemise, étouffé ses cris et blessé ses reins et ses cuisses?—R. Oui, Monsieur, s'il l'avait mérité.

M. le Président,—Allons, Monsieur, vous vous croyez encore à votre bord! Ce sont là des traitements que l'on emploie vis-a-vis des coolies ou des mousses!

Madame de Longat is as unreasonable as the naval officer himself. Had her boy received the whipping which his "ardent imagination" has depicted, he would certainly have told her of it. "Mais, Madame," remonstrates the Advocate—

Le fils disait avoir été frappé à un endroit qui ne se voit pas au par-[illegible] Vous auriez pu ignorer cette correction qu'il aurait subie, et que, par [illegible] sentiment facile à comprendre, il vous aurait cachée?—R. Monsieur, mon [illegible] me dit tout. Il ne m'a jamais dit cela.

The Court is naturally astonished by the extreme want of delicacy evidenced in such relations between a mother and a boy of thirteen, and deals with Madame accordingly:—

M. le Président,—Vous ne voulez assurément pas dire, Madame, que si ses maîtres l'eussent mis en sang, eussent déchiré sa chemise, étouffé ses plaintes, vous auriez approuvé cela?—N. Non, Monsieur; mais . . .

M. le Président,—Cela suffit, Madame. Il n'y a pas un cœur de mère qui pût faire une autre réponse.

If the Court, however, had its own embarrassments in dealing with illogical parents, it had none in dealing with the reverend fathers themselves. No beings were ever more unlike the conventional Jesuits of Exeter Hall or M. Eugène Sue than these Jesuits of Bordeaux. Their answers give one the notion of extremely stupid people thrown into a great fright. They are marvellously humble, and they are marvellously evasive, but their humility is the humility of schoolboys before a thrashing, and their evasions are simply transparent and silly. The rector declares he knows nothing about the discipline, and that these whippings, which the evidence proves to have been pretty frequent, were absolutely contrary to the rules of the Society. P. de la Judie denies having authorized the correction; he had only turned his back and gone on with his writing while the boy was whipped on his bed. Father Commire plays with admirable resignation the part of scapegoat; he has acted on his own impulse, without orders from his superior—"pour une correction de ce genre, la hiérarchie n'existe pas." Nothing can be clearer than that corporal punishment was the regular system of the school, but not one of the fathers will admit it; and, instead of boldly facing the question on the ground of common sense, they plunge into a series of distinctions, evasions, and retractations which are certainly not calculated to raise the general estimate of their veracity. We certainly do not coincide with the verdict which doomed the two reverend gentlemen to ten days' imprisonment and a fine of 300 francs for whipping a boy who fairly deserved a whipping; but the solitary hours of detention may be spent profitably enough by Fathers Commire and La Judie in considering whether a system that produces a sense of truth such as their own, and a fine religious fervour like the boy De Montfort's, is precisely a system adapted to convert "Young France."

MONEY-LENDERS AND UNDERGRADUATES.

THERE is something quite touching about the fresh enthusiasm with which certain classes of Englishmen appeal for aid to the newspapers. It strikes somebody all of a sudden that there is more pauperism than there ought to be, or that people marry with less prudence than is compatible with a due regard to Malthusian principles, or that the clergy don't find something new and startling to say every Sunday about the most well-worn of all topics of human discussion. Apparently his first impression is that the existence of the evil, whatever it may be, has never been remarked by any other human being. Accordingly he rushes off to announce it with the eagerness of an astronomer discovering a new planet, or a traveller who has found a new route through a previously unknown district. He labours for the most part under the conviction that, as soon as his marvellous discovery has been proclaimed, a crowd of imitators will rush up and call him blessed; and, singular as it seems, he is generally not far wrong in his anticipation, especially if he happens to hit upon his discovery in some season when very little is going on. But, what is even stranger, he appears to cherish the comfortable faith—at least he always professes that faith to the newspaper of his confidence—that as soon as his discovery is announced a change will take place in human nature, that paupers will suddenly become solvent, that people about to marry will become prudent, and that sermons will for the future be entertaining. No amount of failure seems to damp this enthusiasm; and consequently there are certain venerable cries which are taken up at intervals of a few months, which swell the columns of newspapers for a few days or weeks, and which are then dismissed to slumber again in peace until some new inquirer hits once more upon the obvious truism which, if we might judge from the enthusiasm which it evokes at each reappearance, might have been unnoticed from the creation of the world to the day in which it is taken up by the press. The advantages which this singular delusion confers upon the editors of newspapers are too obvious to need comment. Indeed, if the public were not on the whole a very simple and confiding public, the task of those useful functionaries would be much more troublesome than is actually the case.

Such, at least, is our only mode of accounting for a phenomenon of which a letter which recently appeared in the Times affords an excellent illustration. It seems to have suddenly occurred to a gentleman that the practice of lending money to thoughtless young men is one which leads to great evils. He was very naturally led to this remark by a circular which had been sent to two of his sons at Cambridge. He did not reflect, or did not care for the fact, that the same remark had been made by the authors of a good many novels, satires, and essays upon social subjects, during the present and several preceding generations. He accordingly wrote a very proper letter to the Times, enclosing the circular in question, and the very satisfactory letter which he had sent in reply. He had had the satisfaction of informing the would-be usurer that, if the law were in a proper state, the said usurer would be whipped through the town at the cart's tail. This is the kind of remark which always gives unqualified satisfaction to its author. The only drawback to the pleasure of telling a man in the plainest possible terms that you consider him to be a dirty scoundrel, is the difficulty of confiding your opinion to the world at large. It is exquisitely pleasant to pull a man's nose, or to administer a hearty and concentrated kick to an ignominious part of his person. If you can only do it in the presence of a good many thousand people, with the perfect confidence that they will very much applaud what you have done, there are perhaps few purer pleasures which fall to the lot of poor humanity. This is substantially the satisfaction derived from insulting a money-lender in the columns of the Times; and though we may be somewhat sceptical as to the permanent advantage likely to result to the morals of the community, and may even doubt whether the incidental advertisement is not likely to be more effectual than the high moral indignation, we fully sympathize with the delight of the indignant parent. At any rate, whether useful or otherwise, the Times published the letter, and followed it up by some sensible comments. It may be doubtful whether at this precise season, with the Irish Church, and Vote by Ballot, and East London distress, and various other topics looming in the distance, any large share of public attention will be gained for the discussion. It is a pity that the money-lender did not write about the beginning of August. A few passing remarks, however, may be bestowed upon the subject.

It is a painfully obvious truth that it is a very bad thing for young men to get into the habit of borrowing money at exorbitant rates of interest. Whether a sound political economy would approve of repressing the practice by whipping the extortioners through the town at the cart's tail, is a more difficult question. The practice of drawing the teeth of Jews, so extensively practised in the middle ages according to historical novelists, is not supposed to have made them more reasonable in their demands, nor to have materially diminished their business. There is a primâ facie objection against all such regulations, as being more likely to raise the rate of interest than to diminish the objectionable practice. We have only to ask whether the position of undergraduates is so exceptional that any special measures should be adopted for their protection. Are they to be considered as children likely to be improved by a parental supervision, or as men who must learn, like other men, something by advice and a good deal by experience? An undergraduate is, we know, apt to be a very silly and thoughtless creature. He is in the occasional habit, as we learn from legal proceedings, of launching out into the most foolish expenditure; he orders illustrated Bibles costing fifty guineas, in order to get a troublesome tradesman out of his rooms; he incurs debts for jewellery equal to a year's income of his father's living; and it is not surprising if he sometimes borrows money on terms which imply that he will repay the capital two or three times over and then owe as much as before. Amongst the three thousand or more young men at Oxford and Cambridge, it is perhaps probable that there are some few who are playing these follies once more. Parents or guardians who have the misfortune to be connected with lads of this happy genius for expenditure are to be excused if they cry out for stricter supervision and feel a certain itching in their palms for the handle of a cat-o'-nine tails. Perhaps they regret that some such instrument was not previously applied more freely to their interesting charge, and would be glad to pay off capital and interest of the overdue debt of lashes on the back of the usurer, that he may do vicarious penance.

Thoughtless, however, as undergraduates may be—and certainly no one will believe that they are distinguished by an excessive development of the reflective powers—we think that the frequency of the evil may be easily exaggerated. When a case appears in the Bankruptcy Court, or a tradesman brings an action for recovering some preposterous debt, there is a fine opportunity for the display of virtuous indignation. There is an article or two in the daily papers; the foolish youth and the designing creditor are vigorously denounced, and the outside public fancies that undergraduates generally are pampered in aristocratic hotbeds of luxury to the practice of reckless extravagance. We believe, however, that experienced persons will agree that these cases are very exceptional. It is true that many undergraduates are apt to be too luxurious; they spend more money on entertainments or on dress than they ought, and they leave the University with debts which are an annoyance to themselves or their parents. The whole tone of the place is perhaps too favourable to the luxurious easy-going student, and too discouraging to the virtues of frugality and hard work. But we do not believe that usurers reap any large profit from their efforts to corrupt ingenuous youth. A large proportion of undergraduates, if not particularly sensible, have a certain timidity about money matters. They know very well what is meant by the process of going to the dogs, and are quite aware of the initial steps which conduct to that consummation. If the tutors do their duty as well as is usually the case, they soon discover the fact, when a youth is unduly extravagant, and are able to back up their own by parental authority. Youthful taste is generally in the direction of ostentatious modes of expenditure, and the authorities are only too glad to dismiss the rising spendthrift from their walls if they cannot put some other check upon his extravagance. The sinners who bring discredit upon the place are generally of two classes. They are sometimes lads who have unluckily become prematurely masters of a fortune which they fancy to be endless, and think that they may incur unlimited debts because they have independent means of greater amount than the allowances of their companions. If they have any sense, they learn prudence after the precedent of Pendennis, at the expense of some slice of their property, or they may develop a taste for gambling or the Turf, which brings them to ultimate ruin. The position is certainly a dangerous one, and would be so under any regulations; but we doubt whether the power of borrowing money at exorbitant rates is likely to increase the danger materially. That resource comes later, after the wasteful habits have become settled. The other class of which we speak is that of the ingenuous youths who seem to be predestined scamps. There is always a certain number of young men in whose faces we may read the decree of destiny, that they will sooner or later become billiard markers, blacklegs, enlist in the Zouaves, or in some other way descend to the bottom of the social scale. The only way to deal with them is to get rid of them as speedily as possible. If some share in their ruin goes to the usurers, we are sorry for it, because we grudge any plunder to such pests of society; but it probably only shortens an inevitable process. The margin of weak, though really well-meaning, young men at the Universities who are seduced to destruction by the wiles of money-lenders we believe to be very small, though perhaps it is to be regretted that any such should burn their fingers at all sensibly.

In short, the utmost that could be done by the cart's-tail process would be very trifling. Young men at the University are necessarily exposed to many temptations, and it is part of the theory of the place that they should be exposed to temptation. There are more detestable scoundrels than even the money-lending attorneys. The quack advertisements prove the existence of a class of loathsome parasites upon society, whom we should not wish to see at the cart's-tail only because such a punishment would be infinitely too good for them; and their existence proves sufficiently the existence of vices which are really a much greater evil than simple extravagance in money. Every one knows that the mere discipline of the University can do very little to repress the evils of immorality. Young men enjoying the freedom which is essential to University life are constantly liable to dangers which cannot be eradicated by any rules enforced by authority. The discipline indeed may be far from useless, if only as preserving a certain degree of decency; but any substantial improvement must come from the slower action of moral influences. In the same way, tutors who enjoy the respect of their pupils can do much to raise the tone of their pupils in regard to money matters. They can bring into discredit the snobbish public opinion—for young men are quite as capable of being snobs as their elders—which frequently tends to encourage absurd expenditure, without much help from sumptuary laws; and, above all, they can get rid of those who set the worst example, and act as centres of corrupting influence. Any one who knows the Universities will feel that there is plenty of room for improvement in these respects. But, compared with such influences, the effect of the cart's-tail would be infinitesimal. It might force the tempter to adopt rather more roundabout and dirty channels for approaching his prey, but the small number who fall to his arts at present would manage to find their way to him in spite of any practicable regulations, and would perhaps get into rather deeper mud than before. The evil arising from similar practices in the public offices has been very properly met by the Treasury minute announcing rules for the punishment of persons becoming embarrassed or being parties to accommodation bills. A clerk in an office or a subaltern in the army is more independent, and is in an atmosphere more favourable to extravagance, than an undergraduate; and the rules suggested are likely to be beneficial to the Civil Service as well as to the servants, or, as the Treasury is pleased to call them after the manner of haberdashers, employés, themselves. It is plainly right that the public should insist upon certain tests of respectability in the case of those to whom it is paying salaries, and should provide them with special motives for prudence and good conduct, as they are in a position of responsibility and temptation. But we are of opinion that the existing machinery is quite sufficient in the case of the Universities if, as we believe to be the case, it is used with proper energy and care.

DOCTOR POSITIVUS.

An indictment against the whole human race is not likely to be a very short document. The history of human folly and error in one hundred volumes folio, which Lord Lytton makes his hero to have projected, could not be much more elaborate than the confutation of every conviction and conclusion, every religious and moral system, every philosophy of life, every chart and scale of truth hitherto accepted by mankind, which we have lately received from a body of reformers constituted at New York. The First Positivist Society of New York, Box No. 6,055, N.Y. Post Office," have addressed themselves urbi et orbi, or rather to the Kosmos generally, with a creed in full. And very full indeed it is. It settles, on principles firm as Teneriffe or Atlas, these little matters—"a Scientific Religion; the Dynamic Theory of the Universe; Time and Space Explained; Force and Its Changes to account for all Phenomena; and a New System of Morals." Twelve columns of the New York World are, after all, a narrow canvass on which to display this gigantic procession of new truths. Considering that the advocate of the human race, Anacharsis Clootz, confined himself and his sublime mission to the scanty purpose of redressing social and political disorders, the regenerators of humanity have been moderate in compressing into forty articles and an appendix the credenda of the new gospel, which, as their prophets say, "taken together, cover the whole of human activity, thought, and emotion, and place life, progress, and reform upon a solid basis." Forty Stripes, save one, is the burden laid upon our shoulders by a bigoted State Church, but the XXXIX Articles themselves are but tow and packthread to the forty stern decrees which have been fulminated to the world from Box No. 6,055. Doctor Positivus at New York cannot be said to be brief, but he is emphatic; and, all things considered, seeing that he has only to prove that every religion which ever has existed is sheer nonsense, every system of morals hitherto taught and practised a mere illusion and snare, and every philosophy nothing better than fumbling and stumbling in the dark, forty articles which not only destroy all that the world has ever believed in and held sacred, but also reveal all truth, and settle every doubt and difficulty which ever has been or can be, form, we repeat, a very brief and portable manual.

Diruit of course goes before ædificat, and before the New York Positivists build up their new world they must get rid of the old one. And a very clean sweep, indeed, they make of it; the besom of destruction is plied by a strong and willing hand. We prefer to let the iconoclasts enumerate the idols which they have shattered:—"It is no longer possible for an honest inquirer to accept as true any of the prevalent religions. . . . The great need of our age is a thorough and entire change of all human thoughts, feelings, hopes, and interests, from the ancient theological subjective and illusory suppositions of Hebrew and Christian mythology to the modern, objective, practical, and positive conclusions, previsions, and rewards of science." A pleonastic enumeration of the effete human hopes and interests which are got rid of is given, and we are asked with a grim and sarcastic air of triumph to attend to the results of "the inevitable creed of the new Faith. It sweeps at once into the limbo of vacuity all notions and hopes that the mass of our race from its earliest history has hitherto rested upon as they passed from the womb to the grave. We find ourselves in a new world." Very new indeed, and without much to fill it; for it is asked, "Where under this view are 'creation,' 'end of the world,' 'personal gods,' or 'God,' 'the immortal spirit' or 'soul' of man, the 'heaven,' 'hell,' 'devil,' 'sin,' 'repentance,' 'resurrection' . . . and the 'feelings' that have led and held man upward. All these vanish." M. Auguste Comte surveys the world despoiled of "all human thoughts, feelings, hopes, and interests." He has blotted out from the firmament "all notions and hopes" which have hitherto lighted the path of humanity, and which as a fact, whether true or false, have made man to be what man is, and he stands in a universe ghastly as the lunar sphere, in which there is neither God nor spirit. Doctor Positivus assuring us that immortality, any notion of Deity, any recognition of the soul, or any conception of sin, repentance, and judgment to come, are consigned for ever to the limbo of vacuity, we run to the New York Post Office, Box No. 6,055, to discover what this very New World is peopled with and does consist of. At first the inquiry seemed rather superfluous; for the New York Positivists boast that the great end at which they have arrived is simply the Buddhist Nirwana, only "a Nirwana more complete and real." But there is a real distinction between the Buddhist and the Positivist absorption. It has been doubted whether the Buddhist Nirwana is absolute nihilism; at any rate the New York reformers, whether correctly or not, treat the Oriental absorption as passing into the infinite and eternal, while to themselves there is no infinite and no eternal; and with this Positivist, nihilism, if we understand it, which we have a shrewd suspicion that we do not, there is no anything except that everything which is nought, and that transcendental nought which is everything. But we shall be told that with the Positivist there is something, though we are by no means certain that "thing" is an orthodox word in the new Faith.

This thing is Force: Force is the sole reality. "The real secret of life and growth is the play of force, called Osmosis, i.e., filtration." This is the new Gospel; and we are thankful to get it in its most condensed and elementary form. All religious hopes and fears, human interests and duties, being got rid of, we stand face to face with the one solid incontrovertible truth, majestic in its simplicity and power—"Osmosis, i.e., filtration." We do not find from the dictionaries that Osmosis, if it is taken from ὀσμὴς, means filtration at all, but is simply a formation from ὠθέω, trudo, but the creator of a new word has a perfect right to make his own Greek. Osmosis then is the new Gospel; or rather everything is Osmosis. We are Osmosis. God, if there be a God, which there is not—man, only he is an aggregate of cells—the human will, but this is only a succession of cellular vibrations—all are Osmosis. This brave o'erhanging firmament, this majestical roof, fretted with golden fires—this piece of work noble in reason, infinite in faculties, in form and moving express and admirable, in action angelic, in apprehension godlike, this beauty of the ......, this paragon of animals, this quintessence and microcosm—this Man is only Osmosis. Immortality, the life that is to be, all hopes, all passions, all desires, fears, aspirations, all duty, all sensation, reflection, memory, and will, all that ever has been, is, and is to be, things material and spiritual, human and divine, are Osmosis. So all with one voice, about the space of two hours, cried, Great is Osmosis of the Positivists.

Archimedes could have moved the world had he been sure of his standpoint, as newspaper writers say, of his leverage; and the Positivists, as they are all for the religion of science, must accept this among other dynamical laws. Before we affirm or deny their power to upset the present Kosmos, we may make some inquiries about their leverage. Osmosis is their answer; but when we come to look into it, this Osmosis on their own showing—Osmosis, i.e., filtration—depends upon settling a point which is a moot point between Mr. Darwin and Mr. Herbert Spencer. Osmosis is not only a theory, but is a theory made to account for facts which, whether they exist or not, is a question upon which these distinguished physicists are at issue. Is it Pangenesis or Physiological Units? As to Pangenesis, if we remember rightly, Mr. Darwin suggested it, and tentatively, only as a new theory; while as to the doctrine of Physiological Units, we should be surprised to be told that Mr. Spencer's conclusions have been accepted by the scientific world. Neither Pangenesis nor Physiological Units, then, being proved, the New York Positivists base their doctrine of Osmosis—that is, settle the problem of life—upon principles of the existence of which even the authors of certain speculations on this subject have not satisfied themselves. And further, they do not get even so far as the alternative between Mr. Darwin and Mr. Spencer for the basis of their new faith; for these apostles, after accepting and doubting with the same breath the revelations which those whom they deem to be authorities are not clear about, propose a third hypothesis called Cellular Genesis for their doctrine of Osmosis, which must have been developed by the inner consciousness of Box No. 6,055.

As far as we can make it out, the theory of the Universe and all that it contains, and the secret of Being, according to Doctor Positivus, is this. There exists first a cell; then force. How the cell came to be a cell, or how force came to be, or what might be meant by the self-existence of force, or whether force is eternal, we are not told. Force acts on cell for ever and ever, if there is such a thing as ever and ever. Force is in constant circulation; force vibrating through cells produces life, emotions, feelings, growth, habit, affinities, and what you like. What used to be called the will, or the passions, or the soul, is only force playing more quickly or more slowly through the cells of the tissues; hence the variations in this play or vibration of force produce different results. What used to be called evil thoughts, said to proceed out of the heart—murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies, which defile a man—are only vibrations acting on the cellular tissue not so well, we suppose, as they ought to act. But whether well or ill ought scientifically to be predicated of any action of force on a cell, in this system in which "sin" has no place, may be questioned. On the other hand, what used to be called virtues are only another and more harmonious set of vibrations. The character of all human actions therefore is subordinate to the dynamical law of correlation; and Osmosis accounts for everything. But Osmosis, having no choice, can dictate no choice; and therefore, which is the practical matter, responsibility has no place in the new Church and World of the Future, which at present is confined to the aforesaid Box No. 6,055. It is, we fear, but or work, after explaining with such clearness as we could compass this Gospel of Osmosis, to point out that the New York Doctor Positivus does not hold out an encouraging view of the proposed working of his system. Rewards and punishments in the next world we have of course got rid of, because there is no next world; but as far as this world, regenerated under Osmosis, is concerned, and in the political conditions to which it is to be subjected, the only penalty which it is proposed to enforce in the filtrated Utopia is one for bringing into the world too many children. Property, capital, and political economy are at once to cease. "Every woman must have the privilege of bearing children; if no permanent relation can be formed, she may select one temporarily." The apostles of the religion of humanity have banished the Creator from His works; they have destroyed the filial relation between man and his Maker; they have deposed the ruler and judge of His world; they confound man with nature; they have, by abolishing a future life, made the present life not only not worth living, but a curse in itself. But we quite feel that in one respect these reformers have improved upon the "old subjective Bible and prevailing beliefs." They have imagined a hell worse than that of the theologians, and would turn the world into that hell.

CAPITALS.

WE pointed out not long ago, in an article on French and English Cities, how great was the difference in the historical position of the elder and greater cities in the two countries. We showed how small was the antiquity of most even of our oldest English towns as compared with the immemorial sites, first Gaulish, then Roman, occupied by the great cities of France. A good deal of what was then said might be applied, not only to Britain as opposed to Gaul, but to Northern Europe as opposed to Southern. Nowhere, however, is the comparison so close and striking as it is between Gaul and Britain. If we go further North or further South, the contrast becomes so wide that it in fact ceases to be a contrast. It is needless to compare the history of the cities of Greece, of Italy, or even of Spain, with those of Russia, Scandinavia, and Northern Germany. The difference, and the causes of the difference, are so obvious that they need not be dwelt on for a moment. The true comparison is between Gaul and Britain, because in the history of each of those countries we find a Celtic, a Roman, and a Teutonic element, and because the difference in the existing phenomena of the two countries is due to the wholly different relations in which the three elements stood to each other. But in the history of the capitals of the two countries we saw, among a good deal of difference, a certain resemblance. Paris, one of the old Celtic and Roman cities, gained, lost, and regained a degree of importance which, in the course of a thousand years, has gradually developed into what it now possesses. Nearly the same may be said of London, allowing for the great doubt whether London was ever, strictly speaking, a Celtic site at all. The main difference that we saw was this. The continuous importance of Paris is shared by a vast number of French cities, only Paris has gradually shot ahead of its fellows. But the continuous importance of London is shared with it by hardly any other city in England. Again, the greatness of London was mainly owing to the commercial importance which it has retained from the earliest days down to our own. It was the greatest merchant-city of England long before it became the dwelling-place of Kings. Paris, on the other hand, was raised into importance through being the seat of that house which in the end became the Royal house. But both alike were important military posts, points of special attack and defence in the days of Scandinavian invasion. On the whole, though the points of unlikeness in the history of London and Paris are great, the points of likeness are certainly greater. Both, as cities whose history goes back to the earliest known period in the history of the country, as cities whose position as capitals is older than that of any other cities north of the Alps, stand in marked contrast to the purely artificial capitals of so many modern kingdoms.

The absolute necessity for a recognised permanent capital is a point in which modern States make a certain approach to the condition of the ancient commonwealths as distinguished from the political condition of the intermediate ages. In both cases a single permanent seat of government is found to be essential. Both therefore so far resemble one another in opposition to those mediæval kingdoms in which it could hardly be said that there was any seat of government at all. An old Teutonic King, whether in Germany or in England, had no fixed dwelling-place. He was here, there, and everywhere, as caprice or convenience might dictate. Courts, Councils, National Assemblies, were held sometimes in one place, sometimes in another, sometimes in a great city, sometimes at some royal vill or hunting-seat. The King was King of the people; his royal office had not become strictly territorial; still less did the national life centre in a particular town. Many causes combined to impress this kind of wandering character on the old Teutonic royalty. First of all, the traces of the days of actual national wandering had not yet died out; the free spirit of the old German tribes still looked on a city as being in some sort a prison. In early times also it was often desirable to be constantly moving from one royal dwelling to another, in order to consume the produce of each royal estate upon the spot. This motive was not indeed peculiar to Kings; it extended to smaller lords spiritual and temporal; and no doubt, besides the economic reason, the love of hunting had also a good deal to do with the constant goings to and fro of the Kings and great men of those days. But with all these causes a worthier motive was joined, at all events in the case of those Kings who had any deep sense of their kingly duties. Of those duties in early times the most important was for the King to visit in person every part of his kingdom, and to see with his own eyes how everything went on, and especially how justice was administered to his subjects. The early Kings, therefore, were always moving, and their habit of constant movement produced no inconvenience. An Assembly, whether of the whole nation or of any particular class, could be held in one place as well as in another. It is the complicated machinery of our modern Parliaments and Courts of Justice, and the long sessions of each, which require them to be held in some certain place. An Assembly of a simpler kind, which came together and dispersed in a few days, could meet anywhere. And, long after the times of which we speak, Parliaments were freely held wherever the King thought good. And it was considered to be one of the great triumphs of the popular party when it was ordered that the Courts of Law should be held in some certain place, and should not follow the King wherever he went.

In the state of things then which prevailed in the old Teutonic kingdoms, a capital strictly so called, a permanent seat of government, could not exist. The nearest approach to it was perhaps the position of Aachen under Charles the Great. Men could then sing of > Urbs Aquensis, urbs regalis,

> Regni sedes principalis,
> Summa Regum curia.

But Aachen can hardly be said to have held that position either before or after the death of the great Emperor. It remained—till the slovenly practice of coronations at Frankfurt crept in—the royal crowning-place, but it did not remain the seat of government. Germany, in short, never had a capital, and it has none to this day, unless late events are held to have bestowed that rank upon Berlin. In France, Paris, an important military post, became the seat of an important military government, the home of a line of Dukes who gradually grew into Kings. In England a variety of combining causes gradually made London the undoubted capital. The custom which led Kings to keep the great festivals of the Church under the shadow of one of the great churches of their kingdom gradually led to the establishment of certain fixed places for the ordinary holding of National Assemblies. In the course of the eleventh century Winchester, Westminster, and Gloucester became fixed for this purpose, and Westminster soon distanced its two fellows. Nearly all the events of that century tended to increase the importance of London, and in the next century we may fairly give it the name of the capital of England.

London and Paris then may fairly rank as the oldest among the capitals of northern and central Europe. But the comparatively modern date of their position is shown by the fact that neither of them is an old metropolitan city. London has never held that rank since the English Conquest; Paris obtained it only in the seventeenth century. Still less claim to ecclesiastical honours belongs to those more modern capitals of other kingdoms which have become capitals in later times, and some of which were not even episcopal cities. Beside Upsala we have Stockholm; beside Trondhjem we have Bergen and Christiania; beside Lund and Roeskild we have Copenhagen. Gnesen and Cracow gave way to Warsaw; Kiev gave way to Moscow, and Moscow has given way to St. Petersburg, a capital founded on much the same principle as that on which Paris was chosen, as a frontier post important either for attack or for defence. Nowhere is the modern government fixed in the old ecclesiastical metropolis. Even in the earliest times, Aachen itself, as contrasted with Mainz, is an example of the same law.

The subordinate States, Duchies, Counties, and the like, had distinct capitals much sooner than the Kingdoms. In fact they had them from the beginning. The Duchy or County often consisted, in its origin at least, of a single city and its territory. There was no doubt about Rouen being the capital of Normandy, or about Angers being the capital of Anjou. This holds pretty generally throughout Gaul; in Germany the rule is modified by the tendency of the great cities, especially the episcopal cities, to become free commonwealths owning no superior but the Emperor.

South of the Alps, Spain follows the same law as the northern and central kingdoms. Madrid is a purely modern and artificial capital. Lisbon holds a higher place in history; but Lisbon is not the original ecclesiastical centre of the County and Kingdom of Portugal. In Italy the ancient cities have largely retained their position as capitals of the numerous separate States of the peninsula, and Italy alone has been called on in our own day to choose a capital for the whole kingdom from among the capitals of its several parts. In Greece a purely sentimental feeling has pitched on Athens, just as a purely sentimental feeling calls for the Old Rome as the head of Italy—a feeling quite distinct from the irresistible national impulse to make Rome and the Roman territory Italian. Meanwhile one city remains whose position no change has shaken. Among all changes of nation, language, and religion, under the Roman, the Frank, the Greek, and the Ottoman, the New Rome has uninterruptedly kept her place as the Imperial city of the East.

We said that the necessary choice of some city as the one seat of government is a point in which modern States resemble the ancient commonwealths more closely than they do the mediæval kingdoms. But there is a wide difference between the two cases. In an ancient commonwealth, and in a mediæval commonwealth too, the one city was not merely the head; it was everything. The whole life and being of the State centred in the one city. It assumed something like the position of a modern capital only when, by any process of conquest or absorption, it annexed, like Sparta, Athens, Rome, Carthage, Venice, and Bern, the territories of other cities or States. Such a city was, like the capital of a modern kingdom, the one permanent seat of government, but it differed from the capital of a modern kingdom in one most important respect. It was more than the seat of government for the whole territory; it was actually the mistress of the whole territory. Its citizens were a ruling class, holding special rights above the inhabitants of the rest of the territory. But the citizens of a modern capital, whatever airs they may choose to give themselves, hold no legal advantage over their fellow-subjects elsewhere. There must be some one permanent seat of government; such or such a city is chosen by caprice or convenience to be that one permanent seat of government; and that is all. The extraordinary influence which Paris has had for a long time back in French history arises from various causes, but not from any legal privileges enjoyed by Parisians above other Frenchmen. A Parisian riot is accepted as a French Revolution; but it is not so in all countries. The movement which drove Otho from Greece did not begin in Athens, and the movement which drove Isabella from Spain did not begin in Madrid. In England we trust to be spared revolutions altogether, but we feel sure that London, as London, could never dictate to England. If it did so it would not be as London, but as the epitome of the whole kingdom, containing representatives of every part of the kingdom and of every class in it. London has before now chosen Kings for England, but it has been London acting as the prerogative tribe of England. The ascendency of Paris is something of a different kind, something in no way inherent in the mere position of the city as the capital in the modern sense.

THE PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE AND THE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL.

A RECENT Anglican writer of considerable theological reputation, who has made the Greek Church his speciality, observes that the Pope is making the mistake of "confounding a Topical Council with an Œcumenical one," in his programme for the Synod to be held at Rome next December. Mr. G. Williams means that the Council will represent the West only, and not the Universal Church. Now this was certainly not the intention of those who originally projected it. Mgr. Dupanloup, and the other French Bishops who joined with him in first urging the scheme on Pius IX., really desired, as is abundantly clear from his recent pastoral, such a congress as might be in some real sense a representative assembly of Christendom. They were anxious that the authorities of the Greek Church, and of the principal "Protestant and non-Catholic" bodies—as the Pope has since termed them—especially of the Church of England, should be present. Nor was there anything in the traditions of the Roman Church herself to interfere with the carrying out of this idea. On the contrary, all the precedents were in favour of it. The Greeks were summoned to the Council of Florence, and summoned, not as inferiors, but as equals. The Council was convoked by letters from the Patriarch of Constantinople as well as from the Pope, and the Patriarch's letter was read in the Council before the Pope's. The Anglican Bishops and representatives from the German Protestant communities were summoned to the Council of Trent, not to be judged, but to be heard. And, apart from all questions of ecclesiastical precedent, it is obvious on the face of it that no other policy could have the slightest chance of promoting that restored unity which the Roman authorities profess earnestly to desire. Nevertheless it is clear that, so far as the present intention of those authorities goes, the Council will be only a "Topical" one. The Jesuit Camarilla who just now pull the wires at the Vatican were not strong enough to overrule the proposal of the Council altogether, but they have done their utmost, and hitherto with every prospect of success, to frustrate the objects of those from whom the proposal emanated. Invitations have indeed been sent to the Greek Bishops, and a sort of circular—which is not an invitation at all, though it has been the fashion to call it so—has been addressed to "Protestants and other non-Catholics," exhorting them to instant and absolute submission to the existing claims of the Papacy. But a cursory glance at these documents will suffice to show, without a shadow of doubt, that neither of them was meant to be taken seriously. The Pope, indeed, may have been led to think that he was giving effect to the desire of his "paternal heart," the sincerity of which nobody questions, for the reunion of all Christians in one fold; but those who guided his pen knew well enough that they had taken the surest means of keeping away from the projected Council all but those on whose subserviency they reckoned, and whom alone they wished to see there. We referred on a former occasion to the deliberate insult conveyed to the Eastern Patriarchs in the very form of the missive addressed to them. The lofty admonition to the Protestants was still more dictatorial, not to say contemptuous, in its tone. They were not even invited to come to the Council, unless as suppliants and learners; they were simply bidden to hear, to tremble, and to obey. And the response evoked was in either case what might have been expected, and what evidently was desired. The Greeks have sent a formal refusal, and the Protestants, who were not officially addressed, have made no official reply, and have only here and there uttered a few unofficial sneers. So far the ground is left free for Ultramontane intrigues, and it will be no fault of the many "Congregations" already hard at work at Rome in preparing the subjects for discussion if the Council of 1869 does not dutifully register whatever decrees the Vatican may please to lay before it, and clench the merit of its self-denying ordinances by a solemn assertion of Papal infallibility which will supersede the necessity of holding any Councils in the future. Dr. Manning has informed the world that, whatever tempests this proceeding may raise for the moment, it will be certainly followed by "a great calm." And we are inclined to agree with him. If the machinations of his party are crowned with success, it is very probable that for some time there will be a dead calm. But it will be the stillness of stagnation, the lethargy of a living death. Solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant.

It is only within the last few days that an authorized report has appeared in the English newspapers of the interview between the Patriarch of Constantinople and the Papal emissaries on October 5. It is taken from "the official account of the Protosyncellium," and translated from the Eastern Star. The report entirely confirms the substantial accuracy of what had been previously stated, but it is fuller and more exact. And it is not a little remarkable how entirely the Greeks have throughout the better of the argument, or rather the whole of it. The four Latin priests made no attempt to answer the weighty considerations laid before them by the Patriarch, except in one instance, by observing—what no one had denied—that it was not enough to pray for a restoration of unity while other means of attaining the end were neglected. It is to the credit of both parties that the interview appears to have been conducted with mutual courtesy and respect. And, as it is the only approach to official intercourse between the authorities of the divided Churches that has taken place for four centuries, it may be interesting to our readers to give a brief narrative of the proceedings. The reception of the Papal envoys was appointed to take place between nine and ten on Saturday, October 5. And it opened thus:—

About ten o'clock on Saturday Dom Testas arrived, accompanied by three other priests, of whom one spoke Greek a little; all, however, spoke French. After interchange of salutations at the Protosyncellium, they were conducted by the Protosyncellus to his Holiness. Having entered the presence of his Holiness and kissed his hands, they took their seats at the kindly invitation of the Patriarch, who embraced them. While his Holiness was proceeding with the customary expressions of kindness and goodwill, they all rose, and Dom Testas took from his bosom a letter, tied with gold cord, and in a purple cover, and handed it to the Patriarch, while the priest next to him said in Greek, "In the absence of Brunoni we come to invite your Holiness to the Œcumenical Council to be held at Rome in the next year, on the 8th of December, and therefore we call on you to accept this present written summons."

His Holiness then motioned to the envoys to lay the gold-fastened letter on the desk, and proceeded to address them "in an earnest tone indicative of paternal love and kindness." He began by observing that the Roman newspapers had already published the contents of the letter now presented to him (another breach of courtesy surely), which was of such a nature as to make it impossible for him to receive a document based on "principles utterly abhorrent from those of the Orthodox Eastern Church; antagonistic to the spirit of the Gospels and to the teaching of the Œcumenical Councils and of the Holy Fathers"; as had also been the Encyclical issued by the Pope in 1848. The answer to that Encyclical had displeased His Holiness, and the Greek Patriarchs had no wish to reopen old wounds by any fresh reply, nor did they think there was any room for mutual understanding or discussion in Council without some common basis of principles acknowledged on both sides. But they considered—speaking herein the mind of the foremost German Roman Catholic divines of the day—"that the most successful and least irritating method of solving such questions is the historical method." All alike should recur to the doctrines held in common ten centuries ago by East and West, from which Rome had latterly departed. Here Dom Testas interposed by asking to what novel opinions His Holiness referred? The Patriarch, in reply, enumerated the following, which contain the essence of the Ultramontane theory:—

To omit details, we cannot (so long as the Church of the Saviour is on the earth) admit—1, that there is in the Universal Church of Christ any bishop, supreme ruler, and head other than the Lord; 2, that there is any patriarch infallible and unerring, speaking ex cathedrâ, and above Œcumenical Councils, in which latter is infallibility when they are in accordance with Scripture and Apostolic tradition; 3, that the Apostles were unequal (in contempt of the Holy Ghost, who enlightened them all equally); or 4, that this or that Patriarch or Pope had pre-eminence of seat, not by human and synodical arrangement, but (as ye assert) by Divine right; and other similar points.

On this one of the Latin priests was indiscreet enough to object that the Council of Florence had settled these points. The Patriarch answered, justly enough, that "such an assembly is not even worthy of the sacred name of Council—an assemblage collected on political grounds, on grounds of purely worldly interest, and which ended in a decision imposed for a time on some few of our Church by dint of starvation, and every kind of violence and threat, by him who was then Pope." We need not travel beyond the pages of a candid but Roman Catholic historian, in Ffoulkes's Christendom's Divisions, to see how abundantly this description of the Council is justified by facts. The Patriarch might have added that even the Florentine decree, extorted as it notoriously was by force and fraud, is so little equal to the exigencies of the Ultramontane position that scarcely a single Roman divine can quote without garbling and mistranslating it, to a conspicuous example of which device in this country we called attention not very long ago. His Holiness added that, if the Pope desired to convoke a really Œcumenical Council, he ought to have written separately to consult each of the Eastern Patriarchs first, and not have sought to impose it on them dictatorially, as though he was lord and master of all. He concluded in these words:—

This being so, either do ye, too, recur to history and the General Councils in order that on historical grounds may be restored the much-longed-for true and Christian unity, or we will again content ourselves with continued prayers and supplications for the peace of the whole world, the security of the Churches of God, and the union of all Christendom; but under such circumstances, we assure you with sorrow that we consider the convening of the Council vain and fruitless, and also this document which ye have brought.

One of the Latin priests suggested that, if a man is sick, we provide remedies and physicians for him, besides praying for his recovery. The Patriarch replied that Christ the Lord, who founded His Church, alone knew who was sick, how grievous was the sickness, and what was the proper remedy, and repeated that there was "great need of fervent and unceasing prayer to our Lord, who is Love itself, that He will inspire all with love to God, and all that leads to salvation." On this the Protosyncellus was directed to return the Papal letter to the bearers, who received a kind farewell from His Holiness, and took their leave.

If this report may be relied upon—and we know no reason for doubting it—nothing could be more dignified than the conduct of the Patriarch throughout. Nor would the Papal envoys have found it easy to answer his arguments. That they had been ordered to abstain from discussion is exceedingly probable, but in that case the discretion of declining so equivocal an invitation is only rendered the more obvious. One of them indeed said—and it was the only comment made on the Patriarch's statement of the differences between the Churches quoted above—"It is not proposed that Rome should change her principles." Be it so. But a dispute in which one side declares itself to be so wholly in the right that it will not even suffer a question to be raised as to any modification of its claims, is not very likely to be arranged. And the only arrangement contemplated by those who inspired the imperious missive to the Eastern Bishops is one to which, like the Irishman's courtship, "they have their own consent," and will have long to wait before they get anybody else's.

CHRISTMAS MERRIMENT.

THE philanthropist must feel a load lifted from his mind as he sees each successive Christmas season dismissed to the limbo of the past. Suffering never seems so ghastly as when it wears the mask of enjoyment, and at Christmas time—to judge by the wry faces of the merrymakers—the bitter dregs at the bottom of the cup of pleasure are pretty well shaken up through the draught. Police cases are common enough any morning of the year, but it is at Christmas that sensitive consciences can glide or plunge into excess in a spirit of poetry, consecrate their dissipation in memoriam of the hallowed reminiscences of their childhood, and celebrate the sacred festival appropriately with a variety of aggravated assaults. We must confess that our holidays for the people are far from being among the most creditable of our national institutions, and when they come in the short dark days of winter, they are especially apt to throw out our national weaknesses in gloomy relief. No hymn can possibly be more suitable to the Christmas season than that about Satan and idle hands. We are blessed with nothing of the happy, careless temperament of the lotus-eater, that can dismiss the soul to float in a mirage of the senses, while the inanimate body remains behind in the passive enjoyment of doing nothing with all its might. The primeval curse, falling heavier in this island than elsewhere, seems to condemn us to earn our very pleasures by the sweat of our brow. It is our climate, perhaps, which is chiefly responsible for our tastes and habits, and is at the bottom of our intensely national method of merrymaking. Nature has tempered our dispositions to our cheerless atmosphere, just as she thickens the coats of animals transported from the south to the north, while she thins wool into hair when the wearers are transferred from the north towards the tropics. It is morally impossible to be bright in a December fog, and physically so to lounge away life in a bitter wind or a biting frost. We are driven to take our pleasures sadly or violently, while, from the impulse of our usual active habits, the battle of life—too often literally—is carried from our working days into our holidays. The most quiet-going of our pleasure-seekers would decline free admission to any entertainment that does not begin with a struggle and end with a crush. Fancy an Italian or a Spaniard sentenced to work out his day's amusement in our English way. Leicester Square, strangely out of harmony with its surroundings as it always seems, is never so much so as when all London round it is toiling at making holiday. And figure the reverse of the picture—an Englishman attempting to enjoy himself in southern fashion in the weather we have been having lately. Nature would nip any such effort in the bud. It is all very well for the half-million inhabitants of sunny Naples to pass such a Christmas as the Times Correspondent paints—indifferent to stimulants, lounging out and in the dolce shops when they have money, clustering like flies outside the windows when they have not, and cloying at least one sense as they gaze on the treasures of sugar within. They and their congeners in southern cities may sleep crowded away anyhow in stifling quarters, but they troop forth from their foul dens in the morning to find themselves, save in very exceptional weather, in something like the Tropical Department of the Crystal Palace, infinitely brightened and indefinitely magnified, although perhaps a little more draughty. And in the background, to gratify any unconscious appreciation of the beautiful which they may have by chance, clear bold mountain outlines replace the fog-wrapped heights of Kent, and the dim forms of the Knockholt beeches; and the whole landscape lights up with changing tints, and blazes in colours to which the azulejos of the Alhambra Court are dull. Then, in the South, the people have such an infinity of Sundays and saints' days that they accept their idleness passively as a matter of every-day recurrence, and learn perforce to idle their time away in an inexpensive fashion. An Englishman in constant employment finds, on the other hand, that the holidays of the longest working life shrink up into a few weeks, for his Sundays don't count, as then he finds every place of public entertainment sealed to him, while the arbitrary restrictions imposed on the public-houses put him out of his natural way, and prevent his falling back on his natural resource. If he is a man of a single idea, amusing himself from hand to mouth, he begins early to improve each dull hour of his holiday, or more probably he anticipates its doubtful pleasures the evening before, by plunging within the hospitable doors of the nearest gin-palace. If he is of a more thoughtful cast of mind, a solemn sense of responsibility as to its right disposal heralds the advent of the long-looked-for day, and anxiety embitters all his foretastes of pleasure. The problem that weighs on his mind is how to get the greatest quantity of enjoyment at the cheapest rate out of a very limited time.

At Christmas its solution in a satisfactory sense becomes especially difficult, and the probable chances of the weather, and the certain brevity of the days, lamentably circumscribe his field of choice. Sanguine enthusiasts who build their plans on the hopes of a fine day, find, generally speaking, that they have raised the frail fabric on a foundation of shifting mud and sloppy pavement, and in an atmosphere of driving rain and storm; while the wiser, taught by experience, make up their minds against disappointment by assuming the worst. Few of them venture to stray off to the country in quest of their amusement, and the few who do, find their day one long repentance. Turning in disgust from the naked shivering forms of nature, they seek consolation in some sequestered public-house, that welcomes the soaked and disenchanted pilgrims. Wretched as they are, they have in some points the advantage of those who stay behind them in town, and who ultimately reach the same goal as they—intoxication or semi-intoxication—by perhaps a longer road. At least they have had change of air and scene, while the others turn out into a familiar town stripped of its everyday attractions, and solemnly wearing its Sunday garb of forbidding decorum. A holiday for the masses means an eclipse of the shop-windows and their contents; and these are all that commonly brightens the thoroughfare insensibly even to the most abstracted passers by. You might as well send a tourist in search of the picturesque to go into raptures over the sides of a railway cutting, as expect a cockney to feel lively between a double row of barred shutters and bolted doors. Accordingly, with the exception of children, who are happy in the simple fact of its being a holiday, and couples keeping company who have only eyes for themselves, the general aspect of the crowds is that of people trying to bear up cheerfully against a weight of wretchedness. They feel that they have a long day before them to be killed, with none of their habitual resources to kill it with. There is nothing to be done before dinner-time, and nothing after that, until they take their places in the queue that stretches over the dripping pavement from the theatre doors. Moreover Christmas entertainments are contemporaneous with Christmas bills, and most people who have any ready money to spend may be assumed to have also a certain amount of credit that they have abused, and now the day of reckoning is at hand. Then Christmas is proverbially the time for joviality; the eloquent example of social superiors, the genial enthusiasm of purveyors of Christmas literature, all incite to revelry, and everything combines to suggest a drinking bout as the obvious way of filling up an interlude, and the common bond that unites us all in a brotherhood of love and charity. After all, the old Scandinavian Valhalla, with its riot and drinking and fighting, is likely always, in spite of the spread of civilization and religion, to find place in one shape or other in our popular conceptions of Paradise.

In common justice to our countrymen, we have tried to extenuate the undoubted national weakness for drinking and brawling, as being vices of our situation and climate, and so due in great measure to circumstances which we are powerless to control. But when we have said everything that can be said, it is extenuation, not excuse, and we must be content to share among us the disgrace of our Christmas scandals. Authority is far too lenient, while public opinion rather encourages than deprecates the madness of the carnival. What is called pleasure by the many is pain and grief to a good many more, and death to not a few. Night after night while the so-called festivities are at their height, bands of vulgar drunkards, undisturbed by the police, make night hideous everywhere with their horrible Christmas carols—coarse comic songs from the répertoires of the music halls, howled out of all time and tune, backwards or forwards as fancy may suggest, like the devil's vespers. The more impetuous have anticipated the general beginning of the carnival by a couple of nights or so, and, having prematurely run out of means or brain, are consigned for the great day of the feast to the cold oblivion of the police cell. Unluckily that happy riddance does not materially affect the discomfort of the more peaceable public, for if some have broken down at the prologue, there are plenty of choice spirits left to play the revels to an end as loyal subjects of the lord of misrule. If authority does not absolutely abdicate during the saturnalia, yet it humours for the time the innocent foibles of the people, and the police, when their services are needed most, are ordered to confine their duties to those of an army of observation. Like the sergents de ville at a ball at the Mabille or Vallentino, they interfere only in the event of extreme license or aggravated violence. Notwithstanding their chivalrous forbearance, each morning during the holidays produces at the police offices its batch of sodden ghastly faces and trembling dingy forms, charged as drunk, quarrelsome, or incapable, who are let loose with an impressive caution, that they'd better not be so again. The dead picked up while the saturnalia are running their course are out of all proportion to the prisoners. This year, one coroner has sat in a single day upon twelve inquests, "most of the deaths being the result of holiday excesses." And before that he had sat upon six infants, picked up dead in the streets on Boxing-day. Meanwhile his brother coroners were nearly as hard at work in similar cases, and we hear of several little social parties that terminated in murder. Pretty well for the special season of peace and good-will. We pride ourselves on being an earnest people, who like to work while we work, and play while we play, but surely we need not go about our pleasuring in such grim earnest as this. Drunkenness and dissipation are quietly disposing of their victims all the year round, but it is on our yearly winter holiday that they have their grand field-day. And one of their best allies is that sickly sentimentalism, the cant of a morbid effort at joviality, at which sensible men shrug their shoulders, but which is still preached and prosed about ad nauseam Christmas after Christmas. Not that we would wish to see Christmas pass unobserved; but there is a mean in all things, and there is an extravagant anachronism in insisting on our playing bacchanalians, wreathing ourselves with holly, and getting astride upon wine casks with the spigots out, on this particular day of the year. There can be no earthly reason why all ranks should not make a Christian anniversary an occasion for a pleasant gathering, and there can be no more appropriate day than one in midwinter for sharing the luxuries of life with one's less lucky neighbours. But that is quite a different thing from deliberately poisoning the moral atmosphere at the end of each December, until we get it into a condition which experience tells us is fruitful of follies and crimes. Drunkenness does not happen to be the special temptation of the upper classes, but their tone and example works downwards, and every one, because Christmas comes but once a year, strives according to his lights and means to realize his own ideal of reckless joviality. This year we have brought our deadly merriment into happy keeping with the scenes reported everywhere from the country and the coasts. The gale that shook our windows as we sipped our claret was breaking up crank old colliers by the dozen, and sinking North Sea steamers heavily hampered with their deck loads. Morning after morning brings its tale of wrecks and disasters at sea, floods, and destruction of property. Churches fall in on their congregations, stacks of chimneys tumble across the crowded street. There are explosions in coal mines and collisions on railways. The poor in the East are suffering intensely, and starvation is more rife than it generally is even at this festive season; and every day, one or two of the many who have been dying off of inanition have been detected, and reported upon after the fact by the coroner. Revelry under such circumstances may suggest to some minds the orgies held during the plague of Florence; but we may congratulate ourselves on an exciting and, we hope, a merry Christmas.

A WOMAN'S RIGHT ORGANS.

A WEEKLY newspaper called the Revolution has been started at New York as the organ of Woman's Rights and a recent number contains a discussion between Mr. "Brick" Pomeroy, who is the editor of some other newspaper, and the editor of the Revolution, which supplies curious information as to what American women are, and what it is thought they ought to be. Mr. Pomeroy complains of the frivolity and extravagance of the women of New York, and the editor answers that the men make them what they are. It may not perhaps be safe to judge of New York by London, but certainly, among ourselves, men like women not so much for the fashions they adopt as in spite of them. Husbands submit themselves to the immutable decree which ordains that their wives should wear hair of two different colours, and neither of them natural. The fashion of Guinevere is obsolete, and if her character finds any imitators, the modern Arthur must be understood to apply the words "my pride in happier summers" to the thing called a chignon. It is a pity that this discussion in the Revolution was not held some weeks before, because the editor, taking upon herself to speak on behalf of her sex, declares in effect that if women had votes they would leave off chignons; and we think that the argument thus suggested, if it had been urged, as it might have been, with all the eloquence of the Solicitor-General, would have prevailed with our Court of Common Pleas, and thus a judgment which the Revolution laments might never have been delivered. In every enlightened country the law adapts itself to the convenience of society; and if our Judges had been told that chignons would be exchanged for votes, the suffrages of the ladies might, at the next election, restore Mr. Gladstone to his seat for South-west Lancashire. "Give women something better to do and to think about, and they will abandon the Grecian bend and the Italian wriggle." Thus writes the editor in answer to Mr. Pomeroy, upon whom she turns the tables with an adroitness which, if it would not make her very angry, we would call feminine. Mr. Pomeroy complains that he sees daughters of bankrupt merchants parading Broadway "as if doubled up by a six-pound shot in the stomach, as they labour along under the excruciating delights of the Italian wriggle or the Grecian bend." The editor retorts, that, if it is made the business of women's lives to attract men, this can only be done by a succession of new modes and manners. Mr. Pomeroy, adopting a freedom which we can hardly bring ourselves to imitate, addresses that august personage, the editor of the Revolution, as "Susan." He laments that the money which might make home attractive should be squandered upon steel-corsets, patent calves, gum-elastic suspenders, corkscrew ringlets, horse-tail frizzes, twenty-seven dollar hats, sixteen dollar gaiters, three-storey bustles, &c. "If you will try to make the women sensible, Susan, I will try to do what I can for the men." Let the Grecian bend be taken off the girls, and common sense be put in the place of that foreign article, and then Mr. Pomeroy will undertake to diminish the revenue arising from distilled spirits. If the women will cultivate household graces and virtues, the men may be brought to practise temperance and frugality. The editor repels this proposal for compromise with indignant scorn. "Women, their rights, and nothing less," is the motto of her paper. She demands to have "the man and woman idea" blended everywhere together. Thus far has prevailed a dynasty of force, which is the male element; hence war, violence, discord, debauchery. From this evil state redemption can only be obtained by the recognition and restoration of the love element, which is woman; for so long as woman is under man's heel all things are inverted; but when she is exalted, and made to feel her dignity and responsibility as mother and educator of the race, then will those follies and vices of which thinking men complain be swallowed up in the majesty of the higher position. "The present type of woman is formed wholly in the man idea," and you can make women wise only by changing the conditions of their lives. Sensible women, here and there, all through the generations, have protested against the condition of toy or drudge, and have fought their way, inch by inch, toward social and political equality.

Mr. Pomeroy's letter deals rather freely in what is called "chaff," but the paper in which it appears is written in a terribly earnest spirit. We need scarcely say that the Susan whom he addresses is not the "pretty Seeusan" of a popular burlesque. She desires to discuss with Mr. Pomeroy the grave problems of political and social life. If there be in the range of poetry any character with whom she might be compared, it must be that adventurous girl in trowsers, of whose maritime exploits we read that,

> When the captain came to hear on't,
> He very much approved of what she had done,
> And he quickly made her first lieutenant
> Of the gallant Thunder Bomb.

The only difference is, that Susan would insist upon being made captain on the spot, and would recommend the captain whom she had superseded to take a basin of gruel, and go to bed. This editor, who is as cheerful as Cassandra, sees the ship of the American State on a stormy sea, rapidly drifting towards the same dangerous shore where all the nations of the past have foundered and gone down. She sees men at the helm drunk with rum, selfishness, and ambition, and there is no law, no order, no discipline on board. Is it wonderful, then, she asks, that, in an hour like this, true women, with brave hearts, clear heads, and sturdy hands, should try to seize the helm, and change the dangerous course? It may surprise English readers to be told that the United States are going to the bad at this alarming pace. Mr. Pomeroy is not an optimist. He indicates faults in the social condition of his country which he thinks may be corrected by playful satire, but Susan breaks in upon his epistolary gambols with a shriek of alas! alas! woe! woe! and drowns his feeble protest against the Grecian bend and the Italian wriggle by calling upon her countrywomen to save the Republic from imminent disaster. We are bidden, says she, to improve our homes; but what is a home without a country? The rebellion has been with great difficulty put down; the negroes have been liberated, and the ordinary American politician of the male sex thinks that the time has come to rest and be thankful, after grievous toils and unhoped-for triumphs. It was thus that Agamemnon returned from the siege of Troy, and called for a boot-jack and his slippers, and was proceeding to make himself comfortable in his house, when the Trojan prophetess proclaimed that she saw under that roof a human shambles and a blood-stained floor. Has America reached the basis of true government? If we ventured to hint a doubt upon this point, we should be denounced for our inordinate jealousy of republican institutions. But Susan tells us that that basis is still to seek. As God lives and "humans" are inspired it shall be reached. "America shall be free." The negroes are to have votes, and the Indians are to have votes, and the Chinamen who come to California and underbid native Americans in the labour-market are to have votes, and all the women, white, black, red, and various, are to have votes; and then, at last, America will be free, and will present to the nations of the Old World that spectacle of liberty, order, and enlightened progress which some of her ignorant male politicians suppose she has been presenting for at least half a century.

It would be highly impertinent to suggest that these ladies are not so miserable as they suppose. A Correspondent of the Revolution thinks that if the pursuit of happiness were the real object of existence, the women of civilized Christian countries might look with envy upon their sisters of China or Turkey, who feel no aspiration for anything beyond their abject, degraded life. "The cultivation and development which women are grudgingly permitted to acquire are but the little ray of light which reveals to the captive the unknown horrors of the cell." There are a few exceptionally happy women who unite with men to ridicule and oppose the efforts of the oppressed and wretched multitude of their sex. "Happiness, considered as a delight in existence, physical or mental enjoyment, is a passion which few women beyond the age of childhood retain or acquire." It is admitted, indeed, that a woman happily married is most happy; but then such marriages are rare, and another grievance is that divorce cannot, at least in some of the States, be obtained as easily as it ought. Thus, to make marriage, or to unmake it, is alike difficult, and woman is in both ways wronged. But the chief and crown of all her sorrows is that the disability for political action under which she labours is beyond her power to remove. "The only real objection in her case is insurmountable by any effort she can possibly put forth." We know that there is a time when a bonnet is not a bonnet, but a woman cannot cease to be a woman, and neither gods nor "humans" can change her sex. As Susan oddly puts it, "sex was never man's obstruction, else he also could never have been a voter." The idea of man separated from the idea of sex is rather difficult to grasp, unless the mind has been prepared by regular perusal from week to week of the Revolution. Another grievance, which we are happy to observe is not irremediable, is that in the service of the Church of England the congregation are addressed as "dearly beloved brethren." The editor considers that this usage descends from an age when it was assumed that women had no souls. We find a correspondent suggesting that a negro who ventured to assert his superiority to white women ought to have been thrown by the editor over a grave-yard fence. "She might have had any amount of help." But the editor thinks that the negro would have been too strong for her. It is refreshing, after many pages devoted to "the faith, the divinity, the poetry, the [illegible] and sentiments of life," to find a lady proposing to another lady that she should fling a man over a fence, because "he expressed himself unwilling for women to vote." If the negro had been told that the dynasty of force had been overthrown, and that he was invited to assist in the recognition and restoration of the love element, he might perhaps have been slightly puzzled, and we may conjecture that he would have expressed his thoughts nearly in the lines:—

> It may have been right to dissemble your love,
> But why did you kick me down stairs?

Indeed, after the treatment which the negro has undergone from his professed friends, we should expect that if anybody began to talk about loving him, he would run away and hide himself without delay.

We shall await the appearance of future numbers of the Revolution with an anxious hope that its editor and contributors will be able to keep down their spirits, and maintain an unfailing supply of lamentation, mourning, and woe. We most heartily wish these ladies a miserable New Year, and, if we had known them a week sooner, we should have wished them a wretched Christmas. May they, like Lady Constance, be able to defy all counsel, all redress. May they, like Antigone, call heaven to witness what deeds they suffer, and at what men's hands. May they bewail their virginity upon the mountains, and their marriages in the valleys. May they continue to suffer and endure, but not with tears; for the weakness of weeping is, we find, forbidden to them, as to the Oneida chief of whom we have all heard. May they realise the agony of disappointment, and at the same time remember the advice of one of their leaders, who "has never found that crying helped it any."

THE THEATRES.

THERE was a time, and that within the memory even of young men, when the theatrical year of London as regularly commenced on St. Stephen's Day as the ecclesiastical year on Advent Sunday. The appearance of Christmas pieces in every direction on a single night marked the commencement of a new period, and playgoers were at once forced to think of nothing but the pantomimes, while an impassable gulf seemed to separate all that had gone before from all that was to come. He who talked on the 1st of January of the theatrical events of the 20th of the preceding December would have been as close an approximation to an old almanac as it is possible for a human being to become.

This sharp chronology has come to an end. Christmas, so far as the principal theatres are concerned, is simply a festival which some managers observe and some do not, and we might venture to say that the houses where the great holiday is most carelessly regarded are precisely those which afford the best index of the state of the drama as a possible branch of literature. Having paid our tribute to the season by stating that Boxing-day has been honoured at Drury Lane, Covent Garden, and the Lyceum with a pantomime, and at two or three of the other theatres with a new extravaganza, adding the fact that the rage for harlequinade is as prevalent as ever in the suburbs, we may safely take our stand at the beginning of January, and survey the condition of theatrical affairs during the concluding months of the past year.

In the first place, it may be remarked that the poetical drama is at present in a state of abeyance, the termination of which is not to be foreseen. Managers have ceased to regard the plays of Shakspeare as convenient vehicles for costly decoration, and there are no actors who, for any length of time, can render even the most favourite tragedies attractive to the great body of the public. During the earlier period of Mr. F. B. Chatterton's management of Drury Lane, an attempt was made to enhance the prestige of the old theatre by reviving the dramas by which its old fame had been acquired, and at the commencement of winter we were pretty sure of a certain amount of "legitimate" entertainment, and perhaps of a "revival" in the sense of the word employed by Mr. Charles Kean, though by no means on Mr. Charles Kean's scale of magnificence. The temporary return of Miss Helen Faucit to the stage gave a special impulse to the poetical tendency of Drury Lane, and for a while enthusiasts might flatter themselves that one of the old national temples of the drama would rise to an eminence even higher than it had reached in the days of yore; its old rival, Covent Garden, being too hopelessly Italianized over again to become a serious competitor. But since the retirement of the great actress "Old Drury" has grown cool to the legitimate cause, and the principle being firmly established that the Christmas pantomime is the main source of revenue, the manager during the earlier months of his season seeks to fight his "sensational" neighbours with their own weapons, having an advantage in the magnitude of his theatre and the excellence of his painter, Mr. W. Beverley. And this year the battle has been fought with some credit to Mr. Chatterton. Mr. Andrew Halliday's version of Sir W. Scott's Fortunes of Nigel, entitled King o' Scots, though the author has taken great liberties with his subject, and has had recourse even to farcical expedients for the sake of applause, is not to be classed for a moment with those revelations of an imaginary London Bohemia which owe their success to mechanical appliances. King Jamie was at all events a good historical character, exactly fitted to the peculiarities of Mr. Phelps, who also gave a refined portraiture of miserly old age by doing double duty, and playing the [illegible] hat of the canny [illegible] ded real intellectual enjoyment; and though in the construction of the play the introduction of Mr. Beverley's scenery was a leading motive, the scenery itself was historically instructive. Alsatians were perhaps not more reputable than the Arabs, as they are called, of modern London; but, by mere remoteness of time, something like ideality is produced.

The revival of the poetical drama is not, then, at present on the cards. Mr. Bandmann, the German actor at the Lyceum, has not followed up the success of his performance in the exceptional character of Narcisse with a striking delineation of any other character, nor was he able to give prolonged vitality to Lord Lytton's Rightful Heir. Miss Bateman, indeed, concluded an engagement at the Haymarket by playing the principal female character in a blank-verse tragedy called Pietra, adapted from the German of M. Mosenthal, the author of Deborah, otherwise Leah; but though the actress displayed in it all those qualities which have found favour in two hemispheres, it was found that a piece written in the tragic form had about it an old-fashioned look and was unsuited to the day. Miss Bateman gains a new character, which is that of a somewhat rugged Juliet, to vary her provincial repertory, but the poetical creation of M. Mosenthal has done little to change the theatrical aspect of London.

But if the old dramatic forms have ceased to be popular, theatrical art appears on the whole in a condition somewhat more hopeful than that on which we animadverted in the autumn. A period then seemed to be at hand when there would be no further need of literary or histrionic talent, and the perfection of stage management would bring with it the destruction of the stage. The only chance of safety for dramatic art seemed then to lie in a reaction; and a reaction, unless we are greatly mistaken, has begun. For three whole months not a single piece has been brought out in which the attempt has been made to attract the public by a mere copy of the details of actual life, although several novelties have been produced within that period, and two new theatres have been opened in the very heart of London—the Globe and the Gaiety. A species of drama which may as fairly be called comedy as any production of the modern French stage, and which first struck root in the Prince of Wales's Theatre, is now spreading in various directions, and it is to this that the new adventurers in the field of theatrical enterprise are evidently directing their attention. The characteristics of the species are a choice of the present day as the proper time of action, but this choice is made, not with a view to the mimic reproduction of cabs and railways, but is accompanied by an attempt to place characters on the stage that cannot be represented without a certain amount of histrionic talent, and thus to exhibit human instead of inanimate realities. These characters, too, talk dialogue which is of some value on its own account, instead of merely serving as an explanation of effects addressed to the eye, and which consequently demands something like wit and humour on the part of the author—something that is technically expressed by the word "writing." Another virtue of the species is its hostility to that star-system which has so long been adverse to the construction of pieces on a broad basis. All the comedies written for the Prince of Wales's Theatre by Mr. T. W. Robertson, who may fairly be regarded not only as the head but as the founder of the school, require equal acting by a large number of performers; and the same may be said of the recent pieces by Mr. H. J. Byron, who is Mr. Robertson's chief disciple, and who now reveals a talent for comedy which was concealed while he was satisfied to distinguish himself as the smartest writer of burlesques.

We may illustrate our remarks by passing in review several London theatres. The last novelty at the Prince of Wales's was a comedy by Mr. E. Yates, entitled Tame Cats, which, albeit a failure on account of its defective construction, was at any rate an exhibition of character, carefully delineated. At the Globe, the new theatre in Newcastle Street, Strand, there is a comedy by Mr. Byron, called Cyril's Success. The vicissitudes incident to a dramatic author's career are treated in somewhat melodramatic fashion, a domestic interest being raised by a difference between the author and his wife. The jokes occasionally smack overmuch of the shop, but the writing is very epigrammatic, and though one act is raised to importance above the rest by practical pleasantries, these are contrived in the spirit of that class of comedy in which intrigue is an essential element. At the Gaiety, recently opened in the Strand, the principal piece is a drama, called On the Cards, adapted from a well-known French play entitled L'Escamoteur, the attraction of which depends on the admirable acting of Mr. Alfred Wigan, as an unprincipled impostor, by trade a practiser of legerdemain, who by force of circumstances is converted into an honest man, and thus combines the grotesque and the pathetic elements. The members of the company who support Mr. Wigan are not for the most part in the enjoyment of high celebrity, but some of them are of good promise and work well together. At the Strand the burlesque is rivalled by the performance of Mr. J. S. Clarke, an American actor, who, in a farcical comedy called the Widow Hunt, makes of a cowardly officer in the militia an odd personage, as original in its way as the Lord Dundreary of Mr. Sothern. At the Royalty, likewise a house chiefly dependent on burlesque, there is a two-act piece by Mr. Andrew Halliday, called the Loving Cup, in which we find the character of a selfish, contented "loafer" most accurately conceived by the author, and fully realized by Mr. Dewar. The version of Monte Cristo performed at the Adelphi is a clumsy, disjointed work, but at any rate the acting of Messrs. Fechter and B. Webster as Dantes and Noirtier is of the best, and the piece could not get on without it. The newest sensational drama of all that have been produced of late is a version of Les Misérables, brought out at the Olympic as the Yellow Passport; but even here the incidents are of a somewhat romantic character. Drawing a result from all these observations, we perceive an indication that a predilection for histrionic art is reviving, and that the accessories of the stage, which for some time past have unduly occupied the foreground, will before long become accessories once more.

As a mere work of theatrical architecture, the Gaiety, which, with its projecting balcony and its gorgeous decorations, calls to mind the best theatres of Paris, will well repay a visit, and it may be remarked that the arrangements of the stage are on the same style of elegance as those of the auditorium. Burlesque and semi-serious drama are, it seems, to be the staple commodities of the house; but the burlesques, if we may take Mr. Gilbert's Robert the Devil as a sign of what is to come, will approximate to ballet, and perhaps may gradually settle down into the poetical fairy tale, with dubious puns or halting satirical allusions.

REVIEWS.

MILMAN'S ANNALS OF ST. PAUL'S.*

EVEN the lightest pages of a work whose composition occupied the last few months of Dean Milman's life acquire a pathetic interest now that their author is taken from us, and they come to us as the voice of the dead. Such a work is necessarily sacred from criticism; we turn to it, indeed, rather with a personal than a merely literary interest, and the story of the great minster fades for the moment before the old man's recollections of the silver utterances of Bishop Porteous, of that hour of his boyhood when in the cathedral which was destined to be his own he heard, or fancied he heard, "the low wail of the sailors who bore and encircled the remains" of Nelson, or of the yet more solemn moment when his own voice, answered by the responses of thousands, "the sad combined prayer as it were of the whole nation," uttered words of hope and immortality over the grave of Wellington. Other traces of old age, however, than these pleasant memories there are none. The book has all the freshness and vigour of the earlier works which won Dean Milman his fame. There are some passages, indeed, in which the genius of the great historian seems unable to confine itself within the narrow limits of his theme, and, in such broad and philosophic reflections as those on the Reformers of the sixteenth or the preachers of the seventeenth century, to bequeath us stray pages of that history of Teutonic Christianity to which his greatest work points the way. But, with a few brilliant exceptions such as these, what is most wonderful in the Annals of St. Paul's is the power with which the Dean has grasped the exact subject he had chosen, and the artistic fidelity with which he has grouped men and events around it. From beginning to end it is what it purports to be, a history of the Cathedral; whatever their own inherent interest, bishop or citizen or Lollard are brought before us strictly in their relation to St. Paul's. To produce this unity of effect without sacrificing the interest of the story is, of course, the mark of a really great writer; but even to a great writer such a task would be impossible if the subject were not in itself a great one. Dean Milman has grasped the greatness of a cathedral just because he, almost alone among modern Deans, seems to have understood what a cathedral was and is. The book is such wonderfully pleasant reading, that one may miss noticing the exquisite art with which every element of mediæval society is brought within the precinct or the choir—bishop, canon, the choir-boys with their mysteries, mayor and aldermen in their gowns of scarlet or green, the burghers gathering in folkmote beneath the bell-tower, the preacher at the Cross, the Lollard at the stake, John of Gaunt now threatening Courtenay in the Lady Chapel, now resting quietly in the one royal tomb of St. Paul's, with his helmet and spear and shield hanging above him, merchants making their 'Change in its nave, Latimer rating the Convocation from its pulpit, the fat buck brought in priestly procession with blowing of horns to the west door. All this varied and picturesque life of the past is not merely painted in antiquarian fashion, but swept into the general current of his history by the Dean's fine sense of historical continuity. A quiet phrase such as "my predecessor, Dean Radulf de Diceto," expresses the whole tone of these Annals, but the tone is heightened in its effect by the fact that never was a writer more modern, more alive to the progress and sentiment of our own day. There is not a trace in these pages of the ignorance, either archæological or contemptuous, which alike divorces the present from the past. To Dean Milman the services which he organized beneath the dome seemed only the natural completion of the work which Bishop Maurice had begun amid the desolation of the Conquest. Between the two ran a stream of continuous life, ecclesiastical, literary, national, individual, varying in interest and character with the ages through which it passed, but passing through the ages without a break.

In some ways the annalist of St. Paul's has singular difficulties to encounter. The Cathedral is the mother-church of the capital, and yet it never was the scene of Royal coronations, of Royal entombments, of any great national events. No Parliament ever met in its chapter-house; the one kingly sepulchre it claimed to possess was that of the most worthless of English Kings, Ethelred the Unready. The truth is, this uneventful character of the early history of its Cathedral admirably illustrates the actual position of London in the middle ages. It is startling at first sight to find that the single fact we know about St. Paul's up to the Conquest is the pretty story told us by Beda, when the heathen ethelings of the East Saxons demanded the "shining white bread" from Bishop Mellitus. But Essex was the most insignificant of the old English states, and whatever may have been the municipal or commercial importance of London, its cathedral shares in the insignificance of the realm to which it belonged. Again, Winchester, and not London, was the capital of the House of Cerdic, and the upgrowth of the great national kingdom under Athelstan and Eadgar brought no memorable events to St. Paul's. In the Confessor's day, indeed, the glories of Winchester passed to the banks of the Thames, but it was Westminster, and not London, which profited by the change. Westminster was the Royal town, the church of St. Peter the scene of Royal coronations, as it soon became the mausoleum for Royal tombs. The interest of St. Paul's, therefore, is, with one great exception, simply the interest which attaches to an ordinary cathedral, but it is in his realization of this interest that the chief merit of Dean Milman's work is to be found. The sketch of its capitular constitution, indeed, though evidently written with much care and research, is its least satisfactory portion. In such a remark, for instance, as that its priests "constantly bore the name of Canons, or improperly Prebendaries, from the prebends or portions attached to each stall," the Dean clearly does not see that in their relation to the Cathedral it was prebendary and not canon which was the more proper name of the two. But all this vagueness and uncertainty is atoned for by the vigorous picture of the actual ecclesiastical life which went on in and round the Cathedral itself. Its walled precinct was, in fact, a distinct town in itself, with its own population, jurisdiction, and laws. The capitular buildings clung as usual to the south of the Cathedral; westward of them lay the houses of the Residentiaries and the Deanery, with its gardens sweeping down to the river. At the north-west angle lay the Bishop's Palace, looking down on the little chapel of Gilbert Becket, and a stately cloister around whose walls ran the famous Dance of Death. It is with the Bishops that the history of St. Paul's begins; the Cathedral itself was their creation; one tower of its western front, the true Lollards tower, which has been superseded in popular fame by a rival at Lambeth, remained to the seventeenth century the episcopal prison.

It is remarkable how great a position as heads of the civic community seemed open to the Bishops, and how little they availed themselves of it. Roger the Black, indeed, acted as the spiritual organ of the municipality in his excommunication of the Caorsin usurers, and the city assented to his assessment for the support of the clergy, an arrangement which remained unaltered to the Great Fire. But the character of the Bishops, with few exceptions obscure and inferior men, prevented them from rising to any civic power, while their influence over their own Cathedral died with their removal to Fulham. Within the chapter itself we find the usual story going on—the gradual withdrawal of the mass of prebendaries, and the concentration of authority and wealth in the hands of the few residentiaries, although we know of no parallel to the audacious attempt made to exclude the Dean from a voice in chapter in the ground that he possessed no prebend. The one distinction, in fact, of St. Paul's up to the Reformation arises from its connexion with the great city which claimed it for its mother-church. Even to the seventeenth century the London burghers made their pilgrimage "upon a solemn scarlet day" to the tomb of Bishop William, whose intercession had won from the Conqueror that precious bit of parchment still preserved in the archives of Guildhall, which confirmed to the citizens of London the freedom and laws they had held in King Edward's days. At his solemn inauguration the Lord Mayor visited in its churchyard the tomb of one of his earliest predecessors, the father of St. Thomas of Canterbury. At Whitsuntide the great civic procession strewed again the altar with costly offerings. But it was not in tomb or altar that London found the bond that linked it closest to its church. To the east of the precinct lay the open space where, summoned by the great bell of the detached campanile, the burghers met in their folk-mote, once at least for the election of a King. In the open space beneath its western front they mustered in arms. The wars, the councils of the city went on under the shadow of the Cathedral; and to those who remember how English freedom seemed, at every critical stage of its earlier history, to hang on the will of the citizens of London, and how strenuously and constantly that will was exerted on the side of liberty, these two open spaces will seem hardly less sacred ground than the Cathedral itself.

It was the Reformation which first gave ecclesiastical dignity to St. Paul's. The traditions of Augustine, of Theodore, of Dunstan, had given a superiority to Canterbury which in the twelfth century, when Foliot dared to challenge its supremacy, was decisively confirmed by the murder of St. Thomas. London was proud of the citizenship of the great martyr—"me, quæ te peperi, ne cessa, Thoma, tueri" was graven on one of its civic seals—but his death was the end of its spiritual pretensions. From the days of Wycliffe, however, our religious history finds its fullest expression in St. Paul's. The great reformer himself makes his first public appearance and defence in its Lady Chapel. The obscure line of Deans quickens at the name of Colet. The whole battle of the Reformation is fought out between Paul's Cross and its Lollards' Tower. To Bonner Dean Milman is of course fairer than the vulgar controversialists of Exeter Hall, but he omits the striking fact which Foxe gives us, that Bonner was the first prelate who fixed bibles in his cathedral church for public reading. Three of the Elizabethan Deans left their mark on our Church history—Nowell in his catechism, Overall in his convocation book, Donne in those strange sermons on death that drew all London to hear them. To the Cathedral itself the Reformation was simply ruin, and what was left by the Reformation and the restorations of Inigo Jones, found its final doom in the neglect of the Great Rebellion. The fire which swept away the fabric of Bishop Maurice only anticipated the destruction which was at hand, for its rebuilding had already been resolved on, and plans actually prepared. The Dean tells in great detail the story of the new Cathedral, and of the miserable ingratitude which awaited its architect. It is pleasant, at any rate, to know that the heavy railing which disfigures its exterior was erected in spite of Wren's remonstrance, and that the contemptible balustrade over the plinth was forced on him in defiance of his emphatic sneer, "Ladies think nothing well without an edging." To the very close, indeed, the book is full of vigour and life. We could have wished that, though left unfinished by the death of its author, it were not disfigured; not merely by a host of misprints, but by some blunders which the Dean's secundæ curæ would certainly have removed. "Henry of Huntingdon" is quoted for the Saracen parentage of St. Thomas, instead of Robert of Gloucester. "A prelate with a Saxon name Ceadda, brother of St. Chad of Lichfield, looms dimly through the darkness." Chad, we need hardly say, was Ceadda himself, and the brother in question was Cedd, a perfectly well-known person in the pages of Bede. In the odd phrase, "He was, it is said, of the ancient Hiberno-Scotic descent," we presume "descent" means "succession." The dates are one series of blunders; Bishop William was consecrated in "1104," the Conquest following shortly after. The date of Archbishop Robert's death has got jumbled up with that of Stigand's, 1070. Geoffry, Bishop of Coutances, figures as "Godfrey." Lanfranc's Council of St. Paul's "may be held the first full Ecclesiastical Parliament of England" only, we should think, by those who think that English history begins with 1066. In the thirteenth century "commune consilium," as we suppose the phrase runs, is hardly to be rendered "the Common Council of London"—an institution which did not exist till a hundred years after. The book in fact wants careful revision; but it is pleasant to know that the last work of Dean Milman, his legacy to the great church which he ruled, is worthy alike of the subject and of his fame.

MR. LOWELL'S NEW POEMS.*

PERHAPS sweet meditative verse is not the kind in which contemporary poetry is least strong or least abundant. The movement which Wordsworth began, and of which he remains the chief master, still runs on, and, with perhaps a couple of exceptions, of which Mr. Browning is the most remarkable, affects every poet of our time, from the mellifluous Laureate down to his weakest imitator. Mr. Lowell brings to the old form and mood a vigour and freshness that make it as good as something newer. This freshness of impression may be due partly to the changed moral climate of a poet who carries the poetic forms of Old to New England, and partly to the peculiar and homely directness which marks Mr. Lowell in his serious as in his well-known humorous productions. At all events there is nothing imitative about his poems. They are stamped with the mark of his own personality, and this may well compensate for the comparative want of lyric swell and pulse. If we do not find the same spacious atmosphere which gives such nobility to Wordsworth, there is a consciousness of being very close to human life in its concrete expressions which is both attractive and elevating to all but the highest degree. The reason why so much of the meditative verse of our time is so weak is that it is vaguely and generally meditative; it is cloudy, loose, and unattached to positive circumstance. Just as in prose, in divinity, morals, and philosophy, so in verse; to be abstract and universal is, except with the giant who once in a couple of generations raises his head above the crowd, to be vapid, diluted, insignificant, and insincere. For all mortals not of supreme calibre, there lies a snare in generalities which is as perilous in poetry as it has for many ages been proverbially declared to be perilous in reasoning. Mr. Lowell's shrewd New England sense—and a man is none the worse poet, but the better, for having shrewd sense—keeps him well out of the inane clouds, and fills his pieces with life and colour and reality. The first poem in the present volume is as good an illustration of this as another. "Under the Willows" is one of the most admirable bits of idyllic work, short as it is, or perhaps because it is short, that have been done in our generation. We do not mount as on the clouds of a drawing-room pastille—scented, elegant, and sickly. Neither do we linger by the edge of the dung-heap, where it is the grotesque whim of this or that sentimentalist, mostly from Scotland, to detain such readers as he can get. We have fancy without emptiness, and reality without a stupid clinging to the grosser earth; an unforced liveliness, and a repose that is not tame. Want of variety is the curse of the second-rate poet. He tunes his harp in a certain key, and drones and thrums on a single string until we stuff our fingers in our ears, and wish that we were not. Mr. Lowell's "Under the Willows" only fills twenty short pages, and is as various as reality itself. There is delicious landscape; an admirable reproduction of the impressions that sweep over the senses on a fine day in summer; a plain and graphic picture of the scissors-grinder, of the children at their game, of the road-menders:—

> Much noisy talk they spend
> On horses and their ills: and as John Bull
> Tells of Lord This or That, who was his friend,
> So these make boast of intimacies long
> With famous teams, and add large estimates,
> By competition swelled from mouth to mouth,
> Of how much they could draw, till one, ill-pleased
> To have his legend overbid, retorts:
> "You take and stretch truck-horses in a string
> From here to Long Wharf end, one thing I know,
> Not heavy neither, they could never draw,— > Ensign's long bow!"

All is struck in so shortly; there is no long-drawn mouthing and maundering, as if one could not have enough strokes in a picture, enough lines in a song. And it is not difficult to see that the secret of Mr. Lowell's art is an exact fidelity to his impressions. He does not work them up with self-conscious elaboration, nor draw on an artificial imagination, but reproduces with careful simplicity the actual vision and sensation, as they were to him; they are set off with no studied decoration, nor diluted and tamed with after moralizings. The same skill in bringing to life a long train of successive inward impressions is shown in that very charming piece of musing, the "Winter Evening Hymn to My Fire," which has something of the variety and change of cadence, if not of the force, of one of the great master's sonatas or symphonies. From the opening lines to the close we are conscious of a movement of thought and fancy that is musical in its progression, down to the mournful melody in which the strain that has been so vigorous and so changeful falls away from our ears:—

> Earth stops the ears I best had loved to please;
> Then break, ye untuned chords, or rust in peace;
> As if a white-haired actor should come back
> Some midnight to the theatre, void and black,
> And there rehearse his youth's great part
> 'Mid thin applauses of the ghosts,
> So seems it now: ye crowd upon my heart,
> And I bow down in silence, shadowy hosts!

The homeliness of inspiration which marks most of Mr. Lowell's verse has been no drawback, as some weak people might have expected, to its loftiness and moral height. Perhaps one half of the present volume is filled with trifles—little poetic exercises, playful handlings of slight and fugitive themes, which struck the writer's fancy for an hour or a day. These are all graceful and expressive, however slight, and are marked by as much sincerity, and as great a freedom from self-consciousness, as the others. The "Dead House," for example, which we could perhaps wish had been differently named, though composed on an old and familiar motive, has all the good qualities which a piece of such small scope and size could well have; it has condensation, concreteness, simplicity, tenderness, and, best of all, a noticeable freshness in the figures and images. The savage ode on "Villafranca, 1859," is equally good in its kind, and though its moving idea, hatred of Napoleons and of Austria, is as essentially commonplace as sorrow for friends departed, the writer by his directness and concreteness redeems his work. There are no windy howlings about freedom, no vaporous invectives against a typical despot or tyrants in general. The imagery is vigorous and striking, and the refrain is lyrical and impressive. As ten years have not materially changed the situation, it is worth while perhaps to quote a stanza or so:—

> The Bonapartes, we know their bees,
> That wade in honey red to the knees;
> Their patent reaper, its sheaves sleep sound
> In dreamless garners underground;
> We know false glory's spendthrift race
> Pawning nations for feathers and lace;
> "'Tis reckoning day!" sneers unpaid Wrong.
> Spin, spin, Clotho, spin!
> Lachesis twist! and Atropos, sever!
> In the shadow, year out, year in,
> The silent headsman waits for ever.

The five stanzas headed the "Darkened Mind" are strikingly weird and forcible, and for the same reason that we have dwelt upon throughout; they are penetrated with an inartificial directness and plainness. The dreadful sight is reproduced by its simplest impressions; in this case, however, they are—more so than in the "Dead House."—not outward, concrete, and objective, but imaginative impressions, still with no clumsiness of edge, no cloudy indecision of outline; all is clear-cut and distinct. All, moreover, is plain presentment; no fruitless exclamation, no vapoury protestation, no morbid or desperate shriek to the heavens. In spite of their notorious tendency to extravagant forms of superuaturalism, spiritualism, and the like, the Americans have a strong positive element in them, and Mr. Lowell is one of its best representatives, because in him it exists in union with a fine and intelligent spiritual quality as well. In the verses entitled the "Footpath," as well as in the farewell lines "To the Muse," he has expressed his sense of the method of the birth of poetry in the soul; the Muse reveals herself, not to him who, eagerly, with prying eye and panting breath, hunts after her, but to the other who awaits her at home in the facts of each man's life:—

> All summer long, her ancient wheel
> Whirls humming by the open door,
> Or, when the hickory's social zeal
> Sets the wide chimney in a roar,
> Close-nestled by the tinkling hearth,
> It modulates the household mirth
> With that sweet serious undertone
> Of duty, music all her own;
> Still as of old she sits and spins
> Our hopes, our sorrows, and our sins;
> With equal care she twines the fates
> Of cottages and mighty states;
> She spins the earth, the air, the sea,
> The maiden's unschooled fancy free,
> The boy's first love, the man's first grief,
> The budding and the fall o' the leaf.

And so forth. "Wonders that from the seeker fly, Into the open sense may fall"; and it is just this open and accurately perceiving sense that specially distinguishes Mr. Lowell's muse.

In two pieces included in the volume before us Mr. Lowell rises to inspired lyric heights. The "Ode to Happiness" is full of suppressed force: its form is careful and sustained, its vision broad and true, and its lesson noble. It is true, without either cant or commonplace, and has in all its turns and phrases that condensation which is at once the charm and justification of verse. And here, more than anywhere else, except in the "Commemoration Ode," we are struck by the truth and genuineness of the emotion which inspired the poem. The only defect that we can notice flows from this very virtue, for it is the genuineness and sincerity of the poet's utterance which have perhaps robbed it of that cold serenity, as of unimpassioned nature herself, which Wordsworth has taught us to expect in pieces composed after his pattern. Many, however, may possibly find it an additional attraction that the poet shows himself warmly interested in the solution of his problem. But by far the finest piece in the volume is the really noble "Commemoration Ode," composed in 1865, when the war was at an end, and Lincoln had been laid in his grave. People who can see little in Yankees but a vulgar boastfulness of material things, and who cannot understand the enthusiasm for the Union which animated all the most high-minded of the Northern partisans, would do well to turn to this splendid hymn, where the moral and national enthusiasm of the Union movement finds a worthily elevated expression. Americans confess that the braggadocio and silly self-assertion which once distinguished them—and the habit is not obliterated—were really the veil of their self-distrust; but they confess also that the war has put an end to this self-distrust, and that they now feel themselves once for all a nation. This is the sentiment which breathes through Mr. Lowell's Ode; there is no flapping of the wings of the Spread Eagle, but a calm and dignified exultation which the measure and pulse of his verse excellently represent. The stern tragedy through which the country had passed, the loss of their ruler, "the kindly-earnest, brave, foreseeing man, sagacious, patient," the anguish brought by duty confronted and performed, the completeness of the triumph, are wrought into a lofty and inspiriting harmony which ought to silence those American grumblers who think their country has no poet.

That these poems should abound with terse and felicitous sayings follows from their authorship. For example:—

> A dark and snuffling day
> That made us bitter at our neighbours' sins.

Or this:—

> Thoughts that great hearts once broke for, we > Breathe cheaply in the common air;
> The dust we trample heedlessly
> Throbbed once in saints and heroes rare,
> Who perished opening for their race
> New pathways to the commonplace.

And the reader of the Spanish Gypsy will remember a long and majestic passage which is writ small in Mr. Lowell's couplet,

> 'Tis not the grapes of Canaan that repay,
> But the high faith that failed not by the way.

THE NON-ARYAN LANGUAGES.*

THOUGH the pages of glossary contained in this volume are not more than 186, it must yet be pronounced a prodigious work—the conception of which was courageous, the execution laborious in the extreme, and the rapid completion marvellous. To give the representatives of 186 English words in 120 non-Aryan languages, the very names of nine-tenths of which are absolutely unknown to most professed philologists, is a task which few of the most active men, seeking an outlet for pent-up energies, would set themselves; and to which fewer still would dedicate the few remaining months of an Indian furlough in England. Of the great majority of these languages no systematic vocabularies have been printed at all; some were known to Mr. Hunter through personal investigation, others apparently through inquiries conducted for him; whilst the published works on the remainder (by no means easy to bring together, as they have been printed in various parts of India, China, Russia, and other distant countries) have been duly consulted. The work is obviously, therefore, one to the mere execution of which, in whatever style, considerable credit attaches; and which to execute tolerably or really well is very meritorious indeed. If this is clearly understood at the outset, we shall feel freer to take sundry exceptions afterwards to various details in the execution of a work which from its very nature no man living could render absolutely perfect.

Who are the non-Aryan peoples of India and High Asia? The question is best answered by explaining who the Aryan peoples are. At (or rather before) the dawn of history, one united nation of fair-skinned and light-haired Aryans is discovered as living, or rather roving with their herds, over the high plains of the ancient Bactria and modern Pamer, immediately north of the Western Himalayas, or their continuation the Hindú Cúsh. Though living by the produce of their herds, they possessed even then the seeds of refinement, thought, and religion. They regarded the bright powers of the world, the sun, the dawn, the rosy clouds, and the lightning, as divine, and as their special protectors. They sang songs and they told tales of these primitive deities. But a strange revolution ensued, of which all that we can clearly discern is that it was a religious war between two branches of this race, and that it resulted in the expulsion or emigration of one, which, retaining the ancient name of Aryan, penetrated the mountains, and, following the course of the Indus, poured itself first over the Panjáb, and thence eastward as far as Oude; while the other branch retained its original northern seat, and gradually spread westward over the high plateau which was called (from a modification of the same original name) Iran, and included the modern Persia, with Media, Babylonia, and Armenia. The western migration proved by far the most important to the world, for it furnished in successive tides the whole modern population of Europe, with but few and isolated exceptions. The Indian Aryans are, however, the most interesting to us here. On their entrance upon India from the north they were simply Aryans; and their songs, some of which are judged to date from, and certainly depict a state of things belonging to, their migration thither, are extant in the oldest parts of the Rigveda. They were still a people living with great herds of cattle, and consequently having no fixed habitation. Their furthest eastern limit was long marked by the little river Sarasvati, which flows from Umbala to Bhutner (about 76° E. long.). In later times we find them having, besides the Brahmanic, also a military caste, from which their kings were chosen. This of itself would suggest long wars necessary to establish their position in the country; and the alteration in their primitive condition is further evidenced, by the abandonment of the old name Aryan for that of Indian or Hindu, derived from the river Sindhu or Indus, down which they descended into the plains of Northern India, and by the foundation of cities, of which Ayodhya (Oude) is one of the oldest. We have further evidence of their progress and conquests in the two great Sanskrit epics, the older of which represents them as passing the natural boundary presented by the Vindhya mountains and the Nerbudda, and overrunning the whole triangular peninsula, and even passing over into Ceylon. Though the heroes are mythical, and the incidents coloured by brilliant imagination, the story undoubtedly tells of a real tide of invasion and partial conquest, of which the traces are still left. What it is important here to notice is that the Sanskrit Indians, according to their own stories, found the land everywhere inhabited by a people of a different, and what we must call a lower, race; black in colour, violent and fierce in temper, and in the Râmâyana actually styled monkeys. What became of these non-Aryan tribes? Partially, no doubt, they submitted to the rule of the invaders, and became the Sudras or Helots, the lowest caste in ancient times, dependent on the three great castes of the conquerors. But it is reasonable to suppose that as the Hindus pressed on them from west to east, from the Indus to the Ganges, and ultimately down that river to its mouth, they fled in great numbers to the north and south. The Hindus, moreover, soon reached their limits. Their country, Hindustan, includes the whole region drained by the Indus and Ganges, and but little more; Orissa forming a southern prolongation on the east coast, and the Maratha country as far as Goa a similar but larger prolongation on the west. But Central India, between these prolongations, and all south of them, is held by the dark race which the traditions of the Hindus themselves acknowledge to be aboriginal. These, therefore, and the various tribes of Nepal, Tibet, and the Himalayas on the north, constitute the non-Aryan races of India and High Asia, of whose languages Mr. Hunter here presents us with a Comparative Dictionary. He includes with them the languages of Burmah, Tenasserim, and Siam.

Little as is known of most of these dialects, certain groups may be defined with certainty. The languages of Central India which are known by the general name of Kôl, and are spoken by the most savage tribes, form one class. Those called Dravidian, in Southern India, of which the Tamil and the Telugu—languages reduced to writing, and possessing literature—are the most important, form another. The enormous variety of dialects concentrated over the comparatively small area of Nepal and the Himalayas constitute a third group; and the languages of Burmah and of Siam a fourth and fifth. On the east of Tibet, and the north of Burmah, they abut on the south-western provinces of China; and neighbourhood, geographical conformation, and the known early intercourse between India and China, alike suggest the possibility of an affinity with the Chinese, which is more boldly declared by Mr. Hunter than we remember to have seen hinted by previous writers. The following paragraph is also interesting as presenting a fair specimen of Mr. Hunter's powers as a comparative linguist, which will be put to a severer test in the Comparative Grammar of the Non-Aryan Languages of India and High Asia, now preparing for publication:—

> I am much mistaken if the scholar's eye will not decipher upon many of these pages a history far more ancient and not less legible than anything that can be educed from the legends of Greece or Rome, or the rock-inscriptions of India. Chinese has hitherto been looked upon as a language standing by itself, devoid of ethnical kindred or linguistic alliances. But in spite of its inexactitudes, this book proves that China has given its speech not merely to the great islands of the Southern Ocean, but to the whole Eastern Peninsula, to Siam, Tenasserim, Burmah, in a less degree to Central Asia, to many of the Himalayan tribes, and to some of the pre-Aryan people of the interior of India. Take in the first case the two numerals in which accidental resemblances are least likely to occur. "Three" in Chinese is san (Nankin) or sám (Canton); a constantly changes into u in non-Aryan speech, in the same way as u sometimes takes the place of the Indo-Germanic a in Gothic, Old High German, and Lithuanian, and of á in Italian, while its lengthened form o appears in place of the typical a or á in every one of the Aryan families excepting Sanskrit and Zend. Bearing this in mind, let the reader turn to p. 35, and he will find that the Chinese san or sám has furnished the third numeral not only to Japan, Siam, Tenasserim, Burmah, Eastern and Northern Bengal, Nepal, the Himalayan tribes, and Tibet, but that it also seems to appear in the Mantshu sfunga (respecting which I am doubtful whether it should not be ssanga) and ilan (l replacing s in the latter word [it had been previously asserted that "in non-Aryan speech l sometimes takes the place of zh, sy, s, j, or other sibilant"]), in the thunga
> ing that g constantly represents h, and in its turn is softened to j and y, he will discover the Chinese kiu, chin, or kan ["nine"], running through the whole of the non-Aryan languages of Japan, the Eastern Peninsula, Tibet, the Himalayas, and Northern and Eastern Bengal. The same thing may be said of "I," p. 48, from which it would seem that the Japanese also, and indeed the whole Malay race, obtained their first person pronoun from the Chinese. (Wo = ngo; ngo = go; go = ku, leaning on á.)

If this judgment be sound, it will greatly modify received notions of the classification of languages. According to the system of W. von Humboldt, which has been further developed and popularized in England by Professor Max Müller, the Chinese is the one great example of a monosyllabic language, in which not only each notion (verb or noun), but every relation between such notion (case, tense, person, preposition, &c.), is expressed by a distinct and separately significant word. The languages here termed non-Aryan, on the other hand, form a class distinct from the Chinese, and termed agglutinating, inasmuch as in them all the relations of case, tense, &c., are expressed by affixes (without separate existence as words) attached to the words they qualify. While W. von Humboldt appeared to regard these two classes as generically distinct, Professor Max Müller conceives the monosyllabic system to be the older, and regards the agglutinating as possibly arising out of it through gradual abrasion of the Chinese relational words into mere affixes, whose original separate significance was forgotten. If Mr. Hunter's scheme be substantiated, he will prove that to be fact which Professor Max Müller treated as a possibility. We cannot at this stage pronounce any opinion on the point; but we cannot forbear to remark that extreme care is required in the treatment of words so very short as the Chinese and Turanian, especially if the phonetic changes which may with safety be assumed in the non-Aryan languages are so violent as some which are here adduced.

The utility of the Comparative Vocabulary (for we can scarcely term it a dictionary, since it gives us only 186 words) depends of course mainly on the correctness of words transcribed from scores of languages, which no one can criticize, because no one knows them. Mr. Hunter has, however, had the best coadjutors for the various dialects; and Mr. B. H. Hodgson, with his valuable printed vocabularies and trunks-full of manuscript, has been his universal Pundit. So far as we have been able to test the vocabularies, we have found them generally correct. But there is one great want—there is no general table of transliteration, so that, for example, we are left utterly in the dark what sound is intended by ch (that of chest, or that of loch), and whether the same sound in all languages; whether in ph, bh, kh, gh, th, dh, the aspirate is heard distinctly following the consonant, as in Sanskrit, or softens and modifies the consonant, making ph = f, &c.; and the Magyar words will mislead, for want of the information that Mag. s = Eng. sh, Mag. sz = Eng. s, Mag. zs = Fr. j, &c. And a note of the expression of the vowels, which Mr. Hunter does give, is rendered useless by a curious error. It stands thus—"i = ee as in meet; í = ee as in thee; u = oo as in boot; ú = oo as in booth." Have the non-Aryan languages put Mr. Hunter's English out of his head? Does he really pronounce meet and boot with a short vowel? The vowels he requires are manifestly those of sit and bull or book. The Magyar words (which are given in a select list of languages with which to compare the Asiatic ones that follow) appear sadly deformed; the accent, which is absolutely essential to the pronunciation in this language, is systematically omitted, and misprints abound, such as negi for négy, heb for hét, jo for jö; besides which a serious mistake is committed in inferring from the infinitives inni, enni, the roots in (read in), en, instead of i, e. In the Russian words also, there are misprints, as, for instance, noih for noch "night," and vyeka for ryeka "river." These errors in well-known languages arouse a misgiving that similar ones may occur where they are less easily discovered. It may appear hypercritical, but we cannot help finding fault with the constant use of the term caret. When Mr. Hunter does not know a word, why can he not simply leave a blank? To put caret opposite "between," "little," "to be silent," in Magyar, looks as if the Hungarians were absolutely destitute of those very necessary words. These and other signs show the haste with which the glossary has been compiled, which is the more to be lamented as so large and expensive a book is scarcely likely to reach a second edition, and is hardly to be excused by the author's impatience to see the book through the press before his return to India.

We have said so much on the linguistic aspects of the non-Aryan peoples, that we can only glance at the other—the political—from which Mr. Hunter also regards them. He shows how entirely our ideas on India, and even the knowledge of it possessed by its rulers, are bounded by the limits of the Aryan race, and that of the non-Aryan hill and forest tribes nothing is known except from the reports of the Hindus, their supplanters and inveterate enemies:—

> Of most of those unhappy tribes we have not a single portraiture by an impartial hand. The Indian newspapers catch and spread the infection. On more than one occasion, English journalists have so far forgotten their characteristic tenderness to the fallen as to insult the despairing bravery of hill tribes, to speak of a peasantry fighting for its homesteads as "adult tigers," and to propose, as a cure for well-grounded disaffection, the deportation across the seas of a whole race. Within the last fourteen years, Christian gentlemen have penned articles breathing a spirit scarcely less [qy. more?] tolerant than that in which the early Sanskrit singers depicted the forest tribes as black, noseless demons, of squat stature and inarticulate speech.

Yet those who have known these aborigines as Mr. Hunter and Mr. Brian Hodgson and many military men have done, testify to their many good qualities:—

> They are faithful, truthful, and attached to their superiors [writes General Briggs]; ready at all times to lay down their lives for those they serve, and remarkable for their indomitable courage. These qualities have been always displayed in our service. The aborigines of the Carnatic were the Sepoys of Clive and of Coote.

And the absence of caste or other restrictions upon intercourse, and their friendly feelings towards us even when at war with them ("they upbraided us with fighting against them; they always said it was with the Bengalis they were at war, not with the English"), appear to show that they might be among our most useful and loyal subjects, if we were sufficiently skilful to gain their confidence and understand their wants. To this, of course, a knowledge of their languages is necessary; and to this political, quite as much as to the strictly linguistic aim, Mr. Hunter devotes this book. We conclude with his striking remarks on the chief difficulties of British rulers in India:—

> Their first difficulty is a military one. A vast native army has to be maintained, and this army must be watched by another army with different interests and of a distinct race. The whole burden of supplying the surveillance at present rests upon the population of the British islands—a population scarcely one-eighth of the Indian people, separated from India by the width of the globe, and by the repugnance which a Northern nation has to exile in the tropics; above all, a population who have so much assured comfort and so many avenues to distinction in civil life, as to render military service distasteful. . . . From this difficulty the aboriginal tribes of India hold out a means of relief. In interest, in race, in religion, in habits of life, they are cut off from the Hindus and Mussalmans by a gulf of whose breadth the people of Christian States can form no idea; and their ethnical repugnance is kept in a constant glow by the remembrance of ancient wars and recent wrongs. Sooner would the panther of their native forests herd with the fox of the lowlands, than the hillman join with the Mussalmans or Hindus. Of the valour of many of their tribes, and that unquestioning fidelity and capacity for discipline which are the raw materials of soldiership, there is no question. . . . It is not as if the experiment had not been tried. It has been tried again and again, and has always succeeded; but routine and our ignorance of the aboriginal races have stood in the way of its systematic application.
>
> The second difficulty of our position in India is a mercantile one. The division of the population into labourers and employers has not taken the trenchant and uncompromising form that it has in England. Sparsely inhabited frontier provinces cannot be peopled from the lowland population, nor can public works of great size be accomplished by them. The aboriginal races supply the want of a large labouring class among the Hindus. It is they who have constructed our railways, and who are at this moment creating, in tea cultivation, a new source of wealth to India, and a new field for English capital, whose magnitude it is impossible even yet to foresee.

THE GREAT UNWASHED.*

THE author's previous work on Some Habits and Customs of the Working Classes seems to have been sufficiently successful to tempt him into a second enterprise. The subject which he has chosen is interesting enough. We none of us know much about the most numerous class of our fellow-subjects—a class, too, which has recently come into the nominal possession of much political influence. A book which gave us the thoughts and feelings of different sections of this class, in their own unsophisticated language, would be well worth reading. If any one would favour the world with an authentic diary of an average working-man, containing the opinions of himself and his "mates," their conversations and discussions about social and political morals, public questions and public men, it would have a very wide circulation indeed. But even the intelligent artisans do not keep diaries. We must wait therefore till some new Defoe arises gifted with the accurate observation and artistic simplicity of his predecessor. A man of genius, acutely observant, unassailable by any temptation to caricature, and endowed with a spirit of toleration, might render a great service to the working-classes by doing that which they will not do for themselves. Such a work would be very unlike the volume now before us, which is not only too shadowy and unsubstantial, but also too pretentious and flippant in style, to do justice to the subject which its author has undertaken. Indeed, the first impression it makes is that it is of the "catch-penny" school. It is written in that jaunty self-complacent tone for which we are indebted to the reporters of certain fifth-rate papers, and which gives it an air of greater unreality than perhaps ought to be imputed to it. Had the author been content to write more simply and naturally, he would have conferred a kindness both on those whom he describes and on those for whom he describes them; and this kindness would have been enhanced if he had contrived to introduce the actual expressions of working-men on the different subjects which engage their attention. As it is, the book is devoid of the value which the author's knowledge of his theme might have given it, albeit possessing a certain kind of interest.

It certainly does not leave altogether on our minds a very pleasing impression of the working-men as a body. Without saying so in as many words, it allows us to infer that, taken in the mass, they are signally ignorant, and as signally self-conceited; with very narrow views both of their own interests and of the characters and conduct of other classes; and extremely intolerant of any opposition to their own crude opinions. It also leaves us impressed with the conviction that their daily lives alternate between great discomfort at home and injurious indulgence abroad; that their marriages are not happy, their wives unthrifty, and—at any rate in large cities—their children exposed to sad temptation and the infection of vicious company. It gives us less information than we desire on the instances, which we know must exist, of working-men raising themselves by their prudence and industry, and gradually acquiring competence and fortune.

It would be extremely interesting to know what proportion of artisans escape the normal temptations to drink, have the requisite thrift to save money, the knowledge to invest it well, and spend it wisely. Every now and then we hear of a municipal councillor, a mayor, or a Parliamentary candidate who boasts that he has worked with the brush, the plane, the adze, or the hammer. It would be worth knowing what the life was which such a man led among his fellow mechanics. Was he a recluse, and unpopular? Or, if he neither drank nor "larked," how did he maintain his good name among them? On these points this book is silent; yet how instructive would details of this kind be! We suspect that such a man as we are speaking of must be an accidental exception to the ordinary members of his calling. Our author says:—

To be properly estimated, working-men must be separated into at least three leading sections, the representatives of which may be respectively styled the educated working-man, the intelligent artisan of the popular phrase, and Mr. Lowe's working-man. . . . The first of them is emphatically the best, and though not the strongest, is yet a large and rapidly-increasing division; and as it to a great extent makes up in moral weight for its comparative want of numbers, its influence in modifying opinion upon those questions which more particularly affect the social position or political interests of the working-classes is now beginning to have a perceptible effect. The educated working-man is the stock intelligent artisan improved and tempered by education. He is, unfortunately for his class, an accidental being, owing his existence not to any marked individual superiority in point of intellect, or to any national or other system of education applied to the working-classes, but to some happy accident of taste or circumstance which leads to his continuing the work of education beyond the school-house.

"Who are the wives of working-men?" is a question often asked. They are, according to our author, women who have been small milliners, and have fed their imaginations with the idea of some day being wedded to princes or nobles in disguise, or they are servant girls, or the daughters of other working-men, who have taken an active part in the management of their fathers' houses. It need not be said how eminently unfit the first are to make a workman's home tidy and comfortable. Nor can much be said for the second. Accustomed for the most part to regular and stated hours of work, to regular and sufficient food, they are not able to meet the exigencies of a growing family, stinted wages, or waning employment. Habituated to spending other people's money with only small control, and discouraged from the practice of rigid economy, they are wholly unable to do the marketing or the cooking of a poor ménage. They are utterly devoid of that skilful economy which enables the wife of the French peasant to make a comfortable meal out of odds and ends of meat and a few vegetables. And what they have never learned before, they are too stupid or desponding to learn when the knowledge would be most useful. When once poverty falls on their homes, they stagnate in despair and dirt. The third class often supplies the best housewives. But their excellence depends on the mother's supervision, which is itself an accident. The following complaint uttered by a working-man deserves the attention not only of benevolent squires and squires' wives, but also of Boards of Guardians and School Inspectors. Why on earth is it that poor men's daughters are taught to repeat by rote the names of the Kings of Judah and Israel, and are never taught the duties of simple cooking and domestic neatness, indispensable for the comfort of a working-man's home? How much drunkenness, riot, and turbulence does not arise from the untidiness of poor men's cottages, and the repulsiveness of poor men's dinners?—

The necessity for, and advantages to be derived from, a technical education among working-men, are now being urged upon all hands; but there is a still greater need for such education among their wives. Women in the working classes have no organized educational means of qualifying themselves for the position of wives, plain sewing taught in charity or charity schools being the nearest approach to anything of the kind. There are no schools of cookery in which young women might be taught something of the nature of our chief foods, and initiated into the principles and practices of economical cookery. No place where they could be shown that many savoury and nourishing dishes can be made out of what are generally looked upon as unpalatable, unmanageable odds and ends; and that consequently a family could occasionally have the luxury of butcher's meat even when they cannot purchase joints and steaks—beyond the cooking of which the culinary capabilities of many wives extend not. There is no existing means by which they can be systematically taught the care of children, or the application of broad, easily-understood sanatory laws to household health and comfort.

The discomfort of poor and crowded houses has of late been much enhanced by the wholesale removal of streets consequent on the construction of railways. Single rooms which a few years ago were let for 3*s*. or 3*s*. 6*d*. a week now fetch 6*s*. or 7*s*. a week. It is a pity that the English working-man has never yet become reconciled to the tenements of many stories, such as the model lodging-houses. The fact may perhaps be explained by the necessity, which the general arrangements of these buildings enforce, of order and regularity. But if the working-men or the working-men's wives would only submit to the discipline which is indispensable for the preservation of harmony among a dozen families using the same kitchen and the same washhouse, there is no doubt that they would be greatly benefited by the larger area and superior ventilation of these loftier structures. But no way has yet been devised to soften the natural roughness of the female tongue under the provocation of neighbourly quarrels on a common staircase.

We have often had occasion to comment on the evil influence which contiguity to criminals exercises over a class professedly non-criminal. The following incident illustrates our remarks. The author has been driven from his former abode by railway improvements, and is compelled, after seeking in vain for a better home, to remove into a dirty and disreputable "court":—

The van containing our furniture had scarcely reached the door of our new house ere it was surrounded by such a mob of ragged, dirty children, of both sexes, and of from two to twelve years of age, as it never occurred to me could all be the product of our Court; and as they began to get in the way, and I noticed some of the elder ones attempting to "what the wise call convey" some of the lighter articles that became visible in the van as the larger ones were removed, I ordered them to go off to their own place, and play there. Whereupon, a gentleman of surly aspect, and with whose bloated, sodden face neither soap nor razor had been recently acquainted, who had been leaning against the doorpost of the next house, watching the removal of the furniture with a sullen and injured air, explained to me, emphasising his explanation by a number of sanguinary expletives, that the "kids" belonged to the Court, and had as much sanguinary right there as me; and added a statement to the effect that the inhabitants of the Court generally would take sanguinary particular notice that I didn't come the sanguinary genteel over them, if I had got a wan-load of furniture.

Let any one for a moment consider what the influence of such a neighbourhood, with such "kids" in it, must have on the children of honest and respectable artisans who are forced to inhabit them, and he will at once discern the rule of progression which governs the expansion of crime in our populous cities. Until the extent of home influence over the children of the poor and the artisan class has been thoroughly measured, it will be useless to provide additional schools.

The information which the writer imparts concerning the political sentiments of the working-men is probably correct; but it is far from reassuring. As a body, they seem to have been in a great measure spoilt by the idiotic adulation which they have received from their philanthropic and interested toadies. And they have become just what it was reasonable to expect that uneducated men, who continually hear themselves called "the brave and intelligent sons of toil," and the "props of the national wealth," should become—very conceited of their own merits, very doubtful of any merit out of their own class, and utterly intolerant of opinions different from their own. Of this bigoted and bitter intolerance the following is an amusing instance. The author was discussing with a fellow-workman the virtues of a deceased nobleman, who had been a just landlord, a liberal benefactor to the poor, and an upright man in all the relations of life:—

I, remembering these things, observed that many would miss him. To his my shopmate indignantly took exception, arguing that all aristocrats were encumbrances upon the face of the earth, and consequently could not possibly be missed when taken from it. Waiving the main point, I said, "Well, his widow will miss him, anyway;" but to this more limited proposition my friend also demurred. "Not she," he answered; "she's got plenty of money, she had no need to care; if it had been a working-man, then you might have talked about his wife missing him." Still I suggested it was possible that natural feeling might exist even in an aristocrat, and that a wealthy as well as a poor woman might mourn for the loss of a good husband; whereupon my opponent, utterly outraged by the propounding of such an unorthodox idea, and my persistence in continuing the controversy, seized a heavy piece of wood and knocked me down with it.

The report which he gives of the religious impressions of the working-classes points to the same ignorant conceit. They first exaggerate the wealth of the clergy, then reproach them with the inconsistency between their preaching and their practice, and finally make this an excuse for not going to church. But it does not appear that, as a body, they pay to the Dissenting minister that homage which they withhold from the clergyman of the Established Church. And whoever knows the ways of working-men will be inclined to doubt their respect for any class of "poor gentlefolks."

On the whole, it raises feelings of an uncomfortable kind when we reflect that great political power has been placed in the hands of a class which is very ignorant; which, from the sheer necessities of its calling, must remain very ignorant, or very superficially instructed, on most of the complicated questions of the day; which is ludicrously self-conceited, and, in proportion to its self-conceit, angrily intolerant of all difference of opinion; which lives in alternate oscillation between the absorbing excitement of its own mechanical employments and the temporary excitement of pot-house politics; which believes all good of itself, and all evil of other classes; which mistakes flattery for friendship, reproof for hostility, and an opposition to communistic crotchets for tyrannical greed on the part of the capitalists.

We repeat the wish that the author had given us some information respecting the men who, by their thrift and sagacity, contrive to rise from the ranks of the employed into those of the employers. And we wish, too, he had explained the blind credulity with which working-men entrust their savings to Friendly and Benefit Societies after the rottenness of many of them has been clearly revealed by the Registrar. That the working-men in the aggregate are incapable of reflection is proved by the immense losses which they yearly sustain through these institutions, without one tithe of the murmurs that their inappreciable contributions to the taxes of the country invariably provoke. The best friend that they could find would be one of their own caste, or a trusted employer, both able and willing to point out to them the enormous loss which their own carelessness and extravagance entail upon them. No advantage that extension of the suffrage or reduction of taxation could bring to them would be comparable to the gain which would accrue from halving their daily consumption of beer, and investing their savings in honest and trustworthy securities. Until they learn these two things, any amount of political power which they may attain will only make them more aggressive, arrogant, and vain, without making them one jot more happy, contented, or respectable. They will, without this lesson, be too often thriftless debauchees while they are earning money, and grumbling paupers when they are out of work. But while we lament this expensive and wasteful credulity on the part of the "Great Unwashed," we cannot forget that the Great Washed and the Great Educated have been the victims of frauds as gross and rampant in the shape of Banking, Insurance, and other Joint-Stock Companies.

ARBORICULTURE.*

AT Alton Towers, the motto of that Earl of Shrewsbury who converted a comparatively waste hill-side adjoining his residence into a multiform triumph of horticultural skill—"he made the desert smile"—is suggestive of a comparison between achievements of this peaceful kind and the warlike exploits of his Lancastrian ancestors. It is pleasant to contemplate the exchange of sword for pruning-hook, even where the end and aim is nothing higher than to please the eye, to gratify the taste, and subdue nature to personal enjoyment. A yet higher art of peace is that which, by planting barren mountains, and clothing with forests the seashore and the sand-drift, gives shelter to lands hitherto sterile by reason of severity of climate, sets bounds to the ravages of sand and spray, and in time establishes, in places heretofore barren and unpeopled, a staple commodity calculated to enhance human civilization and comfort. And the best of it is, that this sort of achievement, while so widely beneficial, is its own reward to the proprietor and promoter; and, though unselfish in its results, is the very reverse of unprofitable, if undertaken by competent hands, and in conformity with the experience of scientific arboriculturists. A handy record of this experience, so practically written as to suit the needs of the professional forester, while it recounts such profitable extensions of woodland and forest as may kindle the enthusiasm and speculative energy of proprietors, has recently been published by Mr. Grigor, the founder, and for forty years conductor, of the Forres Nurseries. He is a writer whose authorship has this weighty recommendation, that he can support his theories by facts, and can point to lands, worth less than a shilling an acre when he found them, now covered with ornamental plantations, and yielding through them a revenue equal to that of the finest cornland in the country. Although of a size that forbids illustrations such as add value to larger works, such as Brown's Forester, there is scarcely a subject dealt with in that sumptuous volume which Mr. Grigor does not handle satisfactorily, while on some topics he communicates experience not detailed by his bulkier rivals, and furnishes hints of exceptional value and importance. While the A B C of arboriculture is fully attended to in his calendar of operations, his directions for preliminary draining, and his detail of the modes of planting, by notch, pit, and trench respectively, his work escapes the dulness of an ordinary "vade mecum" by his curious remarks upon "acclimatation," his stirring account of experiments in planting under difficulties, and his acute suggestions on many points that come within the scope of his profession. His book therefore has interest both for the adept and the novice, for the large proprietor and him that has but a nook or corner to plant out. Duly studied, too, it is calculated to prevent failures, whether great or small, within the range of the subject on which it treats.

As to the profit of scientific planting there can be but one opinion, if we listen to an expert like Mr. Grigor narrating what he has himself begun and matured, on the estate, for example, of Ballindalloch, on the banks of the Spey. In 1830 he planted by the notch-system nearly a million and a half of larch and Scotch firs upon 400 Scotch acres, at a contract price of 10s. per acre. It was duly fenced, and did not require much draining. The cost must have been about 200*l.*, exclusive of the fencing, which was partly stone and partly turf-dike. In the present year this plantation was visited and valued by two practical men, and its best larch found to be from fifty to sixty feet high, with a girth of from three feet six inches to four feet two inches at six feet from the ground. These averaged 20s. the tree, and at a low estimate the whole plantation was worth 31,000*l.* The thinnings from time to time must have already paid with interest the cost of formation, as well as a splendid rent for the land; future thinnings will realize thousands, and the standing timber has every prospect of doubling its value within the next thirty years. This is no doubt a case of very successful planting, and we find a set-off against it in the author's account of a plantation of twenty acres, which from want of regular thinning presented, after thirty-two years, from a thousand to twelve hundred larch to the acre, worth at most about 1*s.* 3*d.* each; whereas properly not more than 500 larch should have been left to the acre, and these worth each from four to five shillings. The worst in this case is to come. Had systematic thinning been practised, the thinnings from the age of thirty-two years up to sixty would have given not less than 150*l.* per acre, and have left by that time on each acre about 150 trees, worth 2*l.* apiece. No such failure as this could have befallen the spirited Earl of Haddington; else his example in the early part of the eighteenth century—upon the first introduction of larch from England to Scotland—when he planted thousands of acres with larch, would hardly have been so extensively followed. His Countess sold her jewels to plant Binning Wood; and his success fired the Dukes of Athole and Argyll, and others among his contemporaries, to a splendid emulation. His vast plantations, however, have been matched in this country by the late Earl of Seafield, and are, we are told, being more than matched by the present Earl. Mr. Grigor's chapter on the rise and progress of British plantations gives a curious sketch of the additions to our timber trees from the sixteenth century until now, and tends to show the debt the nation owes to some of its Dukes and Earls—whom it is the fashion of the day to account more ornamental than useful—for their experiments in planting at Woburn, Goodwood, Syon, and elsewhere, on a scale impossible with lesser folk, and with an enterprise which, if it has turned out well for themselves, has also largely added to the resources of the nation. The later introduction of American, Indian, and Crimean conifers is a topic that might claim a volume to itself.

It is, we think, fully proved in Mr. Grigor's pages that this public spirit never fails to repay itself, unless in the absence of proper precautions and foresight. There may be oversight, for instance, in the selection of plants. In the book before us the caution against Scotch fir and larch grown from Continental seed is clearly and urgently reinforced. These are shown to be very susceptible of climatic influence, and too tender for winters in the North of Scotland, or even for the higher ground of English nurseries. Yet of late years nine-tenths of the Scotch fir seed sold in our market has come from Continental depôts, and a large proportion of the larch seed from the vine-climates of France, Germany, and Prussia; and the result is that, the former generations of these trees having been acclimatized or inured to great heat, their offspring are unfit for at once enduring the extreme change of Scottish moorland. Mr. Grigor institutes comparisons of one-year-old larch from home seed and two-year-old from imported seed, in the dry season of 1865, to the great disadvantage of the latter, and elsewhere warns his readers against the millions of plants raised from Continental seed which are sold at a cheaper rate in our British nurseries, and only answer at all in sheltered lowlands, not in the local habitat of larch or Scotch fir. He gives an equally useful warning against a dwarf Continental counterfeit of the genuine Scotch pine, the "Pinus Silvestris Montana," worthless as a timber tree, and all the more deceptive because Don, in his writings on Scotch trees, has christened a really valuable species by the name of "Montana." So, too, the only valuable spruce (except the Abies Douglasii), the Norway spruce, has its worthless but multitudinous counterfeit in the White American, a dwarf likewise. The test is the darker foliage and more vigorous leader of the Norway. Hence it will be seen how important wise selection is in the case of a crop which is not annual nor biennial, but is meant to last a century; nor indeed is it less important to bear in mind, especially with hard-wood plants, that the likeliest are such "as have been removed in the nursery lines a year before final planting." Scotch firs, too, one year old and one year transplanted, suit best bare and exposed ground.

The mischief likely to arise from relying on counterfeits of really hardy plants for the outsides of a hill-top plantation, or for shelters and nurses in exposed situations, would be so irreparable that no vigilance should be grudged to avert such an outlay of "labour lost." But a soundly-formed plantation may fail from after neglect. Judicious thinning, and, in the case of hard wood trees, judicious pruning, are necessities on which Mr. Grigor has two very useful chapters. In her own forests Nature provides against trees of the same size and strength "pressing on one another, as in the ruinous struggle too often witnessed in planted woods." Some young plants overtop others from other causes, and also because self-sown pine-seeds do not vegetate uniformly or immediately. Hence the smaller in growth curtail the side branches of the taller ones, and a diversity of growth anticipates the thinning process so needful for artificial plantations. Too late thinning leaves the residuum a prey to the first high wind, as well as to root diseases affecting the trunks. For hardwood trees the great gain is in pruning so as to direct the ascendency of the leading shoot, and heading down to half length those next in size, as well as the lateral branches. It is bad to prune close to the stem at first, as also to clear the stems of all side branches to a certain height, once for all, and operate afterwards only on the under branches; for the results of this process are a small trunk, a bad top, and side branches more vigorous than the leader. Oak grown for navy purposes is an exception, the object in that case being to encourage a crooked trunk and the greatest quantity of bent pieces or "knees." In this case the leading shoot should be cut off, and two of the strongest laterals left to grow horizontally, those next to them being first shortened, and finally removed, and the old top reduced to the point at which the horizontal leaders diverge. Nothing can be worse than to cut off large branches from timber trees, especially if close to the trunk. Though the wound may be apparently cicatrized, the timber remains unsound, in consequence of the rottenness caused during its exposure. The timber-merchant will detect this flaw even more readily than the nails which are not unfrequently discovered in timber, owing to the mischievous practice of nailing paling or wires to trees instead of standards (cf. p. 122). In proof of the general superiority of pruned trees to unpruned, our author cites a practical authority, Mr. Cree, who states that, taking twenty-five elms of a size for making naves of wheels, the average of timber in each will be five feet if unpruned, and thirty if pruned. If this statement is to be accepted, the inference is conclusive.

The romance—if we may use the term of what is certainly no fiction—of Mr. Grigor's very interesting book is to be found in his chapter upon "Seaside Planting." We refer not so much to the plantations formed on the coast of Norfolk, on the cliffs overhanging the Yarmouth Roads—where deep trenching, six-foot fences of furze and broom, and regular hoeing and cleaning for the first two years after planting have led to complete success—as to the reclamation from its utter desolation of the sand-deluged estate of Culbin, by means of plantations which have literally recovered the sandy space. In the seventeenth century this estate was termed, for the fertility of its cornlands, "the granary of Moray," and commanded a rental equal to 7,000*l*. per annum. But by the end of that century it had become valueless and fruitless, "an arid mass of drifting sand." Mr Grant of Kincorth was the first to reclaim a portion of this desert, and this solely with a view to shelter and ornament. At eight years old the larch and firs averaged a height of six feet in the more advanced parts, and at from twenty to twenty-eight years (1865) ranged from twenty-five to forty-five feet in height, in perfect vigour. The thinnings have already paid the original outlay, and interest at a high rate. The value of the plantation is at present 30*l*. per acre in the oldest parts, and the whole promises a revenue at least equal to that of ordinary arable land, beside the realization of the original object—ornament, shelter, and a barrier against the sand. The success of the proprietor of Moy, another portion of Culbin, is also avouched by Mr. Grigor, who himslf planted nearly three hundred acres of it in 1840 and 1842, and, taking the standing wood of larch and Scotch firs as from twenty to thirty feet high (though there are larch of forty and Scotch firs of twenty-eight feet), values the forest at present at 22*l*. per acre. He notes, as a curious fact, that where the larch has become sunken in sand-drift, its shoots take root four inches beneath the surface, and, from this readiness of its lateral branches to take root, he suggests a quick and effectual method of increasing our rarer conifers. Even more wonderful is the account of the plantations on the sand of the coast of Gascony, where, between 1789 and 1811, 12,500 acres of sand-down had been clothed with thriving plantations, wholly seed-sown. The plan adopted was to sow two pounds of pinaster seed and four or five of broom seed per acre, and to thatch the whole with pine-branches with the leaves on, whilst warding off the sand-drift with a line of hurdles. At first the broom plants overtopped the pinasters, but by the end of a dozen years the pines had choked out the broom. Mr. Grigor's observation leads him to prefer an undulating surface for seaside planting, some portion being then sure of protection. The worst ground is an unvarying slope toward the sea, only slightly above high-water mark. On the cliffs on the Norfolk coast, for instance, the spray, which is so hurtful at lesser altitudes, is comparatively harmless, and thereon may be seen plenty of heavy timber. Beside the pines, which suit a pure dry drifting sand, and the larch, which will do well in sand mixed with vegetable substances if out of reach of the sea-spray, the willows, elders, maples, alders, and beeches, with the evergreen oak, do well in a saline atmosphere. The berberis, snowberry, and laurustinus, also, are suitable seaside shrubs. As Mr. Grigor justly remarks, plantations by the seaside are desirable and profitable at the same time. Beside shelter and protection, they yield a profit, as furnishing coaling vessels with return cargoes of pit-wood and prop-wood; collaterally, too, they find employment for the working-classes. On the Bordeaux coast, for example, the preparation of resin and tar from the pinaster forests constitutes the livelihood of numbers. The author elsewhere lays down a sound rule of profitable planting, that such kinds of timber should be planted as command the readiest market in the neighbourhood. On the kinds of trees fittest to plant on mossy and moist soils, or on high barren ground; on the value of bark, and the modes of harvesting it; on the desirableness of coppice wood and of hedge-row timber, Mr. Grigor has much information in special chapters. On the subject of bark he makes us envy the days when a proprietor got anything like 16*l*. per ton for oak-bark, and any market at all for that of other trees. Coppice-wood he shows to have so much diminished in value, by reason of the fall in bark, that it is undesirable except where an inhospitable subsoil checks the trees planted on it at a certain period of their growth; and hedgerow timber, beside contributing to frequent gaps or "glats" in the hedges, is apt to fetch a less price from the buyer, and to be chiefly precious as a characteristic of English scenery. The chapter on hedges is one in which all may take an interest. The best and readiest are of hawthorn quick, and for forming them six or eight year old plants, fibrous rooted and thrice transplanted, are the most profitable. If any plant is mixed with them it should be holly, which, though obscured for awhile, gradually prevails. Privet thrives well in such combination, but adds nothing in strength. A holly hedge, in a good, rich, loamy soil, beats, to our fancy, every other, and after a certain stage the holly is not a slow grower. Next to it ranks the yew-hedge—compact, close, easily dressed, hardy, and permanent. Mr. Grigor says that in some nurseries it may be purchased by rows, trained hedge-fashion, for transplanting—a ready-made fence, in fact. To get a gay hedge (shortlived, we fear, in its gaiety) he elsewhere suggests grafting scarlet and pink thorns on strong stems of the common hawthorn. The best shape is wedge-fashion. On Mr. Grigor's account of our indigenous and introduced trees, which takes up the larger half of his volume, we propose to touch in another article.

NATURE'S NOBLEMAN.*

THERE is something interesting, if comical, in the innocent way in which children and little people try to imitate the actions of their elders and betters. Even vices are copied in quite harmless make-believes of naughtiness, and the results of sinful experience are ignorantly travestied by the very pinks of propriety and the acmés of rigid virtue, while the dress and habits of my lady in her bower get gradually translated till they descend in grotesque distortion to the level of the servants' hall. In fact imitation is the whole of certain folks' ability, and there are some men who, like monkeys, can only mimic, but never originate. And what is true of people in general is still more true of authors. Modest writers, whose only forte lies in the subtle and quiet delineation of character and the more tender emotions, think themselves obliged to go into the 'Ercles vein of the confessedly sensational school, and strain themselves in their endeavours to throw into monstrous imaginations, and wild complications of plot, the powers fitted only for sweetness and tenderness and truth. The evil influence of example, by which weak minds are led astray, is shown in nothing more distinctly than in novels, where the noisy applause that follows coarse vigour seems to be considered of infinitely higher value than the quiet and discriminating appreciation given to delicate and sensitive work; and a writer whose brain is fired with visions of gigantic posters and the blare of the eighth edition, which are the insignia of triumph of a first-class sensation novel, is tempted to try his luck in the same direction, and to dig in the same mine where these great nuggets of success have been already found.

Now here is a book the writer of which has tried to put on the seven-leagued boots worn by the giants of the sensation school, but in which she has only jumped a stone's throw, to land—not on the heights. Her intellectual gifts are valuable enough in their degree, and in their own sphere, but they are not equal to the handling of such matters as madness, mystery, murder, and the like. And the consequence is a child's attempt at playing man—like Tony Weller's two-year-old descendant sitting on a doorstep, with a straw for a pipe and an empty mug for the familiar pewter, saying, "Now I'm grandfather!" One of the first things that strike the reader in Nature's Nobleman is its want of real originality. Dashes suggestive of Miss Muloch here, of Mr. Trollope there, parts reminding one of Mrs. Riddle, and parts that seem like a repetition of what we have read elsewhere—but the where very hazily remembered—take off that keen sense of novelty which is essential to the success of a work of fiction. Neither character nor circumstance, neither plot nor description, has the sharp cutting of originality, and the whole book reads like a réchauffé of what has been served up scores of times already. The little old man dressed in a loose falling robe of blue and a black velvet skull cap, and the handsome débonnaire cavalier muffled in a cloak, with a scar across his face, issuing at dead of night from a secret postern in a grim and weird old house of bad traditions, and saying mysterious words that sound like an unhallowed bargain—though they are not—echo the romantic strains that thrilled us in our youth. And though it is only so much of the outer form that is like our old friends of the G. P. R. James school, while the real story is modern enough, yet the flavour of imitation runs all through—as evident in the vulgarity of Mrs. Slydersley as in the pride and mystery of Miss Beatrice Rossitur. Yet, for all that, there is something pretty and loveable in the book, though it is not strongly thought nor thoroughly worked, and though it has some grave faults telling heavily against it. And one of these faults is that every sensation and every action is prosed over too much. A man cannot see the sun set or the sun rise, and a woman cannot go to church and hear a piece of music, without a long account of how they felt and what they thought. And this clogs the story, impedes its action, and wearies the reader. The feelings of a character are always better shown by action than by the mere narration of the author. But this, of course, is just the difficulty, just the crucial test; and the writers who can let their characters show themselves, and let the story tell itself by action, are the successful writers, and of the best kind. It is not given to every one to hit the bull's-eye when they take aim; and we are bound [illegible] ye in novel-writing is very rarely hit indeed.

The character of Fulke Barham, "the nature's nobleman" who gives his name to the book, is of course the ideal character of a man according to a woman's ideal. That cerulean mixture of strength and severity with sweetness, of self-control with passion, of stern repression with the wildest ambition and the tenderest love, is what women like to use when they paint their hero. And it is a charming mixture, according to the ethics of the drawing-room, if not always true according to the experience of the club-room or the debating-society. Jocelyne Mayburne, again—the little child-woman, who knows only such things as old black-letter tomes and a sharp-tempered housekeeper have taught her, absolutely innocent, and as loving as she is pure—is the stereotyped ideal of the fit mate for such a great heart. It is the image of the lion and the lamb, and a little child leading, expanded into a story, and put into human shape. Miss Rossitur too, with her pride and her secret—which always remains a little muddled and incoherent—her madness and her stately beauty, is she not the acknowledged third of the group, made after the old pattern, worn by this time so threadbare? We have met her scores of times before, draped in her black velvet, with the dull gold among her ebony tresses, drawing herself up on the slightest provocation, flashing out scorn and contempt from her lustrous eyes without any provocation at all, yet every now and then letting her secret soul of love shine forth like starlight in a storm, and startling the beholder by her unwonted glance of tenderness, as she had startled them just before by her unnecessary glance of scorn. We know the kind of thing by heart, for they are all lay figures, turned out one after the other according to time-honoured models, and given different names whereby to label them.

The story of Nature's Nobleman is compressible enough, indeed curiously so, showing how very little kernel there is sometimes in three volumes of close print when one throws aside the superincumbent padding. Fulke Barham, the hero, is a ruined man. When his father died he came into an inheritance of debt, and nothing else, whereupon he sold his ancestral estate of Barham Lings, with the proviso that he might reclaim it again, if he could, before the expiration of a certain number of years. After this he works at a quarry which he has retained, makes a good thing of it, and pays off all the remaining debts. The story opens with an account of his sitting, wearied and worn-out, at his writing-desk, having just drawn his last cheque for his creditors; though why he should have left this very ordinary piece of business till the end of the day, and after post-time, and why he is so frightfully tired—as if he had been drawing cheques all the day—remain a little obscure. Soon after this he falls in love with pretty Jocelyne Mayburne, the granddaughter of the old wizard-like man in the black velvet skull-cap—him who had come out by the postern-gate at dead of night with the cloaked cavalier, whose last words were, "The money or the girl." Miss Rossitur, the haughty beauty with dark hair, sees Jocelyne Mayburne, and takes an immense and mysterious fancy to her. They go together to a ball, where Captain Gordon, the cloaked cavalier, also goes; on seeing whom the dark lady faints, and falls incontinently into a fever. Fulke makes love to Jocelyne; but after he has made love, and has reason to think himself beloved in return, a scheme in which he has embarked all his means fails, and he is a second time ruined. Then he goes to see Jocelyne, mistakes her words as she mistakes his, and leaves her miserable, deceived, and broken-hearted. By chance, after this, he sees her in the arms of Captain Gordon, of whom he has already the most unfavourable impression. "The money or the girl" rings in his ears still, and he believes that old Mayburne has sold his granddaughter to the gay Lothario. After this he meets Miss Rossitur, who is and has been mad, wandering alone and half-dressed in the woods, hears from her that she has some terrible grief against the Captain, and so is ten times more distressed at the thought that his lamb has been given up into the power of such a wolf. It turns out, however, that Captain Gordon is the father of Jocelyne, having run away with her mother, whom old Mayburne of the skull-cap discarded. It is to be presumed that the gay Lothario made love to Miss Rossitur between whiles, and that she had given him that ugly cut across his face. After a few more chapters of suspense, chiefly occupied by Jocelyne's illness and her mother's history, the encumbrances are quietly killed off, and the desired end is attained. Old Mayburne dies, and Jocelyne and her father take the body down to Scotland—no one knowing that Captain Gordon is her father, so that she gets into terrible disgrace with Mrs. Grundy and her crew; Fulke Barham hears her call to him mysteriously, and goes away after her to find her grandfather's grave and to hear her mother's history; when he returns home he hears that her father, Captain Gordon, is also dead, and that she is dying and asking for him. He goes to see her, wrestles with death for her, and keeps her alive. Dr. Paul, the organist of Slumborough Cathedral, who has been in love with Miss Rossitur, and whom she also loves but will not marry because of that grief of hers against Captain Gordon and her own inherited madness, dies in church of a broken heart just as he finishes the service; Miss Rossitur dies and is buried; Sister Agatha, a Grey Sister, who died and was also buried a short time ago, turns out to have been Jocelyne's mother and Captain Gordon's wife, and by mere chance Captain Gordon is buried close beside her. Jocelyne is at one time declared the heiress of her old grandfather, and then proved not to be the heiress. But that does not signify, as by some mysterious process Fulke Barham comes in for all the money, and so has wife, fortune, and Barham Lings unhindered. This part of the story is not a little perplexed and obscure; as is also the reason why Miss Rossitur, in the early chapters of the book, takes out a lock of white hair dabbled in blood, sets her teeth, and moans and "carries on" over it. A very little more care would have made all this obscurity clear, and would have prevented a great deal of useless conjecture and harking back. We are sorry, too, to be obliged to say that the grammar of Nature's Nobleman is at times eccentric; that the conversations of the servants and bedesmen are carried on in no known composite of north-country with stage-country dialects; and that Mrs. Slydersley, the Lady Mayoress, is a mistake from first to last, being vulgar and stupid, disagreeable and unnatural, a reduplication of bad qualities not to be pardoned. The whole book wants revising, compressing, and making clear; for there is enough good in it to make us wish that it had been better, and to cause regret for the mistakes which might have been avoided with just a little more care and thought.

THE EASTERN ARCHIPELAGO.*

A HUNDRED and fifty years ago a great collection of Eastern shells was made by Rumphius, a doctor who lived at Amboyna, the capital of the Spice Islands. The collection was described and figured in his Rariteit Kamer, published in 1705; but was itself dispersed in the course of a compulsory journey made from Leyden to Paris under the First Empire, and its subsequent return. The liberality of some gentlemen at Boston enabled Mr. Bickmore, who is Professor in an American University, to make a voyage to the Eastern Archipelago, with the view of bringing a restored edition of the same collection to his own country. The book before us is an account of the successful expedition in pursuance of this plan. The Professor and his friends deserve every credit for their spirited plan for carrying out a scientific object, and we would not criticize too severely the record of its fulfilment. There is indeed very little to be said against the book; it has plenty of negative virtues. Mr. Bickmore says, that it is taken almost entirely from his journal, and that he has sought for accuracy, at any sacrifice of elegance. There is no necessary antithesis between the two that we can see; but if Mr. Bickmore is incapable of aiming simultaneously at both merits, we should of course prefer that of accuracy. He has, moreover, most scrupulously abstained from the sin of fine writing, which so easily besets a traveller. Not even a tropical sunset or a thunder-storm betrays him into a glowing burst of Ruskinian eloquence, or into the equally offensive fault of small facetiousness; he pursues the even tenor of his way, as a man of science should, and calmly notes facts without any efforts at "word-painting" or at wit. The descriptions of scenery resemble a fragment from a handbook of geography; he is content to describe a volcano by giving its height and the dimensions of its crater, and an earthquake by telling us how many people it killed. His reticence in regard to persons amounts almost to a fault; there are a few compliments to the civility of the Dutch officials, but scarcely a hint as to the merits or defects of Dutch administration. It would be interesting to hear from a competent observer some accounts of the system now pursued in regard to the commerce of the islands, but Mr. Bickmore abstains as rigidly from any serious comments as though, like an ambassador in a besieged town, he had marched through the country blindfold. For this silence there may be satisfactory reasons besides the obvious one that his mind was intently fixed upon shells, and that the only moments at which we seem to recognise a certain glow of enthusiasm beneath the studied calm of his language are those at which the discovery of some new specimen, such as a "thicklipped strombus," is briefly recorded. He was, perhaps, too ardent a conchologist to be much of a politician, or he may consider that the assistance he received from the officials would make criticism improper. There are, indeed, only a few occasions on which Mr. Bickmore's self-restraint seems a little to desert him. He cannot refrain from mentioning at one point that he collected eighty-one specimens of birds on a certain island in the same length of time in which Mr. Wallace collected sixty-six; and, besides this professional boast, he has a barely perceptible propensity to hold himself up to us as a man of courage. He takes opportunity to observe that, as he had served in the United States army, it was his duty to set an example in this respect to the weaker part of mankind; and accordingly he shows a magnificent disregard of dangers from big snakes, from crocodiles, and from heavy seas, when the natives shrink from his side; and winds up his book by a terrific combat with a python, which a gentleman had pressed upon his acceptance as a parting token of affection. The box in which this appropriate gift was conveyed was accidentally put wrong side up on shipboard, and the python escaped, to the imminent danger of Mr. Bickmore. When discovered, it made successive springs at his foot, whilst he played it, so to speak, with a heavy bludgeon, and, luckily for him, never failed in getting well on to the animal's head. After fifteen minutes of this work, the python was still coming up to time in lively condition, whilst Mr. Bickmore's strength was beginning to fail. The crew had been in a state of panic terror; but at the end of this very uncomfortable quarter of an hour, it occurred to the carpenter to hand Mr. Bickmore an axe, and the snake was then effectually dealt with by the naturalist. There is a thrilling picture of this incident, remarkable for the calmness displayed by the spectators of the struggle between a philosopher and a snake about twice his own size. We should, however, be doing great injustice to Mr. Bickmore if we implied that he was guilty of anything approaching to bragging; he betrays, almost in spite of himself, a certain complacency at his own coolness on this and one or two other occasions, but certainly not in any obtrusive fashion. We could, in fact, very well put up with a little more warmth of colouring in every part of the picture.

* Travels in the Eastern Archipelago. By Albert S. Bickmore. London: John Murray. 1868.

In spite of his occasional dryness, and the total absence of some interesting topics from his pages, Mr. Bickmore gives us a good deal of information which we are glad to have. Geologists and naturalists generally may be attracted by his accounts, for there are plenty of strange formations, and of undescribed species of plants and animals, and even lovers of scenery may infer from his facts that there must be in the Archipelago many views of singular beauty; but to the ordinary mortal there would be two great objections to travelling in that part of the world—namely, the nature of the country and the character of its inhabitants. The first is volcanic, and the second cannibal. At one place which Mr. Bickmore describes, the post arrives once a month, and produces a little extraneous excitement. At other times the one subject of conversation is the last earthquake; and it must be admitted that the earthquakes and volcanic eruptions are something worth talking about. At one place he experienced four earthquakes in as many days, and if they escape one for eight or ten months at Amboyna they know that they will have to pay for their quiet by an unusually severe one. The volcanic eruptions in many of these islands are terrible. The eruption of Mount Toneboro, for example, in 1815, began with reports so loud that troops 480 miles away were turned out to meet a supposed attack; they were heard, indeed, we are told, at double that distance in a straight line. Ashes were ejected in such masses that their average depth for a radius of 210 miles was two feet; and a famine was caused by their fall in an island ninety miles distant, in which 44,000 people perished. Mr. Bickmore gives a thrilling account of an ascent which he made of one of these volcanoes, which may be recommended to any stray members of the Alpine Club. It is only, we regret to say, 2,321 English feet in height; but we must add in fairness that Mr. Bickmore came very near breaking his neck in more than one place on the ascent, with the additional chance of being stifled by exhalations, and baked on hot rocks. Moreover, as he properly urges, it has done so much damage to life and property that it may be considered as one of the most important volcanoes in the district. When it is not in eruption, the island on which it is placed gets up terrible earthquakes; and even in its peaceful moments, the natives who climb it to procure sulphur are in the habit of dressing themselves in the costume which is supposed to be correct in the probable event of a premature removal to Paradise. With such recommendations, some deficiency in regard of glaciers and of absolute height may surely be pardoned to this sprightly, though diminutive, mountain.

Of the charming creatures which infest these islands in the shape of crocodiles, snakes, and other "catawampous chawers," we have not room to speak. Sumatra is specially recommended to the sportsman by reason of the numbers of tigers, which have a considerable relish for human flesh, whilst in the intervals the traveller may be employed in gathering the leeches which form garlands round his ankles. It must be admitted, however, that the human population is still more interesting in some of the islands, and the traveller would only be falling in with the customs of the country if he varied his sport by bagging a few natives at intervals. The national pursuit of head-hunting is mentioned by Mr. Bickmore with disgust, which seems to make him a little unjust to persons who have been brought up to the amusement. It does not seem to be worse than scalping, though we must admit that the plan of compelling a young man to produce a head instead of a marriage license is decidedly reprehensible. The Battas who inhabit part of Sumatra, and are so intelligent as to have invented an alphabet of their own, seem to be the most distinctly cannibal race known. They punish theft among themselves by tying up the criminal and allowing the owner to cut a piece out of him and eat it; the rajah and the rest of the people join in the horrid feast, taking bits by turns. Such at least is the hideous story of a missionary in the district, who has not hitherto been converted into food for his converts. According to one account, the custom originated some years ago when a rajah had committed some great crime. To avoid responsibility, he was put to death by a large party of his subjects, and each of his executioners ate a bit of him, that all might be equally guilty. To their astonishment they found that the rajah was very nice, and resolved on all future occasions of a similar kind to indulge in the same pleasure. They certainly eat human flesh, it is said, not from a savage feeling of revenge, but simply because they like it.

Of many other tribes scattered through the Archipelago, which seem to vary through every degree of ferocity and mildness, we have incidental notices. Many are still in a state of primitive heathendom; many have been converted by Mahommedans, who still seem to be the most active proselytizing sect, and some few, of whom Mr. Bickmore speaks favourably, have become Christians. We could have wished for some fuller details, but we may fairly say that he has given us many interesting facts, and that, if his style is rather dry, it at least gives a general impression of careful and conscientious observation.

GAME-PRESERVING.*

THIS book is naturally written from a game-preserver's and gamekeeper's point of view. We are not going to enter into a discussion upon the Game-laws, which some of our Liberal politicians would dispose of in a very summary manner; but we may set it down as an indisputable fact that without game-laws there can be no game. Thanks to the protection at present afforded by the law, it is possible, but only by unceasing vigilance and at a great expenditure, to keep up a limited stock of pheasants, hares, and partridges in this crowded country. Remove that protection, and it would not be difficult to fix the time when a pheasant will be as great a curiosity as a bustard, and when we shall about as soon think of looking for a hare on a fallow as for a beaver in a duck-pond. The simple question is, are partridges and pheasants worth keeping as articles of food, or are they not? If they are not, let them become extinct as soon as possible, by all means; if they are, they must be effectually and powerfully protected. Now it must not be forgotten that, if the landed proprietors have a monopoly of the shooting, the middle-classes are the largest consumers of game; and that they regard game as a valuable adjunct to their customary food is proved by the increased number of licenses taken out by game-sellers, and by the vastly increased supplies at Leadenhall Market, and at the shops of the chief poulterers in London and in the principal provincial towns. We can ill afford to give up any article of food that is procurable. Our supply of mutton is not inexhaustible; our home supply of beef is not only quite insufficient, but is also steadily deteriorating in quality; they must be very urgent reasons, then, of public policy that should induce us to forego such useful contributions to our markets as are supplied to us during the autumn and winter months from the field, the fen, and the covert. But is it not a little curious that such an outcry should be directed against the preservation of game just at the time when the universal opinion of the country has been pronounced in favour of stringent measures for the protection of salmon in our rivers, and when more stringent measures still are imminent for the protection of our oyster-beds? Rivers are public highways, and foreshore rights have never been accurately defined, have rarely been successfully enforced; yet the fishing of rivers and the dredging of foreshores are now supervised with increasing watchfulness, and can only be carried on under specific limitations. The fact is that salmon and oysters were becoming scarce with such rapidity, owing to every man being allowed to destroy them when, how, and where he pleased, that it became clear that in a few years there would be none left. Then the question was fairly started; are salmon and oysters worth keeping as articles of food, or are they not? The common sense of the country, thus appealed to, answered in the affirmative; and protective measures were immediately instituted which, in the case of salmon, have already proved eminently satisfactory, and, in the case of the oyster, only require further development to be equally salutary. Now is there any one who will deny that if oysters, as an article of food, are worthy of legislative protection, much more so are pheasants and partridges?

Whatever hostility may have been excited by the working of the Game-laws in particular instances—and it is forgotten that the administration of the law and the law itself are very different things—one fact has always filled us with unbounded astonishment, that any reasonable human being should feel, or affect to feel, the slightest sympathy with or commiseration for a poacher. We will charitably hope that those who really regard the poacher as an innocent victim to the tyranny of a brutal squirearchy do so in ignorance of the object of their compassion. Anti-Game-law declaimers reside for the most part in large towns, and know but little of the country. Save as it is illustrated by the presence of the rat, the black-beetle, and one or two smaller domestic pests, they have small acquaintance with natural history. They have never been in a wood, or walked through a turnip-field, and the habits of pheasants and partridges are unfamiliar to them. Their view of the preservation and illicit destruction of game is necessarily somewhat ideal. The poacher is an industrious labouring man who devotes his leisure hours to the painful cultivation of a small plot of garden ground. Pheasants are constantly flying about, like rooks, in vast numbers; and, never being fed by the selfish magistrates who have reared them, they are perpetually hovering overhead in search of what they may devour. The labour of the poor man's hands wastes away before their —— efforts. A hare has jumped in at the parlour window, and carried off his dinner. A covey of partridges has walked in at the back door and devoured his cheese. What he left a garden in the morning he finds a wilderness at night. No wonder if, in the anguish of his soul, he deviates for once from that path of rectitude along which he has always travelled with upright steps. Cowering in a corner of his little domain, he descries a luckless pheasant, crop-full of those particular beans that were to have garnished that particular Sunday bacon. The sight is too much for him; he pounces on the obese bird, and wrings its neck. But the demon eye of a gamekeeper, peering through the hedge, has marked him. He is summoned before a bench of vengeful squires, and still more vengeful clergymen, and is admitted an inmate of the county gaol for two months. Such is the poacher, as pictured by the pothouse Radical spouter, and the advocate's sympathy may be as genuine as his ignorance is undoubted. But there are others who are not ignorant, and whose sympathy must be accounted as affectation, for they know the poacher as he is. He is an idle, slouching, ill-conditioned vagabond. He has been discharged from half a dozen situations because, great hulking fellow as he is, he will pursue no respectable business with zeal or fidelity. He sleeps when honest men are at work, and he is up and at work when honest men are in bed. He goes out knowingly to defy the law, and armed and prepared to resist the law, if necessary. Poaching is not his only error; he takes good care to be able, if interrupted, to commit murder also. He is a wild beast that, if caught in his depredations, gives no quarter to his assailant. And yet we are expected to accept as real the compassionate feelings expressed towards him by those who must be fully aware of his true character. Well, all things are possible to them that believe; and, after all, a generation that has accepted the swaggering, debauched, semi-brutish African negro as a highly intelligent and deeply sensitive specimen of human nature, may be excused for regarding the cowardly, sneaking, vindictive poacher as the poor victim of untoward circumstances.

In the book before us we have a narrative—founded, as we understand, almost entirely on fact—of the experiences of a gentleman who, being fond of shooting, purchased a neglected estate, and by degrees stocked it fairly, but not superabundantly, with game. Of course his ultimate success depended mainly on the efficiency and integrity of his keepers, and the centre of interest in his experiences is a model head-keeper whose services he was fortunate enough to secure, and who need never want a place if his present master should happen to change his opinions, and should become convinced of the iniquity of the Game-laws. A good head-keeper is a rarity. Not to say that he too often betrays his master's interests, and acts in collusion with the very poachers whose depredations he is supposed to check, the qualifications absolutely necessary to make a first-class head-keeper are rarely found in persons of the class to which he belongs. The ordinary keeper, even if he is honest, too often does his work in a slovenly, unintelligent manner; nor is it likely that his naturally dull perceptions will be quickened by the baneful system of petting and spoiling which, we are given to understand, is nowadays adopted towards him as commonly as it was a few years ago towards jockeys and professional cricketers. A good keeper ought to be nothing more than a servant entitled to fair wages for fair work, not a dignitary to be exorbitantly fee'd for showing good sport for one week in the year. He should be a man of steady and active habits, and of considerable powers of endurance. He should not only be minutely acquainted with the habits of the game which he is engaged to protect, but also with the habits of their enemies, feathered or four-footed. He should have, in short, a keen eye for nature, and be able to interpret the why and wherefore of all that he sees in his daily rounds. He should have something of the instinct of a practised backwoodsman, and be able to read signs unnoticed by an ordinary observer. A broken twig will sometimes tell a tale to one who can comprehend it; and from the slightest indication of disarrangement in a fence, or of small apertures in a wall, or of a displaced paling, or a half-buried peg, a watchful observer will detect the hand of an enemy, and will organize a counterplot. Such an invaluable servant is our hero, Mr. Thornton; but though he may in the main be sketched from life, we think that "Deadfall" must have drawn somewhat on his inventive powers to produce such a paragon of excellence. Not only is he a first-rate shot—that is so ordinary a qualification that we omitted it from our enumeration; but he has an extraordinary power of vision, and an intuitive knowledge of the intentions of every man, beast, bird, and creeping thing to be met with for miles round. If he sees a countryman half a mile off, he examines him through his glass; from the appearance of his coat he deduces what he has got or what he is accustomed to carry in his pockets, from the looks of his boots he infers the kind of soil through which he has lately been travelling, from the condition of his gaiters he perceives whether he has been scrambling through thorns and brambles. And so with the animal world. The sudden disturbance of a flock of sheep, the hurried cry of the grey plover, the uneasy flight of wood-pigeons are all so many pieces of valuable information which he notes down and turns to profitable use. Carrion crows and magpies are crafty creatures; but Mr. Thornton sets craft against craft and outwits them, and would, we verily believe, succeed in the hitherto unaccomplished feat of catching a weasel asleep. Add to all these varied gifts his scrupulous honesty, his abstemiousness, his respectful demeanour, his incessant vigilance, and his power of invariably turning up at the right moment and in the right place, and we cannot help expressing a fear that for a head-keeper in these latter days Mr. Thornton is a little too good to be true. This, however, in no way diminishes the worth of this book as a record of interesting and often novel facts connected with the ordinary natural history of our country. We shall be surprised, most of us at any rate, at finding how little we have known about the habits of the magpies, crows, rooks, jays, hares and rabbits, that we have seen every day of our lives. There are also some capital practical hints about shooting—one in particular at p. 93, as to the proper way of shooting over a wall, has attracted our notice; and to any lover of sport, who also takes a personal interest in his plantations and covers, we cordially recommend this useful and instructive little volume.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. GIRAUDEAU'S letters to the editor of the Constitutionnel, now published together under the title Nos Mœurs politiques, begin with a statement which is so much like a paradox that it is calculated to make us look with suspicion at the contents of the book itself.* "The Emperor," he says, "is leading us towards self-government. We already enjoy the most essential parts of the system, and the remainder must naturally follow; as, in 1850, people exclaimed L'empire est fait, so we may exclaim to-day L'empire libéral est fait." To make such an assertion implies a total ignorance of what liberal institutions really are. M. Giraudeau goes on to say that if constitutional governments have so often made shipwreck, it has been the fault, not of the pilot, but of the crew. The freedom of a people does not necessarily depend upon the institutions by which they are ruled. Give to one nation the most Draconian code of laws, they will extract liberty from it; bestow upon their neighbours the most liberal rule, they will turn it into an instrument of despotism. Hence, for M. Giraudeau—and, let us add, for all sensible persons—the conclusion that a nation should receive a sound political training. In the first place, the people must take a real interest in the administration of the country; in the second, they must learn to respect the law. Such are the two propositions which M. Giraudeau has endeavoured to prove by a comparison between the political life of his fellow-countrymen and that of other European nations. He is very severe on the excesses of the press, and on that unfortunate disposition which in France makes the minority under every régime anxious to upset the law only because they are the minority; but we might fairly ask whether the best way of insuring respect to the law is by using it as a sanction to shield the most arbitrary measures which despotism can devise. As far as France is concerned, the problem of self-government is, we fear, not nearer its solution than it was thirty years ago, and he must be a bold man indeed who can suggest any remedy to a state of things which originated long before the days of the Napoleonic dynasty.

If the decay of what M. Giraudeau calls mœurs politiques is an evil to be deplored, it is chiefly because political indifference is generally accompanied by a low standard of private as well as public morality. Such is the lesson we gather from M. Delorme's new volume, César et ses Contemporains.† The author cautions us against trying to find in his book political allusions; the subject he discusses does not admit, he thinks, of any parallel between the Romans of the Imperial epoch and modern France. Religious beliefs, institutions, manners, the elements of society, and above all the constitution of the army, present no point of similarity in the two nations, and it would be useless to try to read from the life of Cæsar a sermon against Napoleon III. M. Delorme is no doubt perfectly sincere in his statement, but there are not many persons who would endorse it; what are indeed the various works of M. Dubois-Guchan‡, M. Romieu§, M. Beulé||, and M. Ampère¶, but protests against this assertion? What is the publication of the Emperor's Life of Julius Cæsar, but a direct endeavour to show that the France of the nineteenth century, being precisely in the same condition as the Rome of the time of Cæsar, should be governed in the same manner? We have, however, no wish to judge M. Delorme's work by a standard which he does not recognise; we are willing to view it exclusively as a résumé of a certain epoch of Roman history, and, thus considered, it is an interesting book, well deserving attentive perusal.

Count d'Alton-Shee, peer of France under the reign of Louis-Philippe, and afterwards noted for the exaggeration of his Republican opinions, has just published two volumes which may both be considered as forming parts of his memoirs, although from different points of view, and reflecting different sides of his character. The mémoires, properly so called , extending from 1826 to 1839, give interesting details respecting the leading men and principal events of that remarkable epoch. M. Guizot and M. Berryer, the Laws of September and the state of the periodical press—in fact, the whole history of the twelve years which ended with the downfall of Count Molé's administration—come under our notice, and form the subject of a series of very amusing chapters. The author has, perhaps, allowed too much space to adventures which are not equally interesting to the majority of readers, and which might have been reserved more appropriately for the *Mémoires du Vicomte d'Aulnis. This book, we repeat, is evidently another fragment of M. d'Alton-Shee's autobiography; and we must add that the details it gives us are of a nature which is not entirely edifying.

The hackneyed subject of freedom of thought and of opposition to the compelle intrare has suggested to M. Victor Guichard five hundred pages of special pleading against the Church.† He is ready to bear with all religions, all forms of worship, all creeds, all opinions, provided those who profess them use persuasion only in their endeavour to convert the masses; but as soon as they appeal to violence, he refuses to acknowledge their claims to spiritual power. The development of this thought is given in the shape of a rapid and animated sketch, showing by what means the Roman Catholic Church has gradually acquired the influence which it enjoyed until very lately, and describing the results of the power thus obtained. M. Guichard has, in fact, written a manual of ecclesiastical history which may be recommended to the consideration of the approaching Œcumenic Council.

The lamentable state of political education in France—which M. Giraudeau, as we have said, inveighs against so strongly—strikes with equal force M. Paul Lacombe, the author of an excellent volume entitled Mes Droits.‡ The government, he observes, is virtually at the present time in the hands of that section of the people which is the least capable of directing its course wisely, for those on whose support the Emperor chiefly relies are the peasantry and the workmen, who know very little of politics, administration, and law. Whether that ignorance is the secret of the success with which the present system of rule has been carried on is quite a distinct question. M. Lacombe starts by denying in toto the famous theory of Jean-Jacques Rousseau on the origin of society, and he maintains that the political community can never be justified in any attempt to limit or abolish the rights of the individual.

M. Franck assumes a higher position§, and instead of limiting himself to the study of political principles, he surveys the whole ground of ethical philosophy. Beginning with a definition of that science, he shows on what foundations it rests, and aims chiefly at establishing a broad distinction between what is honest and what is useful—a distinction which of course implies the author's condemnation of utilitarianism. Having settled the preliminary part of his subject, M. Franck goes on to discuss the various topics more intimately connected with it. He explains the nature of our duties both towards ourselves and towards our fellow-creatures, whether as connected with us by the ties of blood or simply as belonging to the same political community; and he concludes by maintaining that the laws of ethical science, in the various forms under which they can be applied, derive their sanction from those elementary religious truths which to some extent are found in all societies.

Mountain warfare necessarily presents features of interest and excitement peculiar to itself; and M. Ducuing‖ has described in a very spirited manner a few incidents connected with the African campaigns of Marshal Bugeaud, and the remarkable effort made in 1834-35 by Zumalacarregui to upset the throne of Queen Christina. In his chapter entitled "Les Dominations françaises" M. Ducuing has attempted to relate one of the most striking passages connected with the history of his country. French colonization has always been more or less of a failure, and in whatever way this fact may be explained, the fact itself is undeniable. In Canada, on the banks of the Ganges, in Syria, in Egypt, in South America, the French have left traces of their presence; but nowhere can they point to a permanent colonial establishment that has visibly extended their national power and influence. Maladministration, military incapacity, and want of experience might account for certain failures; but when we see all efforts to colonize end in disappointment, we are naturally led to the conclusion that there is some element in the national character which renders Frenchmen unfit for the arduous task of political emigration and settlement on a large scale. Everywhere France has introduced the principles of civilization, nowhere do we find the stamp of her power. According to M. Ducuing, the true account of the matter would seem to be that Frenchmen are too perfectly disinterested in their efforts to carry throughout the world the torch of progress, and, we suppose, are willing to sow that others may reap. This explanation is not perhaps strictly correct, but no one can be offended at hearing that his extreme generosity has been the cause of his ill-success.

If writers on natural history were to follow Buffon's plan, and begin their scientific treatises eighteen times over, what would become of M. Figuier?¶ Not only does he publish, under the title Merveilles de la Science, a periodical which requires an amount both of care and of research quite sufficient, one would think, to occupy an author's whole time; not only does he give us every year a scientific handbook which is by far the best résumé of its kind; but his Tableaux de la Nature succeed each other with the greatest punctuality, and the approach of Christmas is always marked by the publication of one of those beautifully-illustrated volumes which have done so much to make the study of natural history attractive. The mammalia form the subject of this year's instalment, and never did M. Figuier's peculiar talent show itself to greater advantage. We must not expect from him, of course, pages like Buffon's description of the horse or of the dog; but, on the other hand, he is never dull, and he has the great knack of selecting from a mass of facts those which are most characteristic and interesting. Moreover, the instruction he supplies is not the less solid because it is offered in an agreeable form, and whilst bestowing special care upon the descriptive element of his work, he does not neglect the practical part. All the uses and applications of animal, vegetable, and mineral substances are duly noted.

Messrs. Hachette's Bibliothèque des Merveilles has lately been enlarged by the accession of several new volumes. M. Sonrel describes the wonders of the bottom of the sea.* But how can we reach them? Take my diving apparatus, says M. Rouquayrol. Dressed in a costume half wool, half leather, carrying on his back a box full of compressed air, and having his face protected by a glass mask, the diver can boldly venture even to the depth of 180 feet, and bear the enormous weight of seven atmospheres pressing down upon him. Even at that comparatively small distance the forms of animal and vegetable life are marvellous enough to rivet our attention and excite our curiosity. What would they be if we could penetrate to those depths where only imagination can roam?

Muscular strength and skill have produced results which are fully entitled to a place in the category of wonders.† At the same time M. Depping warns his readers against the supposition that he is going either to give them a treatise on gymnastics, or to describe the extraordinary feats of MM. Blondin and Léotard; with the exception of a peep at the heroes of "the Ring," he keeps strictly to classical anecdote, and to the athletes of days gone by. The first division of his book is taken up by stories in which physical strength predominates; in the second, we have the manifestations of skill. Pedestrianism, swimming, diving, jumping, walking on stilts, the sling and the bow, the pistol and the sword, the boomerang and the lasso—all these topics, duly illustrated with woodcuts, contribute their share to the Bibliothèque des Merveilles. Anecdotes judiciously selected serve to give additional interest to the book, whilst they authenticate, to some extent at least, the prodigies which M. Depping relates.

The two volumes we have just described may be regarded as belonging to the category of Christmas books; let us name in the same class the various works forming part of the "pink library" published by Messrs. Hachette for the special benefit of young people. This new collection includes fairy tales, moral stories in the style of Miss Edgeworth's, abridged and revised editions of authors like Molière, Racine, Cardinal de Retz; and, finally, accounts of travels to distant lands. This part of the series is under the immediate editorship of M. Belin de Launay, who is fully equal to his task, if we may judge from the narratives he gives us of the expeditions which have made the names of Speke, Grant, and Baines so celebrated.‡ One of the great difficulties in works of this kind consists in identifying the proper designations of cities, rivers, and tribes; thus the people whom Sir S. Baker describes as the Bari are called by Captain Speke Vounyaberi, and a place marked as Waino on Dr. Livingstone's map is called Ouhiyow by Burton. M. Belin de Launay has solved the problem by giving to those various places a spelling in accordance with French pronunciation.

M. Edmond de Guerle's Life of Milton§, compiled chiefly from Professor Masson's well-known book, does not require any detailed notice at our hands; it is written in an appreciative spirit, and shows, on the part of the author, a better acquaintance with our literature than is generally found among foreigners. Paradise Lost, and to some extent Paradise Regained, are known on the other side of the Channel, but we suspect that very few Frenchmen have ever heard of the Areopagitica. To French readers desirous of knowing something about Milton, M. Edmond de Guerle's volume will prove an agreeable and trustworthy guide; and his position as a Protestant enables him to seize certain points in Milton's opinions and writings which a Roman Catholic critic would be far less likely to estimate correctly.

The delightful volume of autobiography which Madame Edgar Quinet has published under the title Mémoires d'Exil‖ derives its chief interest from the vein of melancholy that runs through it. We enjoy the perusal of the book because the impulses of a generous heart are manifest in every page; at the same time it is melancholy to think that dreams which seem never likely to be realized keep the writer and her friends far from the native country for whose happiness they would gladly sacrifice themselves. It is natural for persons like Madame Quinet to look with a feeling of despair at the results of the democratic movement of 1848; but if they coolly examine the elements which were at work when the throne of Louis-Philippe fell to the ground, can they be astonished at the failure of the attempt to establish republican institutions in a country like France? All honour to those who, following the example of Edgar Quinet and many others, preferred to be banished rather than to sacrifice their earnest convictions; but it is not the less true that they pursued a Utopia, and endeavoured to give vitality to a mere phantom.

It is remarkable that even Frenchmen have now begun to give up their former blind worship of the petit caporal. What was once the popular version of the battle of Waterloo is at present discarded on the other side of the Channel as well as on this, and it is no longer considered a proof of patriotism to show that Napoleon was the victim of destiny, and not of his own blunders, when the ever-famous 18th of June ushered in his destruction. We cannot, of course, surmise how the forthcoming instalments of the Emperor's Correspondence will deal with this delicate question, or what evidence they will bring towards a solution of the problem. The present volume * describes the campaign of 1813, and places before our eyes all the facts connected with the celebrated battles of Lutzen and Bautzen. It is amusing to watch, as the course of events goes on, the efforts made to keep sinister rumours hushed up, and to prevent the Empress Maria-Louisa from reading the reports periodically sent in by the police. The most curious part of the whole business is that the newspaper articles giving an account of the campaign were known to be officially manufactured, and yet they were so badly written that Napoleon thought a plain statement of the truth far preferable.

Dr. Montucci's forcible but one-sided article on Trades'-Unions, originally published in the Revue britannique †, is suggested by the Sheffield disclosures. Dr. Montucci condemns Trades'-Unions as essentially tyrannical, and he contends that, far from being a symptom of progress, they are, on the contrary, an unconscious imitation of the restrictive laws which prevailed during the middle ages amongst the guilds or corporations claiming the monopoly of certain branches of industry. He then goes on to argue that in the long run the workmen must suffer from the attempts they make to coerce capitalists, and he pronounces it absurd to hope that a sound knowledge of political economy will correct the mistakes of the Unionists. Political economy, he says, cannot be learnt at twenty-four hours' notice, and out of any given number of workmen very few indeed could understand the principles of a science which is far from being easy.

The recent novels which the Paris press has sent forth are still characterized, as of yore, by strong appeals to the sensational. Thus the heroine of M. André Léo's book Aline-Ali ‡, disgusted with marriage by the revelations which her married sister makes to her, wanders about in man's costume, and having become acquainted with a certain Paolo, she very naturally inspires him with the most enthusiastic attachment, which he considers as mere friendship, but which merges into love as soon as an accident discloses the sex of the romantic young lady. Ali is found out to be Aline, and although the remembrance of what her sister Madame the Marquise de Chabreuil has told her prevents her from receiving the addresses of the ardent Paolo, she at length consents, but only when it is too late. M. Léo's volume is evidently meant as a denunciation of what are called mariages de convenance. The author has borrowed from M. de Lamartine the character of Aline-Ali, who is nothing but a pale imitation of Laurence, and he has also reproduced some of the declamatory nonsense which George Sand's early novels contain at every page.

M. William de la Rive's tale§ does not aim at preaching love unfettered by the marriage contract, and the emancipation of the fair sex; it is a narrative of jealousy, leading to hatred, and ending in a terrible catastrophe.

There are two ways of describing the Parisian bourgeois. An author can make them odious by representing them as patterns of selfishness, rapacity, conceit, and jealousy; or he can simply depict their amusing ignorance, the narrow circle of their ideas, and that petty ambition which, combined with the most thorough want of taste, leads them to blunder about in happy unconsciousness of their own defects. M. Edmond Ourliac has selected the latter of these methods, and his Proverbes et Scènes bourgeoises ‖ form another contribution to that class of works which Henry Monnier and Paul de Kock have rendered so popular.

THE late ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY, in a

Sermon preached by His Grace on behalf of the CANCER HOSPITAL, London and Brompton, said:—"There is no disease more pitiable than that to which this Institution is specially devoted. From the first symptoms of attack one long course has commonly been prognosticated—a fearful looking for of a lingering progress towards a death of anguish. Could the greatness of the suffering be laid before you—could you be shown its severity so as to see it in its true proportions and natural colours, no one endued with the feelings of humanity could resist the spectacle; they would think all they possessed a trifling sacrifice if, at such a price, they could mitigate such misery; and yet they know that these sufferings exist as surely as if they were spread before their eyes. This, therefore, is a case in which I may justly ask your liberal contributions, that the relief afforded by this Hospital may more nearly approach the amount of misery it endeavours to remove."

THE CONFERENCE.

THE Conference which meets, or fails to meet, to-day appears to have been summoned with unusual hesitation. Since the refusal of all the European Governments, four or five years ago, to adopt the Emperor NAPOLEON'S project of a deliberative Congress, it has become abundantly clear that a meeting of Plenipotentiaries ought to follow, and not to precede, a definite understanding. In the middle of the Danish war an abortive Conference assembled in London for the hopeless purpose of persuading two great Powers not to complete the conquest of a petty State. As might have been expected, the only result of the discussion was to involve the mediating Governments in a share of the humiliation which was more immediately inflicted on Denmark. Neutrals ought not to meet belligerents in conference unless they are prepared to enforce the acceptance of their counsels. The discussions at Prague in 1813 were not an idle form, because Austria had 200,000 men to throw into the scale as soon as NAPOLEON rejected reasonable conditions of peace. The Conference which patched up the Luxemburg dispute two years ago had the easy task of recording and putting into formal shape a compromise which was already arranged. It fortunately happened that neither disputant was wholly in the wrong, or absolutely in the right; and it was still more to the purpose that France, as well as Prussia, wished for the time to avoid a war. It was more agreeable to both parties to defer to the advice of common friends than to make direct concessions to an opponent; and the disinterested members of the Conference contributed to the settlement a guarantee which served the immediate purpose, although, according to Lord STANLEY'S interpretation, it was intrinsically nugatory and worthless. The representatives of the Great Powers have been once more invited to meet for the purpose of settling the troublesome dispute between Greece and Turkey. Their functions are confined, it is said, to an examination of the Turkish ultimatum, which is to be wholly or partly recommended to the acceptance of Greece. The task would seem in itself to be simple and easy; but an uncomfortable suspicion prevails that one or both of the principals in the dispute may prove to be contumacious. The Conference was proposed by Prussia, a Power which is believed to favour Greece, and it is not absolutely certain that the Porte will desist from hostilities unless substantial security is provided against a repetition of the outrages perpetrated by the Greeks. The Turks, Mahometans as they are, barbarians as they may be called by their enemies, have still some human feelings which are probably shared by the SULTAN himself. Their resentment may perhaps prevail over their prudence, if they find that their European patrons will neither protect them nor allow them to defend themselves. If resistance to the decrees of the Conference proceeds from the Greeks, it will be evident that they trust to the insincerity of one or more of the mediating Powers. If it is true that the Greek Government is buying ironclad ships, and preparing costly armaments, the necessary funds cannot be drawn from the empty Treasury of Athens.

The official Turkish statement of the suppression of the Cretan insurrection has been fully confirmed. The surrender of the Greek volunteers seems to prove that they can no longer find a refuge in the disturbed districts, while they are too weak in numbers and resources to sustain the war on their own account. Even if any of the Christian population of the island were still in arms, the despatch of succours from the mainland would be impeded rather than facilitated by the existence of openly hostile relations between Greece and Turkey. The blockade-runners have hitherto been safe from attack, if they could escape into Greek waters; but in a state of war they would be exposed to the risk of being sunk in harbour. The termination of the Cretan struggle, if indeed it is ended, will be regarded by the friends of the Greek cause with natural regret. It is difficult not to sympathize with efforts to shake off an alien yoke; nor are the Greeks of the Kingdom to be seriously blamed for the irregularities which have been committed in aid of a kindred race, with the patriotic object of extending the Hellenic territory. On the other hand, candid observers must allow that the Turks were justified, by sound policy as well as by legal right, in their pertinacious determination to retain their hold on the island, and in their steady rejection of all foreign intervention. The surrender of Crete would have been immediately followed by insurrection in some of the Continental provinces, and it was better to fight out the original quarrel than to engage in an endless succession of similar contests. As the majority of the inhabitants of Crete are Greeks and Christians, it would probably have been on the whole desirable that the insurrection should succeed; but, as it has failed, it is better that it should not be artificially revived. Even the most thoroughgoing philanthropists must allow that there is a presumption in favour of peace; and in default of a civil struggle in Crete, there is no plausible pretext for a war between Greece and Turkey. The Porte, having re-established its authority in the island, will certainly decline to obey any dictation on the part of the Great Powers with respect to its internal administration.

The survivors and successors of the English Philhellenists of a former generation still periodically taunt the English Government and nation with their alleged apostacy from a generous cause. Nothing could be more natural than the sympathy which was excited by the heroism of the insurgents, while it was further stimulated by religious and classical associations. In those days enthusiastic Liberals interested themselves in Spanish rebellions, and in South American wars of independence; and the struggles of Greek chieftains against tyrannical and savage Pashas were far more worthy of good will than the anarchical struggles of the West. It would have been well if the ultimate concession enforced on Turkey by England, France, and Russia had been dictated by a more cordial sympathy with Greece. The kingdom would have been more complete if the frontier had been pushed further to the north, and if Crete, and some of the other islands in the Archipelago, had been added to its territory; but as the settlement was made, and as it has now lasted for more than a generation, it can scarcely be maintained that justice to Greece requires that it should be readjusted without any excuse of international right. The Greek Kingdom, once constituted, became subject to the rules of public law, including the performance of the duties of good neighbourhood even to its former enemy and oppressor. Since the establishment of Greek independence, Turkey has advanced far more rapidly than Greece in the process of civilization. In the reign of MAHMOUD, a Turkish ambassador who had concluded an unpalatable treaty incurred the risk of losing his head on his return to Constantinople. At the present day Turkish Ministers recreate themselves with European tours; or, if they retire from office, they probably engage in political opposition. It has never been alleged that the Kingdom of Greece has had to complain of the proceedings of the Porte; and confidence of impunity affords no justification for incessant provocation and covert hostility.

The influence of England, if it is to be employed at all in the East, must be exerted on behalf either of war or of peace. The anti-Turkish party, in England and in Europe, although they may not understand the meaning of their own policy, virtually propose the encouragement of a crusade for the promotion of the Orthodox Eastern faith and for the aggrandizement of the Greek nation. More prosaic politicians decline to commit a flagrant wrong which would incidentally be extremely injurious to English interests. To them even Mahometans appear to have rights, nor are they satisfied of the expediency or morality of propagating either religious or ethnological creeds by the sword. Their doubts are not removed by the ostentatiously liberal doctrines of Russia, which maintained a different attitude towards the Greeks during the War of Independence. Alexander and Nicholas, while they regarded with pleasure every movement which tended to weaken Turkey, still affected to be the champions of the Holy Alliance and the consistent enemies of rebellion. The declaration of the independence of Greece was precipitated by the timidity of Lord Aberdeen, who was seized with a sudden panic of apprehension that Greece, in ceasing to belong to Turkey, might become a Russian province. The objects of the Imperial policy are not less effectually attained by intrigues with the Court of Athens, which become active whenever it is thought desirable to inflict some fresh annoyance on the Porte. It is true that patriotic Greeks regard with impatience the dictatorial patronage of Russia, and that the nation has more than once declared its preference for an English alliance; but experience has shown that no aid is to be expected from England in the pursuance of an aggressive and revolutionary policy. Thessaly on the one side, and Crete on the other, might be desirable acquisitions; and in 1827 it would have been almost as easy to detach a larger territory from the Turkish Empire as to effect the dismemberment which was actually accomplished. At present the coveted provinces belong to Turkey; and Greece has neither the power to reclaim them, nor a legitimate pretext for undertaking the enterprise. The alternative of peace and of the existing state of things is a general war, which would be certainly unjustifiable in its commencement, and probably disastrous in its consequences. No English Government is likely to incur the responsibility of the convulsion which the philanthropists desire.

THE PROPERTY OF RELIGIOUS CORPORATIONS.

As the moment approaches when disendowment promises to become a reality, and when the policy of those who advocate it is sure to be warmly and severely criticized, it is not superfluous to look back and see on what grounds the ademption by the State of the property of religious corporations has been practically based or can be theoretically justified. During the past century almost every country in Europe has witnessed some attempt to deprive religious corporations of their property, or of a portion of it, and in no country perhaps at the present time does the State refrain from exercising some control and supervision over the property which such corporations hold, or are permitted to acquire. But in every country to deprive a religious corporation of its property is considered a very strong measure, which it requires very special circumstances to justify. France first set the example to the modern world, and as it was Talleyrand who proposed the measure, it was certain that everything that could be said in its justification would be said in a broad and lucid manner, and that ample reflection would be bestowed on the evolution of the best theory that could account for what was being done. In spite, however, of all the specious arguments which he did his best to deduce from the general relations of the State and the Church, his one real defence of the proposal was that the State wanted the money. The State was insolvent and must get money somehow, and the people neither would nor could stand more taxation. The Church was rich, although tithes had already been relinquished, for it had vast landed estates. The only way the State could find to prolong its existence, and to prevent general panic and anarchy, was to take these estates and sell them. The State used, in fact, the tyrant's plea of necessity; and it is really on the same plea that in our own day Italy and Spain have based their interference with the property of the Church. The State was poor and the Church was rich, and the State, on whose protecting power all property is supposed to depend, could not endure that this distribution of the property it guarded should any longer continue. The spoliation of the Church being resolved on and assumed as inevitable, Talleyrand went on to justify it by saying that all which the holders of Church property were entitled to out of their estates was a decent maintenance, and that they held the surplus in trust to aid the poor, and to fulfil other benevolent and religious purposes. If, therefore, the State took on itself the burden of providing the clergy with a decent maintenance, and also engaged to aid the poor and fulfil the other trusts impressed on the holders of Church property, there was no harm done to any one. His lessons have sunk deep into the minds of those who have followed in his path, and in all the Catholic countries where great estates have been taken from the Church, the obligation to provide the clergy with what economical statesmen consider a decent maintenance has been recognised. But the true basis of the whole proceeding has been the poverty of the State, and schemes for providing the clergy with a maintenance have only been in mitigation of confiscation. That the State should take away the property of rich ecclesiastics, because it wants it very badly, seems a sort of proceeding that must necessarily endanger the tenure of all property. If a Government may pronounce a bishop to be too rich, why may it not also pronounce a nobleman or a banker to be too rich? If the property of religious corporations is attacked, on the ground that it would be very convenient to get hold of it, what property is safe? Theoretically there is no answer to this question, but practically it has been found that the spoliation of religious corporations has not made the property of lay individuals insecure. Private property is as secure in France or in Italy as it is in Austria or in England. The reason is that, excepting under very peculiar circumstances, such as made the partition of the estates of the French nobility possible, the number of interests which oppose a Government if private property is thought to be endangered is so great, and their force so overwhelming, that a Government is powerless before them. Whether the ademption of the property of religious corporations by the State has a tendency to induce the ademption of the property of lay corporations, is a point on which we have scarcely any experience to guide us, as there are no lay corporations out of England with property large enough and sufficiently apart from obvious duties which the corporation have to discharge, to be any guide. But if the property of the Irish Church were now being taken away on the ground that the State had urgent need of it, and must and would have it, we confess that we should not feel at all easy as to the security of the estates held by the City of London in Ulster. But of course there is nothing of this kind at work now. England is not in want of the money of the Irish Church. A nation with its Three per Cents. over ninety may at least expect to escape the reproach of being likely to rob a Church in order to avert bankruptcy; and we must look for the basis of disendowment in Ireland elsewhere than in such motives as have produced the ademption of Church property in France and Italy.

Talleyrand justified his proposal as an extraordinary remedy to be applied to a state of extraordinary evil. The State must exist, and in order to exist it must have the Church lands. But there is quite a different way in which the State may deal with the property of religious corporations—a way in something like the ordinary paths of legislation, and where the Government does not do a necessary wrong, but does what it thinks right in the interests of the nation. There are two cases in which, within the sphere of ordinary, as opposed to revolutionary, legislation, the State may take away the property of religious corporations. Either it may decide that the corporation is in itself a bad one, noxious to the community and the public and the Crown, and incompatible with the preservation of order and the maintenance of good government, in which case it may, from legitimate motives of self-defence, dissolve the corporation, and take its property, and apply what it takes to the best uses it can devise; or, secondly, the State may pronounce that a corporation, although serving a beneficial object, or one with which it may not wish to interfere, has too much property, or is in the way of acquiring too much property. It may be prejudicial to the State that a corporation should be extravagantly rich. As an example of the first case where the State claims a right to intervene, we may take the action of many Catholic countries at various times against the Jesuits. Here was a religious corporation which, as a matter of fact, did what the Governments of those countries considered to be such very great harm that they would not allow it to exist; and, if corporations are too bad to exist, they can have no kind of claim to have their property protected. Monasteries have repeatedly been suppressed on the same grounds, real or assumed. They are said to demoralize the nation, to cripple its industry, to degrade its character; and the nation that forms this opinion of them condemns them to dissolution, and takes their property from them. We in England, who, from ruling over all kinds of nations, have learnt to stand almost anything, have not hesitated in recent years to dissolve the religious association of the Thugs; and, although we are not aware that they held any corporate property, yet it may be presumed that, as they were working in honour of a recognised Hindoo goddess, they would have been permitted by the native law to do so, and most certainly we should have confiscated that property if we had found it in existence. Examples, however, of noxious religious corporations are of course hard to find, but examples of the interference of the State to prevent the property of religious corporations becoming too large are common enough. In France trusts for religious purposes are altogether forbidden, and there is nothing of which the more zealous of the Catholic party complain so bitterly. M. de Montalembert even goes so far as to declare that it would be far better for the Church in France to forego the aid it receives from the State altogether if religious trusts were legalized. In England we take no steps to prevent the accumulation of personal property in the hands of religious corporations, but the Mortmain Acts throw considerable difficulties in the way of their accumulating landed property. And it is quite in consonance with English habits of thought to conceive and act violently on a sudden jealousy of a religious corporation that the nation did not quite like or trust, and that it considered to be dangerously rich. This is a point that persons who talk glibly and pleasantly about the separation of Church and State in England would do well to consider. Mr. Gladstone was one of those persons—only that he has become a little more discreet lately—and spoke in an airy buoyant manner of the Church in England, with its ninety millions of capital, not being so badly off, even if it did separate from the State. But a Church associated with the State, the action of which the State not only knows but regulates, is one thing, and a Church with which the State has nothing to do is another thing; and whether in real life an English Parliament would ever let such a religious corporation have ninety millions of money is a question which no one can pretend to settle, but which, if the separation were effected at a time when public feeling did not strongly support the Church, might very probably be answered in the negative.

England certainly does not want the property of the Irish Church, nor can an Anglican Church in Ireland be pronounced a noxious institution, nor is the property of the Irish Church so excessive that the State need have any cause to interfere with it. Supposing that the day after a Disendowment Act was passed, a number of very rich enthusiasts subscribed to give the Irish Church exactly as much as it had lost, no one would dream for a moment of saying that the Irish Church should not hold what was thus given. On what ground, then, is disendowment to be justified? The answer is, that although an Anglican Church in Ireland is not a noxious institution in itself, yet the Anglican Church which happens to exist there has been rendered a noxious institution by receiving a special character from the State. And it received this special character by accepting or holding property from the State on conditions which, in the course of years, have made it an institution incompatible with the good government of Ireland. It enjoys large annual revenues in return for setting itself up as a symbol of the religious hatred of the conquerors to the creed of the conquered. The fulfilment of this condition makes it a noxious institution. It is not every kind of noxiousness that would warrant a Government in interfering with a corporation. But, in this case, the noxiousness is of a kind that forces itself upon our attention, and which we must deal with somehow; for it is contrary to the principles of that political party which commands a very large majority in the House of Commons, that an institution should hold large revenues on condition of serving as a symbol of religious hatred. Either we must alter all our constitutional scheme, and allow the minority in the House of Commons to govern the nation, or the Liberal party must be allowed to apply their principles in Ireland as elsewhere. But then the Anglican Church in Ireland is not a noxious institution in itself. On the contrary, it is as beneficial an institution as could be wished for. It is not necessary—and, if unnecessary, it would be very wrong—to suppress it or injure it or harass it, except exactly so far as may be necessary to remove from it that accidental character of noxiousness which it has unhappily received. It must have some of its property taken from it, because it is by holding this property, and by the impress which this property has given it, that it has become noxious; just as something must be taken away from its position as an Established Church, because historically this quality of an Established Church is connected with its other quality of being a noxious institution. But directly we have done enough we may stop. Directly we have removed from it the taint of being a symbol of religious hatred, we need go no further. When it is once made an innocuous institution, the State is not at all interested in lessening the control of its lay members over its clerical members, or in lessening its resources. It is not in any kind of way the business of the State to start the Anglican Church in Ireland as a poor voluntary body, under the dominion of zealots, and then see how the curious experiment will answer. If the Anglican Church in Ireland wishes itself to change its whole character, that would be a different matter. It could petition Parliament, and we might see what arrangements could be made for stripping it of every shilling, and letting a clique ride rough-shod over it. But at present, so far as is known, all it asks is to be left alone. We cannot let it alone altogether, for we cannot permit an institution to continue which in its present shape is incompatible with good government. But we may let it alone as much as possible, and hold our hand directly we have relieved it from that character of noxiousness with which it is unfortunately invested at present.

SPAIN.

Owing to the energy of General Caballero de Rodas, order reigns at Malaga as well as at Cadiz, and the National Guards of the city have been disarmed. The Malaga insurgents incurred a loss of several hundreds in killed and wounded; but the object or motive of the insurrection is not distinctly stated. Four months ago the expulsion of the Queen was supposed to have removed all the political and social evils of Spain, and the immediate advent of a golden age was confidently expected. Only cold-blooded sceptics expressed a doubt whether a successful revolt of the army and navy would necessarily put an end to military supremacy; and for a time it seemed that the nation itself had suddenly awakened to the necessity of reforming, not so much its institutions, as its political habits. The vague demand for religious liberty appeared to express generous aspirations; and the few economists in the community took occasion to recommend that the country should enrich itself by the adoption of free trade. A wise and liberal statesman at the head of the Provisional Government might have directed the agitation into useful channels; and it might even have been possible to discourage and suspend the constant interference of the army in political transactions. It was above all things necessary to bring the interregnum to a close before the patriotic enthusiasm of the sudden revolution had evaporated. It happened that the leaders of the movement were agreed among themselves on the form of government which was considered most conducive to the well-being of the nation. Prim, Serrano, and Olozaga were equally opposed to the establishment of a Republic; and it only remained to choose a constitutional King, and to present him for the acceptance of the people or of their representatives. It is unfortunate that timidity or incapacity, disguising itself in the form of self-denial, prevented the Provisional Government from discharging an obvious duty. With a feeble affectation they professed to refer to the future Cortes both the decision between a monarchy and a republic, and the selection of a candidate for the Throne; and, having abdicated their most important function, they committed the further error of delaying indefinitely the assemblage of the Cortes. The intrigues, the confusion, and the disturbances which have ensued are the inevitable results of a weak and dishonest policy.

In some parts of Spain, and especially in Andalusia, the very foundations of social order have been disturbed by the suspension of regular authority. The poorer classes have found it convenient to assume that rulers who were too modest to decide on the best form of government were also prepared to leave it an open question whether property should be protected. Communism, or promiscuous robbery, has extended over a large portion of the province, and it will probably appear that the Malaga insurrection was principally directed against the possessors of property. The members of the Provisional Government, who have assuredly no sympathy with the anarchical doctrines of the Communists, can scarcely be acquitted of culpable imbecility in having allowed their own political movement to degenerate into a social revolution. The right of property may, like all other institutions, be questioned by theorists, but it can never be practically assailed except at the cost of an internecine civil war. The unprincipled levity and folly of the French revolutionary leaders in 1848 led to the death of thousands of their dupes in the street battles of June. It will be well if General de Rodas succeeds in stamping out more summarily the corresponding turbulence which has been caused by similar incapacity in Spain. The Republican leaders are perhaps more directly responsible than the inert Government of Madrid for the disturbances of Cadiz and Malaga. It is highly improbable that Communism extends beyond the poorest classes; but in Spain, as in France, the popular fancy associates Republicanism with general license. The Republican majorities in Barcelona and in other provincial capitals have undoubtedly been swelled by the adhesion of the enemies of property and of order; and within the ranks of this party the largest and most vigorous section will for the time exercise a preponderating influence. If the result of the elections proves that universal suffrage is favourable to monarchy, the Republican victory will be speedily reversed. The respectable classes may not have courage to resist the multitude in the first instance, but they can always invite and secure the protection of the army and its chiefs. PRIM and his colleagues will probably be called upon to save society, after they have exposed it to an unnecessary convulsion; and an army which has overthrown a dynasty and suppressed a social revolution will, more completely and more ostensibly than before, exercise supreme authority in the State. It will be well if military interference is rendered unnecessary by the election of a moderate Cortes. The regular establishment of a nominally constitutional monarchy, under any dynasty which might be preferred, would perhaps not cause general enthusiasm, but it would avert civil war. The disarmament of the populace in several of the large towns increases the probability of a free election. Soldiers are the only disputants capable of reasoning with a rabble which carries muskets.

The only plausible excuse for the backwardness of the Provisional Government in proposing some definite settlement is the difficulty of choosing an eligible candidate for the Crown. Marshal PRIM, indeed, is suspected of a design to obtain supreme power for himself, either as Dictator in a Republic, or as Regent in the name of some titular King; but there is no proof that he really differs from his colleagues who wish to restore the recent form of Government with only a change of persons. Among the princely candidates for popular favour, the male heir of the BOURBONS offers himself as an absolute and Catholic King, while Prince HENRY, brother of Queen ISABELLA's husband, is profoundly imbued with Republican predilections. The Provisional Government, having at present no need either of an obsolete despot or of a Royal President of a Republic, will not concern itself with the pretensions of either candidate. There is perhaps originality, or more properly impudence, in the contempt which Prince CHARLES expresses for the fiction of constitutional monarchy. He is justified in the opinion that a legitimate Pretender would have been regarded as a hypocrite if he had affected a regard for free institutions; but there is some audacity in the inference that absolute government is suited to the Spanish character and traditions. The shameful and ridiculous history of Spain from PHILIP III. to FERDINAND VII. is a sufficient answer to all Carlist pretensions. The reign of ISABELLA, with all its disasters and scandals, was the most prosperous and the least discreditable portion of a period of two centuries and a half. Prince HENRY, who has always professed Liberalism, prefers the fame of WASHINGTON to the greatness of CÆSAR; or, in other words, having no chance of the throne, he would be willing to accept a President's chair; but he has probably little hope that his patriotic devotion will be appreciated at present. One Republic in recent times has elected a President on the ground of hereditary claims, with the result which was anticipated by his partisans, not without the approval of a majority of voters; but in Spain there is none of the enthusiasm for any branch of the BOURBONS which attached in France to the name of NAPOLEON. A Spanish Republic would, as long as it lasted, be administered either by a popular favourite or by a soldier. Nations which choose to have princes at their head may as well call them kings. King FERDINAND of Portugal is known as an upright and able man; but he is German by birth, and Portuguese by adoption, and he is not himself anxious to ascend the throne of Spain. The King of ITALY is supposed to be anxious that his younger son should be elected; and the recent visit of General CIALDINI to Spain was probably undertaken for the promotion of the Duke of AOSTA's candidature. The House of SAVOY has in former times aspired to the Spanish succession; and the greatness which it has recently achieved may perhaps recommend an Italian Prince to the choice of the Spaniards; yet the only reason for choosing an absolute stranger must be a determination to break finally with the BOURBON family. Marshal SERRANO and Admiral TOPETE still support the Duke of MONTPENSIER, whose children belong to the Spanish Royal Family. The Duke is probably, like the other members of the ORLEANS family, a man of sense and conduct; but he seems not to possess the arts of popularity. It was exclusively for his benefit that M. GUIZOT imposed on Queen ISABELLA the odious marriage which has accounted for her subsequent faults and misfortunes; but the Duke of MONTPENSIER was probably not himself a conscious accomplice in the crime perpetrated by the most unscrupulous of moral Puritans. The French Prince may perhaps have a chance of success when other candidates are found to be unavailable; and he stands alone among the supposed competitors in the advantage of being supported by members of the Provisional Government. There remains the Prince of the ASTURIAS, who, having the recommendation of being too young to govern, would necessarily be represented by a Regent; but it can scarcely be supposed that the Generals and Ministers who have irretrievably offended Queen ISABELLA will embarrass themselves by the selection of her son. A Regency would be a military Dictatorship; and the same power might perhaps be more conveniently exercised under the title of President. It is evident that the choice must virtually be made by the Provisional Government, although it may nominally originate in the Cortes. There would have been comparatively little difficulty in the process in September or October, and longer delay will add to existing complications. One of the consequences of procrastination may be seen in the present serious struggle in Cuba, where the local authorities are contending, on behalf of they know not what authority, with a formidable insurrection.

NEW YEAR'S DAY IN FRANCE.

THE Emperor of the FRENCH has evidently learned not to pitch his expectations unduly high. If there were any over-sanguine spirits among his diplomatic visitors on New Year's Day, they must have gone away chastened and corrected by his speech. He hopes nothing better for 1869 than that it shall be a reproduction of 1868. "The year now commencing" is to "contribute towards removing many apprehensions, and "strengthening the bonds which should unite civilized nations." But it is to do all this "like the one that has just expired." Certainly this is a material qualification. Considering that in the last twelve months there have been rumours of imminent war at least as many times, and that most, if not all, of these have been traceable directly or indirectly to the words or to the silence of the French official press, the EMPEROR cannot be said to take an encouraging view of the future. It is true that the "apprehensions" in question have to some extent been "removed" by the fact that nothing has happened to justify them. The French Government has cried "wolf" so often that even its own subjects are learning not to be frightened at the sound. Still it is scarcely desirable that a year of constantly recurring alarms should be accepted as a typical period of human history. If this is the happiest prospect the EMPEROR can hold out to Europe, his pacific assurances must be taken simply as evidencing his determination to make the best of a bad business. In this sense they describe the situation fairly enough. Just at present none of the Great Powers feel themselves prepared for war. Each of them has an alliance to contract, a weapon to perfect, or a railway to make. It is as a consequence of this want of preparation that "the moment a "difficulty arises they agree among themselves to smooth "away and avert complications." The causes of mischief are left untouched, but the effects are not allowed to exhibit themselves until it is somebody's interest that they should be seen.

Before the EMPEROR's reply to the Corps Législatif was published in the Journal Officiel, an impression prevailed in Paris that it had shadowed forth some concessions in the direction of freedom. When the exact words of the speech were made known they were not found to answer the popular expectation. The Emperor of the FRENCH has so great an admiration for Liberty that she can never be dressed fine enough to please him. On this occasion she appears as "that real liberty which can only prosper through respect for "the laws and a just balance of power." No exception need be taken to the description, if our experience of Napoleonic glosses did not compel us to read the words in a non-natural sense. In the opinion of the French officials, "respect for "the laws" forbids the subject to call a law a bad one, or to take any steps to get it altered. They judge political discussions by the standard of the old English libel law—the greater the truth the greater the libel. A "just balance of "power" is an equally equivocal term. It may stand for that mutual independence which prevents the Executive, the Legislature, or the Judiciary from encroaching on the province of the others. In France it seems rather to signify that ingenious adjustment of the Legislature and the Judiciary which helps each to neutralize the other, and renders both innocuous to the Executive. Thus explained, the Imperial compliment to the Corps Législatif is perfectly appropriate. Its co-operation "becomes every year more indispensable to "the preservation" of the peculiar form of liberty the EMPEROR has in his mind. Supposing the Deputies had mistaken their vocation and presumed to revise the Statute-book, or had disturbed the balance of power by declining to give the Government as much money as it wants, what would have become of "real liberty"? It is too tender a plant to thrive under strictly Napoleonic conditions; and if its natural lian, the Corps Législatif, had set the example of des-

[cur]sing the laws, it must inevitably have been withdrawn during the existence of this Parliamentary tyranny. Happily no such necessity has yet arisen. Each satellite in the Imperial system knows his appointed station and is content with his appointed work. Even the prayers of the clergy have their special function assigned to them. They "sustain and "console" the EMPEROR. In return for this crowning blessing HIS MAJESTY recognises "how indispensable it is to assert "the great principles of Christianity." Some of his hearers may perhaps wish that he had been a little more explicit as to what these principles are. To be taught "virtue, that "we may know to live, and immortality, that we may know to "die," is enough for the laity, but the clergy desire an additional pledge to support the Papal sovereignty, that they may know how to vote.

There is an air of unreality about these New Year's speeches which springs naturally enough from that want of any definite policy which has of late been so conspicuous in the EMPEROR'S Government. The causes of this continuous halting between two opinions are very well described in a letter from "An "Occasional Correspondent" which appeared in the Times of Monday. The EMPEROR has at present two strings to his bow, and he is equally loth to use either of them or to abandon either. The dread of Socialism engendered by the events of 1848 is one string, the dislike of Prussia engendered by the events of 1866 is the other. The EMPEROR cannot make up his mind to grant freedom to the French people, because to do so would be to confess that the Socialist bugbear ought no longer to excite terror. He cannot frankly accept the aggrandizement of Prussia, because to do so would make it difficult to divert the attention of his subjects to foreign politics whenever it happens to be convenient. Between this pair of alternatives—liberty or repression at home, peace or war abroad—his mind seems so nearly balanced, that he never takes any step in the direction of one of them without immediately correcting it by a step in the direction of the other. Every year that passes, however, makes it more difficult to govern France without either political freedom or military glory. The desire to fulfil his own repeated promises induced the EMPEROR to concede the Press Law of last year. By this means he has increased the number, and supplied a vehicle for the hostility, of the Opposition journals. It must be a very strong Government that can afford to take the fetters off its critics while it multiplies restrictions for everybody else. The fear of revolution which haunts the respectable and well-to-do classes throughout France has long been the corner-stone of the Imperial system, but an empirical terror is apt to lose its influence as time goes on. However much the burnt child may dread the fire, it can hardly communicate the full force of its apprehensions to the next generation.

That the fear of Socialism, which has so largely influenced the conduct of the French people during the last twenty years, is declining in efficacy, has for some time been apparent. The letter to which we have referred points out, however, that even this change is likely to advance the interests of the Government in some quarters. The Democratic party in France is stronger, and consequently less reticent, than it has been since the coup d'état. The writer quotes two recent elections—one for the Corps Législatif, the other for a Council-General—as instances of this change. In the former case, M. LAROCHE-JOUBERT was returned "against the efforts, not "only of the authorities, but of the whole Conservative and "landed interest of the district." In the second case, a Wallachian but lately naturalized in France gained his election solely by making speeches to the peasants in which he dwelt on their misery and his own readiness to serve them. A few successes of this kind might do much to revive the dying terrors, and to replace the Government in its old position as the last hope of order in France. If the Conservative instincts of the upper and middle classes should again be driven to rely upon the organization and vigour which the Imperial system possesses in an unusual measure, as their only protection against numbers and violence, NAPOLEON III. may once more be welcomed in his original character of the saviour of society. The future of France would be more hopeful if freedom were not confounded in the minds of so many of its people, either with hatred to the existing dynasty, or with the triumph of an impracticable democracy. The one sentiment makes it additionally difficult for the EMPEROR to modify his Government without risking his own downfall, while the other secures to him the unquestioning support of some of the strongest interests in France. It should be remembered, however, that the first of these feelings is in a great measure the creation of the system under which Frenchmen have lived for the last seventeen years. The Empire has treated every adverse criticism of the administration as a direct attack upon the dynasty itself, and, by so doing, it has made constitutional opposition impossible.

ELECTION RIOTS.

THE Reform League being in want of occupation just now, and its President especially having more ample leisure than he expected, it naturally takes up the Ballot as the most promising theme for agitation. There can be no sort of objection to this. The Ballot, like every other political institution, may be discussed nowadays without any prepossessions for or against it, since Mr. DISRAELI got rid once for all of the old Conservative cry against Americanizing our institutions. If the Ballot will do more good than harm, by all means let us get to it before this Session is over. But when it is offered as a remedy against intimidation, it is worth while remembering that there is one kind of intimidation against which it is utterly powerless—the intimidation practised by mobs at the time of the elections. This appears to us a most serious blot on our political system. It is monstrous that quiet people who want simply to do their duty according to the best of their abilities and judgment, and desire to record their votes and go peaceably home again, should be threatened and kicked and hustled, and have dirt thrown in their faces and the clothes torn off their backs, because a set of beery blackguards choose to think, or are hired to think, it good fun to insult them, and because practically such outrages are committed with perfect impunity. The notion has sunk deep into the popular mind that everything is allowed by the law at election times except actual murder. Assaults, robberies, and burglaries are regarded as the pleasant vagaries of jovial spirits in an hour of admitted license. The law and its agents do not hope to command any respect. The police are violently attacked; the returning officer, his subordinates, the candidates and their friends, are all put in danger of their lives; but the great lesson everywhere inculcated is that the mob must not be made angry, that the sufferers must grin and bear it, and that no one ought to be particular at election times. An intending opponent of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL for Ireland has only this week had an excellent opportunity of learning this lesson, and practically applying it. The two rivals were in the Court-house at Mallow at the time of the election, and the opponent of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, having announced his intention of not pursuing the contest, sat down. But he was not allowed to sit long in peace, as the reporter observes. A number of women with branches of holly in their hands rushed at him, flogged him well, and then turned him into the street. This proceeding, we are told, "formed an amusing prelude to the serious "business of the nomination." It may have been an amusing proceeding to the boys, but can scarcely have been so to the frog. Here was a man, whose only offence was that his political opinions were not those of the mob, violently assaulted, beaten and hustled into the street, in presence of the returning officer and of the highest law-officer of the Crown, and no one had any notion whatever that what was done was anything but a thoroughly amusing proceeding. It was part of the fun of an election, just as pouring flour on spectators is part of the fun of a Roman holiday. However, it may perhaps be said that a candidate runs his own risks; he chooses to put himself in the way of practical fun. He voluntarily adopts a position like that of a cockney who goes to the Derby with a long nose and a pea-shooter, and if he does not like being flogged with holly-boughs, all he has got to do is not to stand for a place where such floggings are thought amusing proceedings. But voters are surely in a different position. To vote is either a duty or a privilege, perhaps both; but, whatever it is, an English citizen ought to be protected in the fulfilment or exercise of it. Yet not only are voters assaulted and beaten and insulted, but persons who have nothing to do with the election at all, and who have committed no other offence except that of living in a town which sends a member to Parliament, are delivered over as a prey to the mob. Nor is this all. The law at election times declines to protect its own officers. The police are told to keep the mob in order, but if they are foolish enough to believe that their instructions are meant seriously, they will soon find themselves mistaken. The mob has only got to use paving-stones freely, and then if the police get their heads broken they may arrest any one they can lay hold of; but the legal authorities will be sure to look on the affair as a good joke, as part of the humours of election times, and will just give enough punishment to mark what they really think of the affair.

During the recent elections there were four counties in which election riots were of a very serious kind, if any election riots can be called serious. Perhaps it is better to look at such matters from the popular point of view, and to say that in these counties the proceedings were very amusing, much more amusing than merely flogging an unpopular candidate with holly-boughs. In North Leicestershire the populace was on the side of the Liberal candidates, who were unsuccessful, and exactly the same thing happened in Monmouthshire. The mob was therefore urged up to the pitch of amusing itself very strongly. It wanted the amusement of hunting, frightening, and bullying voters on their way to the poll, and it wanted the amusement of avenging an impending or ascertained defeat. At a place called Sheepshed, the amusement in which they considered it proper to indulge was as follows:—The poll-clerk was struck on the head by a large stone, and knocked down; the room where he was was attacked by a mob armed with sticks, and all the windows and window-frames were broken. The agent of the Conservative candidates was pelted into a public-house, the windows of which were immediately broken. A superintendent of police no sooner showed himself than he was spat upon and struck at; and, when he carried his audacity so far as actually to go to the assistance of a voter who was suffering from violence, the indignation of the crowd at his interference burst all bounds, and he and his men had to defend themselves by a regular charge, which they executed with much success. But the mob then took to its native paving-stones, some of the police were badly hurt, and the force had to retreat into a place of security. They had, however, recognised some of the most reckless of their adversaries, and in due course of time those apprehended were tried at Quarter Sessions. There was no doubt about their guilt, in the minds of the jury, and they were sentenced; but to what?—To three months' imprisonment. This was the amount of punishment considered adequate to the offence of heading a riot in which quiet voters were intercepted by force in the discharge of a legal duty, wantonly destroying property, and beating the police with paving-stones until they had to retreat into shelter, and anarchy was triumphant. The humours of election time are a good old English custom, and must be encouraged; and we think we may congratulate the magistrates in Quarter Sessions on having effectually provided that at the next election the proceedings will be very amusing indeed.

But the magistrates of Leicestershire, although they have some sense of electioneering fun, are not to be compared in this respect with the magistrates of Monmouthshire. At Tredegar a mob held possession of the town for eight or nine hours, and its amusement consisted in going up and down the streets, breaking the windows of every house whose owner had not given entire satisfaction and did not fall in completely with their just and well-considered views. Further, wherever they could get into a house, they entered and stripped it of its contents. This particular form of election fun deserves to be remarked. A man fulfils or exercises the legal duty or privilege of giving his vote. For this he has all his windows broken, all his moveable property is taken away from him and destroyed before his eyes. He might console himself by thinking that at least the law would avenge him. If any Tredegar voter cherished this illusion, it would have done him good to attend the Monmouthshire Quarter Sessions. Some of the ringleaders were apprehended and in due course were tried. To save trouble they all pleaded guilty. And what did offended justice do then? The magistrates were of opinion that, as all this was done at election time, no punishment whatever need be inflicted. The prisoners were discharged. They had but been keeping up a good old English custom—a custom inconvenient, perhaps, to quiet people who are beaten, and have their homes broken into and all their little household property destroyed, but still a fine glorious old custom, and one that, on the whole, deserves to be encouraged. It must now be taken as settled law in Monmouthshire that if one man breaks into the house of another, and beats him and destroys his property, he has only to prove that an election had been going on that day, and that he was assisted by a collection of blackguards as furious, violent, and drunken as himself, and then he will be let off scot-free. He has done no harm that the law will notice. He has only been having his proper amount of electioneering fun.

At the risk of being thought very un-English, we must confess that the national custom seems to us a national disgrace. Why should the law allow mobs to rule, and run riot, and do all kinds of violent mischief, because an election is being held? Why are quiet, timid, decent people to be practically deprived of their power of voting because the administrators of the law refuse to protect them, and treat their sufferings as a natural part of the fun of an election? It is evident that, after such decisions as those at which the magistrates of Leicestershire and Monmouthshire have arrived, there will hereafter be no limits to the license in which a mob will not think itself fully entitled to indulge. If violent assaults on individual voters, and on the ministers of the law, and the wholesale destruction of property in dwelling-houses, are to be considered at election time offences so slight that the law either refuses to punish them at all, or only punishes them in the way in which it would punish a boy who stole an apple off a street-stall, the mob will henceforth be relieved from all control and all fear of consequences. With people who can persuade themselves that such scenes of brutal cruelty, rapine, and anarchy can be excused on the ground that they are sanctioned by old English customs, it is perhaps vain to argue. It is probably more useful to consider what could be done to prevent them if it was conceded that they were evils at once great and remediable. A very bad custom, which is in some sense national, and which has just been fortified by grave magisterial decisions, cannot of course be got rid of all at once; but that is no reason why something should not be done to prevent it. If the HOME SECRETARY were simply to address a circular to the highest magisterial authorities in each county, and to point out the very serious consequences of treating these outbreaks of desperate ruffianism as pieces of good fun, a different tone would, it might be hoped, begin to pervade the legal authorities in dangerous electoral districts; and such a step would come with especial propriety and force from the organ of a Liberal Ministry just entering on office, as these outrages in Monmouthshire and Leicestershire were generally, although not universally, committed by mobs that pleased to call themselves Liberal. The magistrates are mostly Conservatives, and they are deterred from vindicating the dignity of the law by the fear of being accused of a desire to use their magisterial authority as a party weapon. It would greatly encourage and aid them if a Liberal Minister were to remind them that, even at the risk of bearing this reproach, they must uphold the law. But if this cannot be done—and it is very unlikely that a Home Secretary would in real life do anything that he was not absolutely bound to do—the Legislature might perhaps be induced to come to the rescue, and to provide that if certain offences were proved against a man at election time, the discretion of the magistrates should be more limited than it is now, and that the minimum punishment they could inflict should be one that would at least have in it some deterring force. There are also many indirect ways in which election riots could be prevented or mitigated. Nominations are an utterly useless nuisance. They whet the appetite of the mob, prolong the time of excitement and anarchy, and greatly increase the expenses and annoyances of the candidates. At any rate, if election time is to be a season in which the law is in abeyance, let it last as short a time as possible. It might also be desirable to adopt the American plan, which Mr. GOSCHEN has lately recommended, and close all the public-houses on the day of election. But things are not ripe for that yet. In the first place, we have no security that it would not be judged a permissible piece of electioneering fun to break open the public-houses and drink up all the available liquor without paying for it. And, in the next place, it is fearful to think of the energy with which an English mob would go in for its beer with the accumulated thirst of a whole day on it; and if the public-houses were opened directly the poll was closed, the behaviour of the mob after it had taken ten hours' worth of beer in two would be something appalling. But if some serious efforts to preserve order were made, and if it were distinctly understood that infractions of the law would be adequately punished, then to take away the means of intoxication while the excitement of polling was going on might produce a good effect, and might help the mob to remember that if they insisted on committing aggravated crimes, they could no longer count on the impunity which at present they enjoy.

CUBA.

THE mist which the telegrams had thrown over the Cuban movement is now dispersed, and a state of things is revealed far more in accordance with reason and probability than was at first described. There is not, as we supposed there could not be, a rising of the Caribs, for the simple reason that there are in Cuba no Caribs to rise. Poetical justice has been defeated by the complete extinction of a race which, too weak to resist its original conquerors, could never have survived to wage a successful insurrection against their descendants. The lovers of sensational retribution would perhaps have been equally pleased if the negroes had risen to avenge simultaneously their own and the Indians' wrongs. For the present, however, Exeter Hall must defer its pæans, and the Anti-Slavery Society may taunt its disciples at Madrid with a delay which bodes ill for the cause of negro emancipation. As yet there is no negro rising; nor does it seem likely that an independent and unassisted rising of the slaves will take place. The insurrection which has shown itself is essentially an insurrection of white creoles. The same feeling which fifty years ago burst out in the American colonies of Spain has burst out in Cuba. The creoles of Spanish descent desire to become independent of Spain.

It is not yet clear whether those who are animated by this desire constitute an actual majority of their own class. It is clear that they are not composed of the richer and more powerful planters. These have for the most part sided with the Government, and naturally long for the restoration of order and peace. So great is the alarm felt by many of them, that they have sent their families to Nassau and Kingston for shelter during the tempest of their political troubles. Those who have encouraged or taken part in the rising belong to the Liberal faction, which in the colonies exaggerates the violence of its prototype in the mother-country. Several causes have contributed to its formation and its strength. The foremost is the exclusive policy pursued by Spain towards her dependencies. While she extorts from all of them, and especially from Cuba, a large annual revenue, she treats them less as subjects than as dependents. After taxing them for her own immediate wants, she taxes them still further for the maintenance of large colonial establishments, which she fills, not with colonial, but with Spanish-born, officials. Thus the Spanish creole of humble birth and moderate fortune finds himself debarred from every prospect of bettering his condition. Without the capital to buy a plantation or to undertake a business, he has no hope of employment under the Crown, save in the most humble capacity. Not only is he affronted by the supercilious airs of Spanish officials, and the contemptuous opulence of creole planters, but he is perpetually wounded by the self-assertion of aspiring mulattoes and liberated negroes. A further incentive of discontent is supplied by the locality and circumstances of his education. In many cases he has been brought up in the schools of Philadelphia or New York. There he has imbibed the usual lessons of American liberty, to which his Southern temperament gives an additional flavour of acridity and strength. The sensitiveness of his own nature intensifies the effect of his lessons and his experience. The passion for liberty which he imbibes from his American preceptors derives warmth from his impulsiveness as a Spaniard and his humiliation as a colonist. He reads history; and, in America, history means the history of the United States, and little else. He sees how colonies, sparsely inhabited by two millions of men, battled against the armies and threw off the authority of Great Britain; and he asks himself if the same effort could not be made with the same results in his own colony. He remembers that Spain once owned boundless tracts on the American continent, and that her empire is extinguished for ever. He asks why Cuba should not win the same independence which Mexico, Chili, and Peru have won. He returns to Cuba when his education is finished, to find no employment for his talents, or only such employment as he may share with mulattoes and liberated slaves. He is poor in a country where subsistence is very dear; and he is without a prospect of any except the very humblest career. He is slighted, or he thinks himself slighted, by the official staff which is maintained out of the resources of the colony, and still more by the military who defend it equally against internal revolt and external aggression. In America he has formed connexions with men whose sympathies with freedom do not preclude a propensity to filibustering. He corresponds with them, and the main subject of this correspondence is the likelihood of effecting an invasion of his country with success. To such men as we have described, of whom there are many, a revolution like that which has occurred in Spain brings hope and opportunity. Any revolution in the mother-country is likely to cause a revolution in the colony sooner or later.

To persons who do not boast Spanish blood in their veins it may seem unaccountable that any people should exist who desire to reproduce anywhere, and especially on their native soil, the follies and the misgovernment of the Republics of Central America. Yet so it is; and men who would be indignant if accused of inability to distinguish between the sublime and the ridiculous are heard mouthing in the same breath the glories of WASHINGTON and the examples of Bolivia and Ecuador. It certainly was not an unreasonable speculation that, if the Government was overturned in Spain, it might also be upset in Cuba. But, however reasonable this may have been, it has hitherto proved to be illusory. The Provisional Government of Spain, undismayed by the uncertainty which clouds the political horizon of Madrid, has not hesitated to send a strong body of troops to the Havana. The instinct which has inspired this course of action is at once prudent and patriotic. The continued successes of the insurgents would inevitably lead to a filibustering invasion; and the cession of its richest colony either to native sedition or foreign adventure would be equally detrimental to the honour of Spain. At present she can ill afford to lose ground in the estimation of the world. Her single success against Morocco has not effaced the recollection of her equivocal triumph at Callao, or her unequivocal discomfiture in St. Domingo. Whether regarded from the point of view of national honour or national wealth, Cuba is far too precious to be lost without an effort to preserve it. Should General ESPINAS justify his selection for high command by the exhibition of greater skill or greater vigour than VALMASEDA, Cuba will continue to be the choicest possession of Monarchical or Republican Spain. But should he not be able to cow or conquer the insurgents, Spain, while hesitating as to her own future Government, may be startled by an embassy from the new Republic of Cuba.

This result may almost certainly be avoided by ordinary energy. There is doubtless a compact body of creole insurgents, whom wounded vanity and disappointed hopes have made ardent Republicans. But there are many men of substance, property, and influence whom self-interest alone would suffice to retain in faithful allegiance to Spain. Nor have the negroes any object in abetting the insurrection. There are many of them free, and, like the mulattoes, enjoying the profits of peaceful industry. Slavery in the crop-time is as hard in Cuba as it is elsewhere, but the cruelty is ostensibly that of Yankee supervisors rather than of Spanish masters; and the Cuban slaves are acute enough to calculate that their condition would not be substantially improved by a change which perpetuated the domination of their actual tyrants. What with the conservatism of proprietors and the neutrality of the coloured races, it will indeed be strange if ten thousand Spanish soldiers are not able to hold Cuba for Spain. If they are not, Spain will lose something more important than Cuba by defeat; and whatever Government she selects will be inaugurated amid the funereal solemnities of a national humiliation.

But the ill wind which has scourged Spain through Cuba has blown good luck to the capitals of two British colonies. Kingston and Nassau open their ports to the penates of terrified Cubans. If the indolence and despondency which shock the stranger in Kingston have allowed a decent house to remain, with doors which will shut and windows which will open at the pleasure of the inmates, their owners may eke out some profit from a seasonable hospitality. We fear, however, that we expect too much when we expect anything like personal comfort or decent hospitality for the stranger in Kingston. The majority of the refugees will find probably better entertainment in Nassau, where the impulse of the blockade trade caused the erection of many houses which its cessation has since made tenantless. These houses, and an hotel which the local Government constructed for the reception of American visitors, will afford a temporary refuge from the storms of Cuba. And if, among the refugees, there be any to whom the future constitution of their own colony is an object of meditation, their exile will give them the opportunity of studying the condition of a British dependency which, though small, is not unenlightened, and though poor, is not unrefined; where blacks and whites have secured the protection of their common interests by the temperate use of representative institutions and the equitable administration of English law. The time may come when the inhabitants, not only of Cuba, but of other Spanish dependencies, will find profit in such a study. They will then have the opportunity of learning that the solidity of Governments consists, not in the pronunciamientos of unprincipled officers, or the sequacious adhesion of undisciplined soldiers, but in the general recognition of common civil rights and the general toleration of conflicting opinions.

PRIMOGENITURE.

THE rule of distribution of landed property on the death of intestate owners would excite little interest if it were not supposed, with some reason, to involve an important principle. The supporters of the existing system have exhibited little prudence in recommencing the controversy; and it is highly indiscreet to boast of the alleged popular prejudice in favour of aristocratic institutions, and of unequal distribution of property. If the controversy were to be settled by sentiment, the great majority of the population would be inclined to restore the imaginary golden age in which every rood of ground maintained its man and its freeholder. A short experience would show how little the adoption of Mr. LOCKE KING's Bill would tend to produce that happy consummation. To promote in any perceptible degree the subdivision of the land, it would be necessary to restrict or abolish the power of testators, and to prohibit settlements and entails. The introduction into the United Kingdom of the law which prevails over the greater part of the Continent would be highly unpalatable both to large and small proprietors; but the majority of the present constituent bodies consists of those to whom ownership is an object, not of enjoyment, but of aspiration. The application to land of the statutes which regulate the distribution of personal property would cause no injustice. A man who intends that his eldest son shall succeed to his land may fairly be required to make a will, and the same obligation is at present imposed on the owner who has to provide out of his estate for the rest of his family. Succession to large properties is almost always regulated by settlements, and the owners of smaller freeholds are, as a class, not likely to be culpably idle and careless. It may be added that the large extent of real property which is held on leasehold tenure has always been subject to the laws which regulate the distribution of personalty. Zealous advocates of Mr. LOCKE KING's measure hope that the proposed change in the law will gradually modify opinion and custom; yet it is doubtful whether the ancient rule of succession to real property has any influence on existing practice. Although the law is the same for a hundred or for five thousand acres, large estates are almost always left to the eldest son, while, in the majority of cases, small estates are either technically converted into personalty, or divided among the children. The dwindling race of hereditary freeholders still struggles, in some parts of the country, to maintain its continuity; but, as a general rule, no man, in the common phrase, makes an eldest son, unless he can enable him to live as a country gentleman. It is true that in all, or nearly all, of the American States, where testators have absolute freedom in the disposal of their land, general opinion prescribes and enforces its equal division among all the children; but those who infer that the same law would produce similar results in England overlook the economic differences between the two countries. Except in towns, large estates are in America almost valueless, for the obvious reason that there are no tenants to pay rent for them. The possessor of an extensive tract sells it off in portions, as fast as he can find purchasers; and the State and the township stimulate his desire to turn his property into money, by compelling him to pay heavy taxes on his unproductive territory. An English estate, on the other hand, is most remunerative when it is large enough to pay for efficient superintendence, and to reduce the charges of maintenance to a manageable average. A great landowner, like a great shipowner, acts as his own insurer; and he can rely on a surplus income after providing for all necessary repairs. The owner of an estate of three or four hundred a year, unless he farms his own land, is liable to the risk of having it thrown on his hands; and, whether he is landlord or occupier, he finds from time to time that unavoidable outlays swallow up the whole or the greater part of his half-yearly income. A thoughtful testator will probably consult the convenience of his descendants by leaving his property in large masses or in small portions as experience has shown in which form it will be most advantageously enjoyed. Traditional feeling has undoubtedly much weight both in England and America; but when in either country it happens to coincide with obvious convenience, cautious reasoners will not attribute exclusively to sentiment results which might proceed from simple calculation. As long as it is more profitable to be a tenant-farmer than a freeholder, primogeniture is likely to prevail, unless it is prohibited by express legislation.

The social reformers who denounce the actual distribution of land in England have an uphill task to accomplish. The evils which they lament, though they may be indisputable, arise in but an insignificant extent from arbitrary causes. In a small, rich, and populous country there cannot be land for everybody, and those who can pay a high premium for ownership are likely to have the first choice. When real estates tend to gravitate into large masses, the removal of obstacles which impede transmission only accelerates the process of accumulation. If land were as readily saleable as railway shares, small freeholds would perhaps often be detached from large estates; but they would be not less rapidly reabsorbed by landlords and capitalists. Speaking generally, a poor man cannot afford to own land in England, inasmuch as he can always sell it on such terms as to increase his income; and the happy freeholders of the future must be protected against pecuniary temptations, as well as against the grasping propensities of their richer neighbours. The intimate connexion of large farms with large estates is one of the most remarkable peculiarities of the economical condition of England. As a rule, the occupier of five hundred acres must have a landlord over his head, for the simple reason that he cannot spare 12,000*l*. or 15,000*l*. to invest in the freehold of his land. His capital, which would return perhaps 3½ per cent. if it were sunk in land, yields from 10 to 15 per cent. when it is employed in his business. On the other hand, he can undersell the small farmer by economy in the application of labour and capital, and by skilful cultivation. It is more profitable to farm five hundred acres than one hundred, for the same reasons which cause large factories and large shops to supersede smaller establishments. Both the great landowner and the large farmer are products of economical causes, but in the case of the occupier there is no feudal abuse of primogeniture to denounce or to abolish. The enthusiastic advocates of petty freeholds cannot but admit that, if they had annihilated squires and lords, they would have accomplished nothing as long as the farmers were in the way; yet it is an arduous undertaking to overthrow the entire system of English agriculture for the purpose of substituting a more costly method of cultivating the land. It is possible that petty culture may yield the largest return of gross produce; but organized labour, aided by the skilful use of machinery, is beyond comparison more profitable. The substitution of theoretical advantages, moral or social, for considerations of pounds, shillings, and pence, however laudable and desirable, is likely, in England, to be a difficult task; and the landowners and their tenants, having in their favour, not only possession, but every argument which can be deduced from economical science, have apparently the means of offering a sturdy resistance to change. If the controversy should end in the maintenance of the present distribution of the land, it will follow that primogeniture must continue to be the prevalent rule of succession. It will evidently be useless to split up every estate into fragments at the death of the owner, if it is found that the scattered portions constantly tend to reunite. There are in England some overgrown properties which judicious testators would gladly divide among their children, as each share would be large enough to form an independent and profitable estate; but when a patrimony of 5,000*l*. a year is distributed among half a dozen devisees, it is almost necessarily sold, either to be absorbed in fragments by adjacent owners, or to become the undivided property of some capitalist who takes the place of the former owner. It is difficult to understand how the community can be benefited either by the substitution of one family for another, or by a diminution in the total number of landed properties. If primogeniture makes large estates, large estates, on the other hand, involve the practice of primogeniture.

Of all parties to the controversy none are so entirely without a locus standi as the enlightened young gentlemen of quality who complain to Mr. BRIGHT, in the smoking-room of the House of Commons, of the hardships which they endure as younger sons. For their social position, for their very seats in the House and their consequent opportunities of talking to Mr. BRIGHT, and for their portions as younger sons, they are indebted to the system which they affect to regard as a hardship. The family estate has indeed not been equally divided, but if the French law had prevailed in this country there would have been no family estate to divide. A testator who is accused of favouring his eldest son at the expense of his other children, may fairly reply that his grandchildren also deserve consideration. The collective inheritance of the second generation will, in a majority of cases, be larger under a system of primogeniture than after two equal distributions. Mr. BRIGHT must have been at a loss for authorities when he quoted the trifling prattle of grumblers who were not even sincere in their pretended discontent. It is not from the cadets of noble or wealthy houses that the present distribution of property has any attack to apprehend. Against more serious assailants it may rely with some confidence on the material utility which has, in spite of sentimental reasons, and of many considerations of social expediency, mainly promoted the accumulation of large landed properties and the cultivation of large farms.

MR. CHILDERS AT THE ADMIRALTY.

THERE has been much rambling talk of late on the supposed transformation which Mr. CHILDERS is to effect in the creaky administration of the old Board of Admiralty. We are not at all disposed at present to pass judgment upon what the new First Lord may have done, for the simple reason that neither we nor any one outside of the department, and possibly not even Mr. CHILDERS himself, have as yet any definite idea of what the threatened improvements are. What we, in common with all the world, do know is that Mr. CHILDERS succeeded to the presidency of a Board ordinarily composed of five incompetent members, and that he has added a sixth to the number. It has been said, on high authority, that in the multitude of counsellors is wisdom; but even if it be true (which we doubt) that six wise men are better than five wise men, it does not by any means follow that six Lords of the Admiralty will blunder less than five of the same species.

Mr. CHILDERS nevertheless is a man who has done valuable work in a subordinate office, and probably has the capacity to do good work also in his present position. Unfortunately this is the sort of praise which might have been justly bestowed upon many of his predecessors, who after promotion have done no good work at all. The crying want is, not capacity, but the will and the courage to carry out necessary reforms, without regard to the thousand and one influences which warp all but really strong Ministers into a wretched subserviency to established routine. And as yet we see no signs that in this matter Mr. CHILDERS is in any way superior to the ordinary ruck. In his speech on his re-election he said that, although he was assisted by a Board which, according to the technical character of its patent, divided its responsibility equally among all its members, he had accepted office on the understanding that all responsibility should be placed distinctly on himself. This is just the kind of tall talk which we were used to when Sir JOHN PAKINGTON filled the office to which Mr. CHILDERS has succeeded, and we all know how much good came of Sir JOHN PAKINGTON's boasted responsibility. In truth, we are heartily tired of this much-abused word "responsibility." There is no such thing, and can be no such thing, as vicarious responsibility. When a man stands up in the House of Commons and declares that he alone is responsible for all sorts of things done by all sorts of people, of the very existence of which he may have been ignorant, every one understands that this is a convenient arrangement for shielding the real blunderers, without fixing substantial blame on their chivalrous representative. The only responsibility worth anything is that of a man who acts and decides himself, instead of adopting the acts and decisions of others, and who may be called upon to give his reasons for the course which he has taken. Except on rare occasions, no such responsibility as this attaches to the First Lord of the Admiralty, and if it did, he would be the first man to desire that he should be served by efficient subordinates in the place of inefficient colleagues.

The broad principles of administration are violated in different ways, but with equal flagrancy, in the government of the army and of the navy. In the army we not only have a great executive officer enjoying a nominal independence of the Parliamentary Minister, but we have also the Minister in whom we trust so hampered by Horse Guards' officials, and so undermined by Horse Guards' plots, that he dares not assert, and cannot enforce, the authority which his position gives him. In the navy we have that most inefficient of all bodies, a Board; and now it seems it is to be a Board neither permanent nor political, without the experience which a permanent office gives, or the fidelity which political ties imply. This Board, which was always in reality of this epicene character, is now for the first time avowedly constituted on the principle of combining discordant elements. The man who is supposed to superintend the building of ships is to occupy a permanent seat. The man whose special duty is to look after the sailing and fighting of ships is to be a party officer, going in and out with the Ministry. Why this distinction? If it is right that the permanent head of one department should sit at the Board, it must be right that all heads of departments should occupy chairs by his side. Possibly an excuse may be suggested on the ground that the ship-building admiral is, after all, only a sailor and not a builder, and that the real head of the constructive department is his clever and prejudiced subordinate. This is true, no doubt, but the conclusion is not that Admiral ROBINSON should have a seat at the Board, but that Admiral ROBINSON might be dispensed with altogether.

But our objections to Mr. CHILDERS' plan lie much deeper than this. No tinkering will really mend the Board of Admiralty, or indeed any other Board. The idea is absurd in its inception. Once admit what Mr. CHILDERS proclaims, that—subject of course to Parliament—he is dictator of the navy, and the only question is, what sort of assistance a dictator not possessed of special technical knowledge would desire in the management of any great concern like the British navy? The answer is obvious. He would wish, first of all, that each special department should be placed under the management of a skilled and experienced chief, and that every such manager, when once secured, should be kept almost on any terms as long as his services could be retained. In the next place, he would above all things desire to have at his elbow a man whom he could trust, with matured experience which would enable him to supervise every subordinate department, and to correct the crude errors into which the untrained dictator, if left to himself, would be certain to fall. Such an assistant is perhaps even of more importance to a Minister than able chiefs of inferior departments. In the absence of such aid, an administrator (without long special experience of his duties, such as few Cabinet Ministers attain to) must fall into one of two grievous errors. If he is sharp and conceited, he ignorantly overrides the opinions of officials who must know more about the business than himself; if he is modest and thoughtful, he becomes a mere tool in the hands of subordinates, whom he feels himself incapable of ruling and yet unable to trust.

The remedy for these dangers is to seek and secure what every head of a commercial concern makes it his first business to obtain—a thoroughly competent and trustworthy permanent lieutenant. This is the prime condition of administrative success. What firm would prosper if every time that a change took place in its constitution, the manager was to be dismissed to make room for some private friend of the incoming partner? And how can the business of the country be efficiently carried on unless we have at the head of the permanent staff of each department a man in every way fit to keep it working on—in the old grooves it may be—without any impulse from above, and yet sufficiently intelligent to give effect to any modification of policy which his successive masters may desire to introduce. This first condition is, and must be, wanting where a Board is set at the head of a department instead of a permanent Under-Secretary.

The next, and not less important, condition is that each branch of business should be conducted, under the principal manager, by a subordinate chief, selected and retained in office solely for the value of his work, and not to be removed at the caprice of the momentary majority of the House of Commons. Even a properly qualified man takes years to become first-rate head of a branch of naval business; and yet the post is assigned to men often not qualified in any way, with no likelihood of their remaining in it for more than two or three years at the utmost. This is the essence of the Board system; and all this Mr. CHILDERS, the Reformer, proposes to retain. It is easy to understand, though not pleasant to say, why. There are one or two men—especially one man—in the present Cabinet capable of doing good strong work in the reform of stereotyped abuses of administration, and they have been placed in positions where there is nothing to administer and nothing of this kind to reform. In the great spending departments of the army and the navy we have Mr. CARDWELL and Mr. CHILDERS. One is an experienced and able official, with every qualification for the post except contempt for bad traditions and courage to defy the influence which has so long sapped, and perhaps may continue to sap, the vigour of our military administration. The other of these chosen chiefs of war has shown himself skilful in disentangling the confused web of naval accounts, and not less skilful in thwarting that pertinacious inquirer, Mr. SEELY, into Admiralty sins. Mr. CHILDERS took the leading part in bringing about the miserable compromise by which the Committee on Admiralty waste declined to pronounce judgment on the case which Mr. SEELY proved. We fear that it is in the same spirit that the First Lord of the ADMIRALTY has compromised the vital question of Government by a Board, by the singular device of choosing the nominal Controller of the Navy (above all men in the world) as the one permanent member of the hybrid body whose misfortune it is to waste the public money without securing us an efficient fleet.

JANUARY RESOLUTIONS.

THE beginning of a year is naturally the time when men with a propensity to make resolutions are especially ready to indulge it. No yearning is deeper, after one has passed five-and-twenty years, than the futile longing that somehow we could draw a trench between ourselves and what is gone by, and obtain the possibility of a fresh start. Novelists usually write as though this deep desire were only natural to the perpetrators of great crimes or the victims of heroic blunders. The majority of us, it may perhaps be fairly assumed, have neither perpetrated serious crimes nor involved ourselves in disastrous blunders, and yet the majority of us are often conscious of an intense wish that by some means or other we could begin things over again. The past gains upon men with such ever-accumulating force, there is such an ever-waxing pressure from behind, the web of circumstance and relationship so tightens and spreads and covers us up, that people without the gift of a wise resignation—in other words, most people —in moments either of supreme aspiration or of supreme despair, feel an indescribable wish that the start might be given them once more, and that all might again be as much of a tabula rasa as it seemed at the beginning of things. It is a poor substitute for this to have to fall back on the calendar for our new start; instead of a moral revolution, spiritual regeneration, obliteration of circumstance, to have to make shift with such change as comes with a new almanac and a fresh diary. Yet it is unwise to throw away even this comparatively moderate stimulus to good resolutions. If it is impossible to roll back the main forces of life, still there is always plenty of the minor conditions which, though minor, are yet full of real importance, which we can alter and control perfectly with just and reasonable effort, and over which the new almanac and the fresh diary give us new power.

The two things about which men's earliest impressions are wrongest, and which most of their virtuous resolutions, as life goes on, are likely to concern, are unquestionably time and money. Was it not Dr. Johnson who said that on these two points every young man is a fool? He can have no idea of the value of either one or the other; for as experience is the only way of reaching a moral wisdom that will stand wear and tear, and as in youth we cannot have any adequate experience either of the difficulty of earning and keeping money, or of the fatal celerity with which days and years also take to themselves wings and fly away, it is inevitable that a man should have passed a certain age before he appreciates at their true worth these two elements in the material out of which he has his life to make. Women seem in this respect, at any rate, to enjoy as of right one of the conditions of never-ending youth, and for exactly the same reason as that which confers it on lads. As a rule, they have no experience. Social arrangements—and we do not here inquire whether they are good or bad—have at least the effect of preventing women from feeling any very urgent necessity of redeeming their time, or of keeping their money, because they have in a general way so uncommonly little to do with the one, or to contribute to the making of the other. We may perhaps go on to say that they constitute one of the chief difficulties of the sex politely called stronger; for if men were to go into the matter statistically, they would probably find that those who set least value on time or money waste most of both upon women who stand to them in some relation or other; and thus it is that evil communications corrupt good manners, the thriftlessness of one set of persons propagating itself among another set who might have been decently thrifty of the two things best worth taking care of, if only they had been let alone. To resume, however; it is to the husbanding of time and money that by far the most part of the vast mass of good resolutions solemnly vowed during the past fortnight or ten days will relate. And perhaps we may aver, further, that the worst thing about these resolutions will prove to have been that they were too good and too great. Of course making resolutions is so easy and simple that one may as well go through the process handsomely as not. It is as good to draw a cheque for a thousand pounds as for five, where the banker has no effects; and if a man has no effects of purpose and sustained energy and power of resistance, he may just as well resolve heroically as moderately. He gains indeed by his resolution being too big for him, because he has at all events the benefit of that elation which accompanies anything big, almost as satisfactory to some people in promise as in performance. Yet it is this running after extreme virtue which reduces the final total of virtue so much below the point which, considering what human nature is, we might fairly expect it to attain. Who has not planned a year for himself, before now, in which there was not to be a moment wasted in frivolities or in leisure that should not be directly profitable? The year's project looks glorious on paper, and the mere sight of it, the mere perusal of the golden rules by which we have divided the days and the weeks, is calculated to brace one up to a splendid pitch of austere industry. Yet we were just as wise as the man who, being his own architect, designed a splendid house with many fine rooms, and one story upon another, and only found, when all was complete and superb, that he had forgotten the staircase. Nothing is so certain to fall swiftly and hopelessly to pieces as a set of resolutions which leave no margin, which are not roomy nor very elastic. The real tests of the wisdom of one's new year's scheme all lie in the region of its margins and fringe. The framework is pretty sure to be decently sound, as sound at any rate as the designer's knowledge of his own character, and of the circumstances by which his character is surrounded, can be expected to make it. The rules which a man makes for his business may be good or not; there is no general probability one way or the other; all depends on his individual rightness of comprehension. But in the rules for the disposal of time outside the quantity clearly demanded by business, there is a general probability, and you may partly judge of a man's common sense by the resistance which he offers to this probable tendency. If he fills up every moment of his day, and every day of his week, in a clearly outlined manner, we may be very sure that he is in so far a fool that within a fortnight the project will have utterly broken down, that his last state will be ever so much worse than his first, and that 1869 will abound in wasted hours even more plenteously than 1868. If he had only been willing to leave two or three hours in each day unprovided for, his designs for all the rest might very likely have saved themselves. By far the most prudent plan is to content oneself with providing time for what must be done, and for that only, leaving all other time to find its own best disposition according to circumstance. If you must get through so much reading or so much writing, or do anything else for any good and strong reason, then obviously one ought to have a clear idea where the time is to come from, and a rigorously drawn programme is one of the most efficient helps possible towards getting the desired work done. Without some such programme, and unless you stick to it, the hours drift away from between your hands, and you will be very lucky if by New Year's Day of 1870 one-fifth part of what was projected has been accomplished.

One thing is most certain, that if a man does not respect his own time and his own programme, nobody else will respect it. Even with the most strenuous and persistent efforts he will find it hard enough to make head against the resolute indifference of his friends to his programme. Nearly all men are absolutely relentless about the time of others. Without pity or remorse, happening to be at leisure themselves, they burst into your cherished hours for this or that given work, and rend and scatter and trample on them like playful swine. This monstrous inconsiderateness is one reason, if there were no other, why one should allot the time needed for necessary tasks with some precision, because to know clearly what you can do in a given time—and when you come to compose a schedule of your weeks and days, it is amazing how little, in one sense, you can do—convinces you more decisively than a loose and unexamined experience could of the invincible necessity of resisting intrusive and remorseless friends to the very death. And this shows how wise it is to have a spare hour or two unallotted in the scheme of days, by way of sop to these destroyers of what cannot be replaced. A great many people do not care to know you unless you throw yourself to them, time and all, unreservedly; and they are acquaintances well lost. But more moderate folk will be content with a fragment, and this fragment of time it is well to leave them on the chance of their filling it up; if they do not, it is so much redeemed from the jaws of the destroyer. In this connexion, perhaps the resolution which may be most safely recommended to the majority of mankind for their firm adoption, either at the beginning of the year or at any other moment, is one to abstain from fatuous intrusions upon hours more valuable than their own. Let them read over every door what an old scholar had written at the entrance to his library—"Whoever you are, either help me in my studies, or else go away again." Change the "studies" of this honest appeal into whatever may be needful, and there is hardly one of us who would not be very thankful if he could have it written in characters of fire at his threshold for at least twenty hours out of the twenty-four. For the bore is, in time, just what the greedy, unpunctual, and faithless borrower is in money, and the bore is everywhere rampant.

In both time and money, as the age is at once social and luxurious, the best resolution that anybody can make is to take great and steadfast heed of small economies. This is not a rule of that precise and specific kind which delights the man who draws up an exact scheme of life every January. Such a man is not happy unless he has it down in black and white in a tabulated manner that he is to economize time by rising at seven every morning instead of eight, or by absolutely abstaining from parties, or by giving to science, history, or philosophy the half hours which he has hitherto flagitiously devoted to the morning paper. And so about money. He insists on clearly understanding in January how he will save his pound in March or August; it is some particular half-crown which he is bent on ruthlessly retrenching—the taking of a cab on a given occasion, which he henceforth and for ever renounces. The general rule, to economize wherever you can, to save margins of price and little differences of cost, sounds to him intolerably vague, unless he can state in a table what margins and what little differences. This particularity invariably defeats its own ends. No man can foresee details very far ahead, either in half-hours or half-crowns; consequently the much-resolving man speedily finds himself in a state of dead-lock, his details proving absolutely intractable and irreconcileable twenty times a day. Consequently he very speedily gives up the whole scheme; the dust accumulates on his carefully prepared tablets; and he goes on living anyhow, muddling away much time and much money, until December reminds him that a New Year is close at hand, and that it really behoves one who would fain keep some grip on his life to know exactly what he means to do, and so forth. The general rule can hardly end in this wretched way, unless the person who professed to lay it down for himself was insincere and half-hearted from the first. A general precept to be economical is perhaps too vague, but there is no vagueness about the maxim that it is wise to count small differences in price, and not to soothe one's conscience by the sophistical apophthegm that the dearest things are the cheapest in the long run—as if the proper question were not most often whether I can here and now afford to buy that which is cheapest in the long run. It may be true that a hundred guinea watch is cheaper at the money than one at five-and-twenty guineas, but ultimate cheapness of this kind is not by any means the only sort of consideration which is to the point. The consequence of absorbing this sophism thoroughly into a man's system is that he presently persuades himself always to buy both the dearest things of a given sort, and also the dearest sorts of things; just as in the matter of time the true [illegible]ery saying that one does more work in the long run by sticking to it for ten months in the year than if we stuck to it for twelve, expands itself in the facile mind into the destructive fallacy that in the long run you get more out of yourself by working five hours than ten in a day. One good effect of the January stock-taking is that, if faithfully conducted, it shows the deficiency that arises, alike in cash in hand and in work done, from the literal following of this large-handed method. Specific observation of this five-pound note and that, this week and the other, which might have been used or stored up, and was wasted, shows us where the error was; but it is a mistake to confine our resolutions to avoidance of this or that especial source of waste, in case the chance should recur. The better course is to meditate within, and work against the weaker tendencies of one's character, rather than to worry about the outside occasions and circumstances. Thus the upshot of one's considerations about good resolutions and schemes, whether drawn up and sworn to in January or any other month, is that in things needful and essential there should be a detailed programme, but that its boundaries should be roomy and moveable; and that in most things it is more profitable to lie in watch over our own proved weaknesses from within, than to be troubled over much in looking out for the particular temptations which we expect to turn up from without.

THE END OF PERPETUAL CURATES.

THERE was something touching about the fall of the Compound Householder. To the minds of many people he was a sort of chrisom child, who came into being only to cease from being as soon as he had begun to be. Many people heard the words Compound Householder for the first time in those debates which ended in decreeing that Compound Householders should no longer be. Many had great searchings of heart as to the nature of the newly-discovered animal. His name certainly did not, to non-technical ears, at once express his nature. People were not bound to know that a Compound Householder had anything to do with compounding for rates. According to the ordinary use of the English tongue, he might rather have been called a Compounding or a Compounded Householder. To the unlearned in parochial politics, the Compound Householder seemed himself to be a compound being, a householder made up, in some mysterious way, of several householders. Nine tailors, we all know, make a man. If any of our readers remember the ingenious book of a past generation called the Miseries of Human Life, they will no doubt remember the elaborate speculations there entered into as to the nature and manner of life of a man made up of nine tailors. Such a corporate or compound man, if he chanced, as he doubtless would, to be a householder, seemed exactly to realize the notion of a Compound Householder. All this ingenious speculation was knocked on the head by the ruthless destruction of its object. The Compound Householder has vanished; he is gone to the place of his kindred mysteries, the Druids and the Coarbs. His nature, his final cause, the reasons for his creation and the reasons for his destruction, are now remanded to the domain of political archæology.

But the Compound Householder has not perished alone. Another institution, at least as venerable, and more sacred, has perished with him. The same Parliament which laid violent hands on our Compound Householders also laid violent hands on our Perpetual Curates. To be sure, in this case the act of violence takes the shape which is popularly known as kicking upstairs. And so, to be sure, it is in the case of the Compound Householder also. The Compound Householder and the Perpetual Curate are each alike kicked upstairs. But then the Compound Householder is kicked up into a sort of Nirvana, where he is wholly lost. He is merged in the general mass of householders who are not compound. The Perpetual Curate, on the other hand, remains as visible as ever he was; only he is raised in the scale of beings. He retains his personality and his local description, only he changes his title for a higher one. As the Marquis of Abercorn has grown into the Duke of Abercorn, so the Perpetual Curate of Little Peddlington has, by an Act of the late Parliament, grown into the Vicar of Little Peddlington.

Is this change really a promotion? We suppose it is, because those who are most nearly concerned evidently think so. The Perpetual Curates themselves—rather those who once were Perpetual Curates—seem to be thoroughly delighted. It used to be a profound mystery to us why the title of Perpetual Curate was so disliked. To us it always seemed the grandest of all ecclesiastical titles, those of the Pope himself of course excepted. There was a lastingness, one might say an eternity, about it, which was not a little striking. As the Eastern despot was propitiated by the cry, "O King, live for ever," so his very title suggested the analogous cry, "O Curate, live for ever." And so in truth the Perpetual Curate had, in his own special differentia, no rival save in the one solitary rank which was above all ranks. The attribute of perpetuity belonged to none save only to Curates and Emperors. "Semper Augustus" we have all heard of, and, nearer still, "Perpetuus Augustus" was not unknown, and Imperial, as well as reverend, ears have been tickled with the almost godlike style of "Perpetuitas vestra." And since one of the two classes of Perpetuals came to an end, the other has had the field all to itself. Since the fatal day, sixty-two years past, when lawful Emperors ceased to be, the Perpetual Curate has been the only perpetual thing going. "Esto perpetua" has been a common wish, but in these two classes alone did it seem to be realized. And yet perpetuity itself has failed to be perpetual. The Perpetual Augustus and the Perpetual Curate have alike vanished from among men. The place of the one knows him no more; the place of the other knows him only under another title.

Why, then, was so illustrious a title felt, as it really seems to have been felt, to be a sort of badge of ignominy? By the light of nature one would hardly have thought that the title of Vicar, implying, on the face of it, delegation from somebody, and therefore inferiority to somebody, could at all compare with the dignity of perpetuity. Yet, from some cause unintelligible to the lay intellect, no Perpetual Curate ever liked to be called a Perpetual Curate. The objection seems as puzzling to the outsider as the kindred objection to the title of Attorney-at-Law, which to non-professional ears seems much better sounding than the more dearly cherished title of Solicitor. For reasons then which are beyond us, the Perpetual Curate always liked to be called an Incumbent. One could never make out why, because no description is so vague as that of Incumbent, a description which does not in the least mark out any particular rank or office, but simply distinguishes the actual possessor of an office from all persons who are not actual possessors of it. A Perpetual Curate was undoubtedly an Incumbent, but so is a Vicar or a Rector. The old College joke about "our incumbents, or, as we sometimes call them, our incumbrances" took in all holders of College livings, whether Rectors, Vicars, or Perpetual Curates. A Bishop, an Archbishop, the Pope himself, might be rightly described as Incumbents of their several sees. And, to go to the other end of the scale of ecclesiastical office, have we not Addison's authority for applying the word to a parish clerk? Did not Sir Roger, forestalling the notion of Competitive Examinations, promise, "on the death of the present Incumbent, who was now very old, to bestow the place according to merit"? The charm therefore of so vague a title is not easy to understand; yet it is certain that the title of Perpetual Curate was disliked, and that "Incumbent" was used as a kind of euphemism for the supposed ignominious title. That cynical folks used to suggest that an Incumbent meant a dead weight and heavy burden on a parish, was passed by as a profane jest. We never could make out whether it was the "Perpetual" or the "Curate" which was most disliked. Some clergymen, we know, used to think that a Curate of any kind was a being who could not be spoken of directly, but who needed some amount of circumlocution to describe him. We remember an aged clergyman, himself a Perpetual Curate aided by stipendiary curates, who always spoke of those curates as "the gentlemen who assist me." Whether he always spoke of himself as a "perpetual gentleman" we do not remember. But we conjecture that he did not. We suspect that it was the perpetuity, which of course was really the grand point of the position, which was the distasteful thing. "Perpetual Curate" sounded so painfully like "Once a Curate and always a Curate." And then there was no proper name to give to the Perpetual Curate's house. The Rector lived in the Rectory, the Vicar lived in the Vicarage; but what did the Perpetual Curate live in? It would somehow have sounded odd to say that he lived in a Perpetual Curacy. At least we never knew any Perpetual Curate give his house any such name. And it would not have done to call it a Rectory or a Vicarage, when its owner was confessedly not a Rector or Vicar. The ingenuity of somebody, the ingenuity, we always suspected, of some Perpetual Curate's wife, hit upon a title for the house which was thought to be as pleasingly vague as the title which had been devised for the man. The Rector lived in a Rectory, the Vicar lived in a Vicarage, but, instead of the Perpetual Curate living in a Perpetual Curacy, the Incumbent always lived in a Parsonage. Whenever one saw a house described as "The Parsonage," one knew that its owner was, not Rector or Vicar, but Perpetual Curate. There was thought to be a pleasant vagueness about this description which exactly suited the needs of the case. But unluckily the vagueness in this case happened to be wrong. The Perpetual Curate certainly was an Incumbent, but his house certainly was not a Parsonage. The word Parsonage, like the word Parson, is not at all a vague word, but a word with a very precise and definite meaning. The Parson, the persona ecclesiæ, is the Rector and nobody else, and the Parsonage—or, more accurately, the Parsonage-house—is the house of the Rector and the house of no one else.

All this was a little mysterious, but the fact is undoubted, that Perpetual Curates did not like to be called Perpetual Curates. But, whatever the reason was, one can hardly think it was wholly for the very odd reason which was assigned in a paragraph of the Times which announced the change. The change, we were told, was "more important than might at first be supposed." And it was added, more mysteriously:—

> The change is said to be highly pleasing to the clergy, and henceforth all benefices throughout the kingdom are to be the subject of "presentation" and "institution." "Institution" is a much more solemn form of investiture than the granting of a mere licence to a perpetual curacy on paper.

It is here plainly implied that the preference felt by the clergy for the title of Vicar over that of Perpetual Curate was due wholly or mainly to the pleasing solemnity of the act of Institution. And this, notwithstanding that "institution" is of necessity a rather more expensive process than "licence to a perpetual curacy." The love of solemnity was so strong in the clerical mind that the more expensive process was preferred, if only it were also the more solemn process. And yet our informant goes on to say that it > was alleged by the promoters of this new Act, in both Houses of Parliament, that the effect of the elevation of perpetual curacies to the rank of vicarages would be to confer substantial and not merely honorary advantage on numbers of the beneficed clergy. For instance, the perpetual curates of Paddington, Cheltenham, Clifton, &c., are henceforth vicars, and their parishes vicarages.

It is not very easy to see what are the substantial advantages which accrue to numbers of the beneficed clergy through the Perpetual Curate of Cheltenham being changed into the Vicar of Cheltenham. But there are other things more wonderful still about this memorable change.

> It seemed [we are told] absurd to have clergymen charged with the cure of souls in parishes with precisely the same duties, but yet bearing different titles—some rectors, or vicars, and some perpetual curates.

We really do not see the absurdity. It is at least not greater than the absurdity of having several classes of peers, whose political and legal rights and powers are exactly the same, but of whom some are called Dukes, while others are called only Barons. But at all events the absurdity is not got rid of by abolishing the distinction between Vicars and Perpetual Curates, and keeping the distinction between Rectors and Vicars. We are then told that

> The first intention was to have made all the parochial clergy "rectors," but it was thought that this might interfere with certain rights of lay rectors, and the inhabitants of Leeds, Kidderminster, &c., might not have liked the abolition of the ancient titles of "Vicar of Leeds," "Vicar of Kidderminster," &c. (the vicars being now Bishops of Rochester and Hereford respectively). It was then decided in Parliament that the Bill should simply convert all Perpetual Curacies into Vicarages.

We really do not understand this argument. Seemingly Leeds and Kidderminster are to remain Vicarages, because in those parishes the title of Vicar is hallowed by the fact that those who once bore it are now Bishops. Might we not just as well argue that Cheltenham ought to remain a Perpetual Curacy, because the late Perpetual Curate is now a Dean?

The truth is that the change is a silly and frivolous one, answering no one useful object, and devised simply to gratify a foolish feeling of repugnance to a name in no way more degrading than any other. Its whole object is simply to please those Perpetual Curates, or the wives of those Perpetual Curates, who were silly enough to dislike being called Perpetual Curates. The paragraph in the Times says feelingly that many of them "might have remained Perpetual Curates for ever" but for the provisions of the Bishop of Oxford's Act. And, if they had "remained Perpetual Curates for ever," what would have been the great harm done to themselves or to anybody else? The late changes, the changes begun by an Act of 1865, and made more extensive by the Act of 1868, have wiped out an historical distinction for no good reason whatever. Till those Acts were passed, if we heard of a Rector or a Vicar, we knew that his church and parish were, with a very few special exceptions, of ancient foundation. If there was any objection to anything, it was to the comparatively few ancient Perpetual Curacies being jumbled up with the great number of new ones. If any one was injured by the old names, it was the Perpetual Curate, say, of Cheltenham, the real parochial incumbent of an ancient church and parish, who was liable to be confounded with the minister of some new church run up the other day in Bethnal Green. The remedy for this, it seems, is to make the historical confusion greater still, by jumbling up both these classes of Perpetual Curacies with the class of Vicarages whose history is different from either. And all this confusion is brought about simply to please the vanity of some foolish clergymen, or of their wives, who thought that the title which the law gave them did not sound grand enough.

MATURE SIRENS.

NOTHING is more incomprehensible to girls than the love and admiration sometimes given to middle-aged women. They cannot understand it; and nothing but experience will ever make them understand it. In their eyes, a woman is out of the pale of personal affection altogether when she has once lost that shining gloss of youth, that exquisite freshness of skin and suppleness of limb, which to them, in the insolent plenitude of their unfaded beauty, constitute the chief claims to admiration of their sex. And yet they cannot conceal from themselves that the belle of eighteen is often deserted for the woman of forty, and that the patent witchery of their own youth and prettiness goes for nothing against the mysterious charms of a mature siren. What can they say to such an anomaly? There is no good in going about the world disdainfully wondering how on earth a man could ever have taken up with such an antiquated creature—suggestively asking their male friends what could he see in a woman of her age, old enough to be their mother? There the fact stands, and facts are stubborn things. The eligible suitor who has been coveted by more than one golden-haired girl has married a woman twenty years her senior, and the middle-aged siren has actually carried off the prize which nymphs in their teens have frantically desired to win. What is the secret? How is it done? The world, even of silly girls, has got past any belief in spells and talismans, such as Charlemagne's mistress wore, and yet the man's fascination seems to them quite as miraculous and almost as unholy as if it had been brought about by the black art. But if they had any analytical power they would understand the diablerie of the mature sirens clearly enough, for it is not so difficult to understand when one puts one's mind to it.

In the first place, a woman of ripe age has a knowledge of the world, and a certain suavity of manner and moral flexibility, wholly wanting to the young. Young girls are for the most part all angles—harsh in their judgments, stiff in their prejudices, and narrow in their sympathies. They are full of combativeness and self-assertion if they are of one kind of young people, or they are stupid and shy if they belong to another kind. They are talkative with nothing to say, and positive with nothing well and truly known; or they are monosyllabic dummies who stammer out Yes and No at random, and whose brains become hopelessly confused at the first sentence a stranger utters. They are generally without pity; their want of experience making them hard towards sorrows which they scarcely understand, and, let us charitably hope, to a certain extent ignorant of the pain they inflict. That famous article in the Times on the cruelty of young girls, àpropos of Constance Kent's confession, though absurdly exaggerated, had in it the core of truth which gives the sting to such papers, which makes them stick, and which is the real cause of the outcry they create. Girls are cruel; there is no question about it. If more passive than active, they are simply indifferent to the sufferings of others; if of a more active temperament, they find a positive pleasure in giving pain. A girl will say the most cruel things to her dearest friend, and then laugh at her because she cries. Even her own mother she will hurt and humiliate if she can; while, as for any unfortunate aspirant not approved of, were he as tough-skinned as a rhinoceros she would find means to make him wince. But all this acerbity is toned down in the mature woman. Experience has enlarged her sympathies, and knowledge of suffering has softened her heart to the sufferings of others. Her lessons of life, too, have taught her tact; and tact is one of the most valuable lessons that a man or woman can learn. She sees at a glance where are the weak points and sore places in her companion, and she avoids them; or if she passes over them, it is with a hand so soft and tender, a touch so inexpressibly soothing, that she calms instead of irritating. A girl would have come down upon the weak places heavily, and would have torn the bandages off the sore ones, jesting at scars because she herself had never felt a wound, and deriding the sybaritism of diachylon because ignorant of the anguish it conceals. Then the mature siren is thoughtful for others. Girls are self-asserting and aggressive. Life is so strong in them, and the instinct which prompts them to try their strength with all comers, and to get the best of everything everywhere, is so irrepressible, that they are often disagreeable because of their instinctive selfishness, and the craving, natural to the young, of taking all and giving back nothing. But the mature siren knows better than this. She knows that social success depends entirely on what each of us can throw into the common fund of society; that the surest way to be considered ourselves is to be considerate for others; that sympathy begets liking, and self-suppression leads to exaltation; and that if we want to gain love we must first show how well we can give it. Her tact then, and her sympathy, her moral flexibility and quick comprehension of character, her readiness to give herself to others, are some of the reasons, among others, why the society of a cultivated agreeable woman of a certain age is sought by those men to whom women are more than mere mistresses or toys. Besides, she is a good conversationalist. She has no pretensions to any special or deep learning—for, if pedantic, she is spoilt as a siren at any age—but she knows a little about most things; at all events, she knows enough to make her a pleasant companion, and able to keep up the ball when thrown. And men like to talk to intelligent women. They do not like to be taught or corrected by them, but they like that quick sympathetic intellect which follows them readily, and that amount of knowledge which makes a comfortable cushion for their own. And a mature siren who knows what she is about would never do more than this, even if she could.

Though the mature siren rests her claims to admiration on more than mere personal charms, and appeals to something beyond the senses, yet she is personable and well preserved, and, in a favourable light, looks nearly as young as ever. So the men say who knew her when she was twenty; who loved her then, and have gone on loving her, with a difference, despite the twenty years that lie between this and then. Girls, indeed, despise her charms because she is no longer young; and yet she may be even more beautiful than youth. She knows all the little niceties of dress, and without going into the vulgar trickery of paint and dyes—which would make her hideous—is up to the best arts of the toilet by which every point is made to tell, and every minor beauty is given its fullest value. For part of the art and mystery of sirenhood is an accurate perception of times and conditions, and a careful avoidance of that suicidal mistake of which la femme passée is so often guilty—namely, setting herself in confessed rivalry with the young by trying to look like them, and so losing the good of what she has retained, and showing the ravages of time by the contrast. The mature siren is wiser than this. She knows exactly what she has and what she can do, and before all things avoids whatever seems too youthful for her years; and this is one reason why she is always beautiful, because always in harmony. Besides, she has very many good points, many positive charms still left. Her figure is still good—not slim and slender certainly, but round and soft, and with that slower, riper, lazier grace which is something quite different from the antelope-like elasticity of youth, and in its own way as lovely. If her hair has lost its maiden luxuriance she makes up with crafty arrangements of lace, which are almost as picturesque as the fashionable wisp of hay-like ends tumbling half way to the waist. She has still her white and shapely hands with their pink filbert-like nails; still her pleasant smile and square small teeth; her eyes are bright yet, and if the upper muscles are a little shrunk, the consequent apparent enlargement of the orbit only makes them more expressive; her lips are not yet withered, her skin is not wrinkled. Undeniably, when well dressed and in a favourable light, the mature siren is as beautiful in her own way as the girlish belle; and the world knows it and acknowledges it.

That mature sirens can be passionately loved, even when very mature, history gives us more than one example; and the first name that naturally occurs to one's mind as the type of this is that of the too famous Ninon de l'Enclos. And Ninon, if a trifle mythical, was yet a fact and an example. But not going quite to Ninon's age, we often see women of forty and upwards who are personally charming, and whom men love with as much warmth and tenderness as if they were in the heyday of life—women who count their admirers by dozens, and who end by making a superb marriage and having quite an Indian summer of romance and happiness. The young laugh at this idea of the Indian summer for a bride of forty-five; but it is true; for neither romance nor happiness, neither love nor mental youth, is a matter of years; and after all we are only as old as we feel, and certainly no older than we look. All women do not harden by time, nor wither, nor yet corrupt. Some merely ripen and mellow and get enriched by the passage of the years, retaining the most delicate womanliness—we had almost said girlishness—into quite old age, and blushing under their grey hairs while they shrink from anything coarse or vulgar or impure as sensitively as when they were girls. La femme à quarante ans is the French term for the opening of the great gulf beyond which love cannot pass; but human history disproves this date, and shows that the heart can remain fresh and the person lovely long after the age fixed for the final adieu to admiration, and that the mature siren can be adored by her own contemporaries when the rising generation regard her as nothing better than a chimney-corner fixture. Mr. Trollope has recognised the claims of the mature siren in his Orley Farm and Miss Mackenzie; and no one can deny the intense naturalness of the characters and the interest of the stories.

Another point with the mature woman is that she is not jealous nor exacting. She knows the world, and takes what comes with the philosophy that springs from knowledge. If she is of an enjoying nature—and she cannot be a siren else—she accepts such good as floats to the top without looking too deep into the cup and speculating on the time when she shall have drained it to the dregs. Men feel safe with her. If they have entered on a tender friendship with her, they know that there will be no scene, no tears, no upbraidings, when an inexorable fate comes in to end their pleasant little drama, with the inevitable wife as the scene-shifter. The mature siren knows so well that fate and the wife must break in between her and her friend, that she is resigned from the first to what is foredoomed, and so accepts her bitter portion, when it comes, with dignity and in silence. Where younger women would fall into hysterics and make a scene, perhaps go about the world taking their revenge in slander, the middle-aged woman holds out a friendly hand, and takes the back seat gallantly, never showing by word or look that she has felt her deposition. She becomes the best friend of the new household; and, if any one is jealous, ten to one it is the husband that is jealous of her love for his wife, or perhaps it is the wife herself, who cannot see what her husband can find to admire so much in Mrs. A., and who pouts at his extraordinary predilection for her, though of course she would scorn to be jealous—as, indeed, she has no cause. For even a mature siren, however delightful she may be, is not likely to come before a young wife in the heart of a young husband. Though the French paint the love of a woman of forty as pathetic, because slightly ridiculous and certainly hopeless, yet they arrange the theory of their social life so that a youth is generally supposed to make his first love of a married woman many years his older, and a mature siren finds her last love in a youth. We have not come to this yet in England, either in theory or practice; and it is to be hoped that we never shall come to it. Mature sirens are all very well for men of their own age, and it is pleasant to see them still loved and admired, and to recognise in them the claims of women to something higher than mere personal passion; but the case would be very different if they became ghoulish seducers of the young, and kept up the habit of love by entangling boyish hearts and blighting youthful lives. As they are now, they form a charming element in society, and are of infinite use to the world. They are the ripe fruit in the garden where else everything would be green and immature—the last days of the golden summer just before the chills of autumn come on; they contain in themselves the advantages of two distinct epochs, and while possessing as much personal charm as youth, possess also the gains which come by experience and maturity. They keep things together as the young alone could not do; and no gathering of friends is perfect which has not one or two mature sirens to give the tone to the rest, and prevent excesses. They soften the asperities of high-handed boys and girls, which else would be too biting; and they set people at ease, and make them in good humour with themselves, by the courtesy with which they listen to them, and the patience with which they bear with them. Even the very girls who hate them fiercely as rivals love them passing well as half maternal, half sisterly companions; and the first person to whom they would carry their sorrows would be a mature siren, quite capable on her own part of having caused them. It would be hard indeed if the loss of youth did not bring with it some compensations; but the mature siren suffers less from that loss than any other kind of woman. Indeed, she seems to have a private elixir of her own which is not quite drained dry when she dies, beloved and regretted, at threescore years and ten; leaving behind her one or two old friends who were once her ardent lovers, and who still cherish her memory as that of the finest and most fascinating woman they ever knew—something which the present generation is utterly incapable of repeating.

MR. BRUCE'S APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

MR. BRUCE received the seals of the Home Department amidst a loud flourish of trumpets. The congratulations of friendship and the auguries of proverbial philosophy conspired to herald the accession of a Minister who had scaled the heights of office with greater rapidity than even Mr. Gathorne Hardy. The old formula of felicitation was again brought out, and those who could tell us nothing else, or who were tired of telling us other things, reminded us that "new brooms sweep clean." That every one should have been on the qui vive to see the effect produced by this new broom was only natural. The first public acts of the new Secretary were looked for with an eager expectation which must then have inspired him with fear, and must now inspire him with disgust. He has written, and he has acted, and neither in his words nor in his acts has the world recognised the wisdom which it foretold. He has been called on to advise the Crown on the exercise of its highest prerogative, and the remission of punishment which he has counselled has filled sensible men with dismay. Mr. Bruce begins his administration of office with a reputation for feebleness which reflects the feebleness of Grey and Walpole.

In August last the city of Wells witnessed a murder which was characterized by the sheerest brutality and the grossest form of savageness. It was a murder into which no element of romance could by any ingenuity be imported. There was no sensational impulse of long-harboured jealousy, no wrong of pure but slighted love, no brooding over a long-cherished revenge. There was neither heroic daring, nor wounded sensitiveness, nor aggrieved pride. There was nothing but the deliberate perpetration of a devilish act, with just such an amount of exciting cause as was sufficient to negative the plea of hallucination. It was on the whole one of the foulest, but it was also one of the vulgarest, murders ever committed. It had every deformity of essence and of accident. The circumstances of its perpetration were these:—On the hot night of Sunday, August 2, a man named Cornish had been boozing with his paramour up to 11 o'clock in a public-house at Wells. Some of his fellow-workmen came in front of the house and called him out. The public-house being closed, Cornish got out by the window to join them. Among the men whom he thus accompanied were two named Bisgrove and Sweet. From these two he seems to have separated soon, and to have gone alone to an open place called the Campfield, where he sometimes slept during the hot weather. Sweet had been spending his Sunday afternoon drinking beer with a woman named Drew, who seems to have combined the two vocations of Sweet's mistress and a common prostitute. After drinking up to 10 o'clock she accompanied Sweet to the public-house in which Cornish was boozing, and then challenged the woman who had been drinking with Cornish, to fight. That strange craving for more liquor, with which the poison called English beer commonly inspires half-drunken wretches, beguiled her from her intended conflict with this woman to wander off in search of more beer. She proceeded to another public-house in company with Sweet, and, as she says, with another man. Probably, though she could not recollect it at the trial, she was surrounded by a gang of men, for immediately afterwards she speaks of Bisgrove as being with her and Sweet. With these two men, at all events, she walked to another public-house. Bisgrove was, till this evening, a stranger to her; Sweet, as we have said before, being her paramour, and, as far as we understand, habitually living with her. Bisgrove then made overtures to her in Sweet's presence, which she did not reject, and Sweet did not openly resent. The nature and terms of these overtures may be gathered from the words of the wretched woman herself. "Bisgrove wanted to go with me, and said he would give me 2*s*. Sweet was not willing. I said I would go with him." This unlovely tale of vulgar harlotry allows us to imagine a sullen and inert opposition on the part of Sweet, and an offensive persistence on the part of Bisgrove. The woman then went to complete her wretched bargain with Bisgrove. Before leaving Sweet she was struck on the head by him, without any resistance on the part of her new lover. Their rendezvous was the very field in which Cornish was stretched enjoying his half-drunken sleep. Sweet awaited their return at the stile which led into this field. Bisgrove appears never to have quitted the field. The woman got over the stile, thus passing her angry and sullen paramour, who followed her for three hours about the town, as she says, uttering not a word, but more probably, as we think, muttering threats of jealous vengeance. Bisgrove is next seen early on the Monday morning lying close to the inanimate body of Cornish, whose face was smeared with blood, and under whose head a pool of blood had collected. He is asked by a police-officer what he is doing there. He replies that he had been drinking, and had gone to lie down there by the side of another man; that, while he lay there, a tall navvy came over the stile and threw a large stone three times on the man's face, and then flung it away into a stream, and that he himself was too much frightened to rise or to speak. He is arrested immediately, and when he is taken before the magistrate, he faints away at the sight of the stone by which Cornish had been struck. Sweet is also apprehended. Both are tried at the Winter Assizes for the murder of Cornish, found guilty, and sentenced to death. About the justice of the judgment few people in that part of the country seem to have entertained any doubts. That Bisgrove had a hand in the murder was a reasonable inference from the position in which he was found. That Sweet was either the perpetrator or an accessory, was a probability suggested by the motives of jealousy and revenge. Sweet had witnessed the overtures made to his own paramour by Bisgrove; he had resented them, not on the man who made, but on the woman who accepted, them. He had followed her about, as she said, threateningly for three hours. Might not the woman have misrepresented the time during which she was thus followed, in order to suggest an alibi; while the fact of Sweet's jealous anger may have been just as she stated it? What more probable than that Sweet, furious with bad ale, and more furious at the open preference of his mistress for a strange lover whose prowess he feared to confront, in the madness of jealousy and intoxication, gratified his fierce passion by the murder of the first man whom he could make away with? Such an act would have been cowardly and savage; but the whole of Sweet's conduct during that Sunday night was that of a savage and a coward. Or the murdered man may have had money, and thus offered an irresistible temptation to the hands of Sweet, Bisgrove, and their miserable leman. There was apparently nothing to shield the woman from the suspicion of being more or less accessory to the crime; and only the expediency of procuring the best evidence available, had transferred her from the dock to the witness-box. On the whole, public opinion was satisfied that the two worst criminals had been condemned by a righteous judgment. Great, therefore, was the public astonishment when Bisgrove, lying under sentence of death, confessed that he alone had done the deed, and that Sweet was entirely innocent. Inquiry proved this confession to be true, and the public welcomed the free pardon which was accorded to the latter.

But the next piece of news struck the public mind with less surprise than dissatisfaction. People learned that a memorial had been presented to the Home Secretary, and that Mr. Bruce had commenced his new functions by acting in the difficult part of a Judge of Criminal Appeal. Bisgrove, who confessed to having murdered Cornish, is respited from death, and sentenced to penal servitude for life. This commutation is incomprehensible to us. On what basis does it rest? By what plea is it justified? Is it supposed that Bisgrove has accused himself wrongly? This is untenable. Had he said nothing, the place and circumstances in which he was found immediately after the murder, and his behaviour before the magistrate, would have sufficed to indicate his guilt. No man found in this condition could have failed to be a participator in the murder. He was either wholly or partly guilty. His own admission concentrates the guilt upon himself. But no self-deception or illusion could have placed him next to the bleeding body of Cornish, or have made him faint away in view of the stone which crushed out Cornish's life. These are facts consistent only with one hypothesis. Then he is guilty; and, if guilty, of what crime? Of murder the most unprovoked, the most ruthless, the most savage which it is possible to conceive. He had received no injury, no affront, from his miserable victim. He had not been injured or provoked by any one. Nay, he himself had rather offered an affront and inflicted an injury. Flushed with the insolence of pot-house liquor, he had bought the favour of the huckstering strumpet from her usual paramour, had paraded his success before his rival's eyes, and, after gratifying his pride and his lust, had lain down to sleep out the fumes of his Sunday debauchery beside another drunken "mate." He had triumphed over the venal affections of a prostitute and the impotent protest of her tipsy lover. What need was there for him to rise from that feverish slumber and slay the helpless drunken wretch who snored by his side? Was it madness? Then it was the madness which is begotten of sottishness and lust; a madness into which any sot, stupified by the excess of animal indulgence, may plunge himself after a two hours' carouse, and plead it in defence of any crime. But hitherto the law of England has refused to admit the exculpatory effect of the unconsciousness into which a man voluntarily plunges himself. Not a juryman in any Assize Court but knows that the stupefaction of the intellect, which a man knowingly by his own act inflicts upon himself, is no palliation of the crime which he then commits. Is Mr. Bruce prepared to authorize a new interpretation of the law, and to provide intending criminals with a defence of which they will only be too ready to avail themselves? If so, there can be no more punishments of any kind. The guilt which a man incurs in a state of unconsciousness will, on this theory, be equally undeserving of incarceration and of death. To commit great atrocities with impunity will require only a preliminary excitement of the animal passions, preceded by a long draught of stupifying potions, and then the present ultima ratio of criminals—the fussy intervention of a local coterie, and the timid concessions of a feeble Minister—will be wholly superfluous.

Let it not be imputed to us as unfair that we make no account of the allegation that Bisgrove was naturally of a weak disposition, had had some affection of the brain, had been thought odd or weak by some "parties" with whom he used to take tea "in his leisure time." These aberrations or deficiencies of intellect are advanced actually on the testimony of "four inhabitants of Wookey." Not only did the four inhabitants of Wookey testify to these remarkable facts, but they, and an old lady who had the honour of bringing him up, and a schoolmaster, under whom his mind had acquired that healthy tone which it so conspicuously exhibited on the eventful Sunday, also asserted that he had been much neglected, was very weak, and of illegitimate birth. These depositions, made Heaven knows how, and authenticated Heaven only knows in what fashion, persuaded (so we are told) the Home Secretary to advise Her Majesty to mitigate the sentence passed on a ruthless murderer. The whole thing has such a queer and startling aspect that we can hardly analyse its details. What was the moving cause that influenced the Secretary of State? Was it the convict's illegitimacy? In what way—we respectfully inquire—did Bisgrove's illegitimacy tend to foster homicidal propensities? Nothing on the trial appeared to show the slightest connexion between the murder of Cornish and the illegitimacy of the murderer. As to the affection of the brain, &c. &c., the comment is obvious. Why was this evidence not adduced at the trial? Why did not the old lady who had taught Bisgrove his catechism, and the schoolmaster who had imparted maturer instruction, depose to the state of his brain before twelve jurymen? The suspicion is natural, that they dreaded the ordeal of cross-examination. It must be admitted that cross-examination is a terrible ordeal for men and women with tottering memories and flabby imaginations. Such folk achieve little before a judge and a jury. But then, why should they prevail with a Secretary of State? Why should daft people, with soft brains, who are conscious of their inability to tell a plain tale in Court, be able to prevail on a great Minister of State to unloose the noose from a ruffian's neck? Did Mr. Bruce read the evidence? If he did, in what act of Bisgrove's on that Black Sunday did he see a symptom of any weakness, except the moral weakness which comes of drink and courts sin? Bisgrove had strength of mind enough to solicit Drew, in the presence of her paramour, to name her price before that lover's face, and to defy his resentment and revenge. He was half drunk; so were they all. But, unless Mr. Bruce is going of himself to repeal the whole criminal law of England, that fact does not place Bisgrove in the category of irresponsible imbeciles. If Mr. Bruce is going to propound a new theory of responsibility, the prospect may be pleasant enough for the criminal classes; but it is dismally gloomy for those other classes who constitute, not the perpetrators, but the victims of crime.

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH ON THE LATE ELECTIONS.

WHEN it was announced that Mr. Goldwin Smith was about to leave this country for an indefinite period, those even who differed most from his politics could not but regret the loss of so brilliant a master of the English language. Nobody, however, had any sort of title to inquire into his motives. If a man chooses to live in a remote part of the State of New York, instead of remaining at Oxford, he has a perfect right to do so. His friends may regret his decision, and may be unable to repress a certain feeling of curiosity, but they cannot give any public utterance to their natural perplexity. Mr. Goldwin Smith has, however, thought fit to volunteer an explanation; he has answered the question which people could not but ask in private, what could be his motives for self-expatriation? and the answer is so remarkable that it demands a few words of comment. To put it shortly, Mr. Goldwin Smith despairs of his country; or, if despair be too strong a term for his very uncomfortable view of our condition, at least he thinks the state of affairs unsatisfactory in the highest degree. What, then, are the grounds of this despair? They are, so far as we may venture to paraphrase his language, that England has fallen, body and soul, under the power of a plutocracy. The great boon which Mr. Goldwin Smith and his party had been demanding has been bestowed upon them in far fuller measure than they had ventured to anticipate. The gates have been thrown open widely to the democracy, and behold, that great power which was to lead us into a new era has turned out to be no better than its predecessors. So far from shaking off the restraint of the governing classes, it proves to be itself as deeply penetrated with a base subserviency as ever were the much reviled ten-pounders. In England money is omnipotent. We should speak of the almighty sovereign, instead of the almighty dollar. Wealth has not this unbounded power in France, nor even in America. "A rich man could not, by a wave of his hand, have turned Abraham Lincoln out of Congress and taken his place"; whereas it is to be presumed that some English millionaire might have done as much for Mr. Gladstone. Public life, it appears, is as much the appanage of the rich in England as yachts or racehorses. And though legislation may do something to stem the evil in certain directions, it cannot alter the character of the people. Hence it follows that Parliament will be in the hands of the consuming, as distinguished from the producing, class; and that, for some time to come, the working-man will have no real power. In short, Mr. Goldwin Smith's only hope for the future lies in the Trades'-Unions; yet even in the expression of this hope we recognise a certain hesitation. His desire for their action is conditional on the expectation that they will do something and yet not do too much, that they will not abuse their resources for "industrial warfare," but that they will somehow or other exert their influence in broad questions of political right—"such as the protection of the working-man's electoral freedom against the tyranny of employers." In short, he calls upon them to show a singular discretion, which will guide them to avoid mere party questions, and yet to do something to restore the tone of the political atmosphere. Considering the very uncertain nature of the political force which is thus to be called into action, we fear that Mr. Goldwin Smith would acknowledge that the realization of this hope is somewhat problematical. It is very easy, under certain circumstances, to put in motion the mass of discontent which exists amongst the lower classes of society; but their leaders have hitherto found it singularly difficult to define the precise limits within which their power is to be used, and to make them in the heat of the conflict draw an unalterable line between "party questions" and "broad questions of political right." The people may be stimulated to demand the ballot, or to demand the establishment of national workshops; but it will be very hard to induce them to use their organization merely to establish their independence, and to make no use of it to put their independence to profit. When a man is encouraged to knock his oppressor down, it is difficult to persuade him not to stamp upon him afterwards. It is rather like setting a powder-magazine on fire, and requesting it not to blow up too hard. However, Mr. Goldwin Smith believes that "the political world will gradually move on."

Meanwhile, having foreseen the unpleasant results indicated, he declined to become a candidate at the late elections. The only result would have been, he says—and we must admit it to be very probable—that a rich man would have come down upon him, would have carried the upper classes and shopkeepers to a man, and have inflicted a damaging defeat upon the cause. Even if elected by a miracle, he would have been of no use in Parliament; untrained to debate, he could not have forcibly expressed his views—an assertion for which we may credit Mr. Goldwin Smith's modesty, without pronouncing any opinion on its accuracy. It was far better then, he concludes, that he should go to teach in a University where manual labour is for the first time combined with intellectual culture; where many of the students are the sons of yeomen, maintaining themselves partly by their own hands, and where they may aspire in after life to become leaders of society and wielders of political power. "Surely," he says, "I am more usefully, as well as more congenially, employed in teaching these students, and in promoting, as far as I can, the success of the attempt to elevate labour, than I should be if I were sitting, isolated, mute, and impatient, in a Parliament of the rich."

Surely, we cannot help thinking, there is here a little gap in the argument. It does not logically follow, so far as we can see, that because a man is not to be a member of Parliament he must therefore be a Professor in Cornell University. Mr. Goldwin Smith's correspondents had apparently asked why he preferred a Professorship to a seat in Parliament, but there is an intermediate position which is not unworthy of his notice, and which he was excellently adapted to fill. A certain party revered him as a great political teacher; they hung upon his words, and were even ready to attempt the miracle of returning him to Parliament. He had an audience perfectly prepared to receive his lessons, and a set of friends ready to rally round him. If he thought that he would be useless in Parliament, nobody could make him enter it; enthusiastic as are his worshippers, he would not be subject to that gentle violence which the pious of old times were in the habit of applying to the saints who said their nolo episcopari too earnestly. He might have been a prophet unattached, and have done something to fan that feeble flame of zeal which he acknowledges to exist in some portions of our degraded populace. Nay, if the Trades'-Unions take his advice and begin to agitate "broad questions of political right," they will be singularly in want of some tried leader to warn them off the dangerous ground of mere party questions. He exhorts them, and with excellent sense, to avail themselves of the services of men of intellect who sympathize with labour; but if the men of intellect bolt before the battle, and give up the service of their country because they avowedly believe it too corrupt to hold them, what are the working-men to do? Men of intellect who have any influence over the Trades'-Union class are by no means so common that we can afford to lose one of them because he gives up the game in disgust; and if anything could induce that class to take to revolutionary methods in despair of any constitutional remedy for their real or supposed grievances, it would be the public declaration of men who ought to be good judges that the state of things is too rotten for an honest man to hope for any rational attempt at a remedy. There is undoubtedly a standing danger to us all so long as any large class of the people hold that they are neglected and their just influence despised, and therefore men of Mr. Goldwin Smith's influence owe a certain duty to their country—unless they conscientiously believe that it is past saving—and have no justification for prematurely leaving it to its own devices. It is true, indeed, that some people may estimate the value of his services at a different rate, and may hold that we shall contrive, after an expressive Americanism, to "worry along" somehow, even if we should be deserted by Mr. Goldwin Smith, or by other men, if such there be, of equal ability; perhaps, too, we don't anticipate that the ship will go down just yet, however unsound he may consider its timbers. We only say that, on his own ground, he does not seem, so far as he has declared his motives, to have made out an intelligible justification for his course. You poor wretches, our physician seems to say, are really in such a miserable state of health that I must leave you to take care of yourselves; to which we cannot help replying, first, that whilst there is life there is hope, and we do not yet think of sending for the undertaker; and secondly, that if his opinion is sound, we are just in the condition where our physicians are bound not to leave us. It is only fair to add, that Mr. Goldwin Smith does not apparently profess to have confided to us all the grounds which have determined the step he has taken, and there may be supplementary reasons of a different nature which fully justify his step. We only take that which he has chosen to make public.

The more interesting question remains, whether we are really in such a bad way as Mr. Goldwin Smith seems to think. Is the country so poorly off for statesmanship and patriotism that its only hope lies in its Trades'-Unions? Must we despair because Mr. Hughes has been compelled to leave Lambeth, and Mr. Odger was not able to stand for Chelsea? Must we hide our diminished heads before France and the young Republic of the West, and admit that here, and here only, wealth is omnipotent and the reverence for money has entered into the very marrow of the bones? Is even a step towards democracy only a means of strengthening the power of the upper classes, and is that sensibility to ideas with which Reformers sometimes credit our artisan population a mere deluding fiction? To be candid, we have not the least wish to deny that money has very great influence in England, and is likely to have great influence, whatever changes may be made in our political constitution. Moreover, it is really unfortunate that the doors of Parliament should open only to golden keys, and should be growing more and more inaccessible, not merely to the working-man, but to every man of moderate means. But when we come to compare ourselves with other nations, and especially with that in which Mr. Goldwin Smith has taken refuge, we cannot believe ourselves to be singular. Money is supposed to have some influence upon French Ministers, and the instincts of the most wealthy classes are no small impediment in France to the spread of liberal institutions. But in the United States we see the influence of money in its worst and most unblushing form. Of all the dangers to which the great democracy is exposed, none is so conspicuous, and none so generally recognised by all thinking men, as the danger of downright pecuniary corruption. An effort is being made in England to bring to justice men who are accused—rightly or wrongly—of having defrauded the shareholders of a great financial company. Whatever the result, no one doubts that the case will be fully investigated, and that the Judges will do their duty without fear or favour. But in New York the leaders of commerce appear to be above the law. They use their power without restraint or concealment for transactions in shares which fairly astonish the enterprising British financier; and when an appeal is made to the law in consequence of a quarrel between the conspirators, it turns out that each of them has a Judge in his pay, and is able to drag the machinery of justice through the dirt of the most unblushing corruption. Certainly no spectacle has been exhibited in England half so demoralizing to the public mind as the whole course of the rival manipulators of the great Erie railroad. Money has doubtless great influence upon the British Parliament, but at least it does not influence members in the repulsive form of direct bribery. The taxation of the country is doubtless determined in great measure by rich men; but at least we are not told here that more than half the revenue escapes through mysterious leaks between the contributor and the national exchequer, and we are entirely free from such mysterious but powerful agencies as the notorious "whisky ring." The influence of money in England acts through what, by comparison at least, may be called legitimate channels; and we are not disgraced by paying one set of taxes to the public and another to the plunderers of the public revenue. The wealthy classes may be powerful, but they have not the power to mould tariffs with an exclusive view to their own pockets.

To all this Mr. Goldwin Smith might answer, and doubtless with truth, that if there is much corruption in America, there is also a great body of thoroughly sound public sentiment, determined, at whatever cost, to wipe off the taint which is now disgracing the public morality. The honest classes have a difficult task to perform, and one which is beset with many difficulties from which we are free in England; we can only wish them success, and hope that some of the young yeomen from Cornell University may take their part in the battle, animated by the recollection of Mr. Goldwin Smith's advice and example. But he himself would not deny that there is also a stratum of healthy feeling in England. Indeed he looks forward to a gradual emancipation in the course of future elections. There are rich men in Parliament, but the rich men know well enough that they have at their backs a different set of constituents from those whom they had formerly to consult. Whenever questions come up of a more exciting nature than those now before us—and even the Times has begun to discuss primogeniture—these men will make their power felt. We surely need not despair that people will one day discover that they may spend less money if they give more pledges, and that ardent democrats, not to say demagogues, will learn how to stir the sentiments of the lower classes of electors. We are at the beginning of things, and it is early to despair of a change. Even the Americans did not learn the machinery of caucuses and party platforms till several elections had passed over their heads; and he would be a bold man who would assert that in a few years we may not be in presence of a profounder agitation than any which this generation has known. Surely there is at least a chance for the highminded democratic politician to find leverage for introducing his schemes; there is powder enough in the country if somebody will only set a match to it; and to give up the game is merely to leave the task to the hands of less educated and less scrupulous teachers of the people.

THE TIPPERARY MURDER.

THE murder of Mr. Baker has revived some stock fallacies on the subject of agrarian outrages. There are two ways of looking at a fact of this kind, which seem to commend themselves with unvarying success to two opposite types of Irish politicians. Both have at least the merit of simplicity. According to one theory, the same offence cannot be repeatedly committed by a class of men who are not professed criminals without the law being the real sinner. In Ireland, landlords are frequently killed by their tenants. Consequently the legal relation between them is necessarily faulty. The defect of this method of reasoning is that it assumes that class instincts are always sound; whereas we see every day that, under the influence of passion or interest, large bodies of men can easily persuade themselves that they have a clear right to something which is denied them as much by morality as by law. The Sheffield sawgrinders, for example, thought themselves justified in assassinating a fellow-workman who had broken trade rules. From their point of view they had a right, under certain circumstances, to the disposal of their victim's labour; and since he denied this right in practice, the law which sustained him in his independence had to bear the blame of the course which it compelled the Union to take. Poaching is another case in point. Be the defects of the Game laws what they may, no reasonable person can suppose that a man has any moral right to take a pheasant he has not fed on land he does not own. And yet the peasantry in a preserving district are, for the most part, thoroughly convinced that the law which forbids them to do this is an unjust law. In Ireland, the fact that an evicted tenant has frequently no means left him of getting a livelihood makes an argument derived from his views about eviction additionally open to suspicion. Those who suffer by the operation of law are inevitably prejudiced critics of its provisions. Men who owe money can rarely be got to admit the fairness of a compulsory payment of debts.

To Irishmen of another school the conclusion to be drawn from the existence of agrarian crime is, in all respects but its certainty, the exact contrary of the last. In their judgment a murder implies a murderer, and it implies nothing more. Speculations as to the causes which give this particular form of outrage such an exceptional prominence are wholly useless. Even supposing that the law were proved to be defective in this or that particular, it would in no way explain the facts. No imperfection in the Statute-book can justify a man in taking the life of another; and unless you are prepared to go the length of defending murder, it is idle, and worse than idle, to devise apparent palliations of it. The error in this argument is that it assumes that a cause must be of equal magnitude with its effect. The existence of a particular class of crimes has to be accounted for. If the law against which they are committed allowed the landlord to subject his tenant to any gross outrage, reasoners of this class would admit that the law might be the cause of the mischief. But before allowing this they demand that a sufficient indictment shall be made out against it—that the injustice should be proved to be great enough to excuse the crime. Instead of this, it is constantly found that what may be thought very trifling circumstances are capable of producing a tone of mind which finds expression in acts that seem to have very little connexion with the circumstances in which they originated. A small wrong will easily lead a violent, or a revengeful, or a sensitive man into the commission of a crime which is utterly out of proportion to the injury he has sustained. An Englishman strikes an Italian, and the latter snatches up a knife and kills the aggressor on the spot. We hang the Italian, and we are quite right in doing so; but if the same result is again and again produced by the same cause, a wise legislator will begin to consider whether the law as to assaults may not be improved. It may be easier to prevent a man from striking another than to prevent the man who is struck from taking his revenge; and in this way the ultimate peace of society may be secured by a reform which is apparently quite unconnected with the evil which has to be dealt with.

If, then, it is wrong to assume that because agrarian crime is common the law of landlord and tenant must be bad, and equally wrong to assume that because the law is not flagrantly opposed to our elementary notions of justice it cannot be in any way to blame for the disrespect in which it is held, is there any middle path between these two extremes? We think there is. Experience has shown that though the prevalence of an exceptional class of crime is no proof that the law needs revision, it does supply a reason why the question should be carefully investigated. It by no means follows that the result of the inquiry must be unfavourable to the law as it stands. The utmost the facts establish is, that there is a primâ facie case against it—a case which, when examined, may prove to be absolutely worthless, but which does for the moment afford a reason why the examination should be instituted. It is quite true that in all countries, and under all institutions, there is a tendency on the part of those who have not to covet the goods of those who have, and the land-hunger of the Irish peasant may be only a peculiar form of this general sentiment. But then it must be admitted that a form which departs so widely from the ordinary type may turn out to be something more than a mere variety of a common species. The Irishman is not found to be exceptionally dishonest in other respects. He is not exceptionally impatient of the inevitable distinctions between wealth and poverty. Rather he may be said to err on the side of a too easy acceptance of the latter as his inevitable state. It is only when land is concerned that he developes this uncontrolled passion, and treats as an unpardonable wrong any effective assertion of the landlord's claims. Society cannot stop to parley with such a sentiment as this, when it presents itself in the form of an accomplished crime. The supremacy of the law must be asserted in the first instance, and no countenance given to the notion that a faulty social arrangement, even if such exists, is any excuse for overt wrong-doing. But when the murderer has been hanged, we may then rightly consider whether we have ourselves had any part in generating the state of mind out of which his crime grew—a state of mind which the popular verdict upon that crime shows to be shared by numbers who have never gone to the same lengths in giving it expression.

In such an inquiry as is here suggested we shall probably be led to assign a prominent place to the negligence of successive Governments and successive Parliaments in devising a remedy for a wrong which they admit to exist. As long as a nation or a class is unable to persuade its rulers that they are suffering under injustice, there is at all events room to hope that new arguments may at any moment work a new conviction in the minds of those to whom they are addressed. But when once the fact of the injustice is admitted, without the admission being followed by any practical measures, the feeling of the people towards the Legislature undergoes a sensible change. Men will bear serious wrongs committed in good faith more patiently than far lighter ones conceived in what they consider to be wantonness or indifference. There are judgments a good many years old, of the Irish Law Courts, in which the Judges openly regret that they are compelled to enforce evictions against tenants who have invested large sums in the improvement of their holdings, and have then been sent about their business, either from some religious quarrel, or because the landlord wished to pocket the interest of the tenant's capital in the shape of increased rent. Probably there are but few instances of this sort, but this does not alter the facts that such cases have occurred, that when they have been brought into court the Judges have been compelled to decide against the tenant, whom they at the same time declared to have a moral claim on his landlord for the amount of the money sunk, and that, in spite of this solemn impeachment of the existing law by those who are charged with its administration, no effectual steps have yet been taken to bring the law into harmony with justice. It does not matter that an eviction of this kind is extremely rare, or that by far the greater number are for the mere vulgar reason that the tenant has not paid his rent. The entire process is tainted with the confessed vice which attaches to it here and there. A law which sustains a bad landlord once in five years must expect to be distrusted during the whole of the intervening period.

PRISON CHAPLAINS AND THE CONDEMNED CELL.

REGRETS have often been expressed that the English clergy are not more scientifically trained. If they are good preachers, it is not because they have been taught the arts, for arts they are, of composing or delivering sermons. If they are what is called good parish priests—a safe euphemism, in too many cases, for general fussiness—it is certainly not because they have been scientifically instructed in the pastoral care. Our spiritual pastors and masters do their work in a certain empirical way, and, like other empirics, they often in the long run get considerable facility from having gone the full round of successes and failures. If, as is often the case, they have the mother wit to note and profit by the blunders which they may have fallen into, like untrained physicians, in the long and disastrous attempt to do their work by the light of nature and so-called common sense, they may at last turn out to be good workmen enough. But they have no training to thank for their proficiency, if they ever acquire it. It may be said they do not want training, at least in that particular department of the ministerial work which in other religious communities is considered the most important of the clerical functions, the special dealing in spiritual things with individuals. We are in England told that, as religion generally is a thing between man and his Maker, so religion specifically—that is, the special and personal life of special men—is too sacred to be interfered with by a priest or minister. The Protestant Church, it is said, has no place for confessors or priestly authority. As to the right or wrong of this or that view of religion—as regards the intervention or interference of any third person, be he priest or layman, between man and his Maker—we shall not here enter into any discussion. We confine ourselves to facts. It is an admitted and unquestionable doctrine of the Church of England, that in some form—a modified one no doubt—the duty, under certain circumstances, of the formal, or what is called sacramental, confession is distinctly recognised. The doctrine may be true or false, and acting upon it may be wise or unwise, but there it is. And we may add that somehow or other natural religion or human instinct has implanted in the general conscience of mankind the feeling that, in the case of a great crime, the mere fact of avowing and confessing it, the unburdening of the guilty conscience, has to the mind the same effect that lifting a heavy burden has off the shoulders. Hence the proverbial saying that murder will out; hence the uncontrollable impulse of the murderer to proclaim in spite of himself, even to the winds and waves, his guilt; hence too the interest which everybody feels whether a great criminal, before he suffers, confesses or not.

Further than this. There is a class of clergymen who are brought by their particular duties very frequently face to face with the most arduous and difficult department of their professional functions. We do not know whether gaol chaplains fall above or below the average professional and official qualifications of the English clergy. It were very strange if they exceeded the ordinary standard. It is certain that they receive no particular training for their duties, which, from the nature of the case, are peculiar as well as arduous. The post of a prison chaplain is not usually sought after. Perhaps it ought to be; but as a fact it is not. And yet it is one particularly recognised, and as far as the State, whether represented by a Court of Aldermen or by country Justices, is concerned, it is one in which those clerical functions which we have spoken of as elsewhere proscribed are especially enjoined and required to be exercised. It is the duty of the gaol chaplain to deal personally with men's souls. If he did not daily visit the prisoners, especially those condemned to death, and do that work which, anywhere else and under any other circumstances, would be stigmatized as priestcraft and sacerdotal assumption and presumption, he would certainly be dismissed from his office. Now, if one comes to think of it, this dealing with a convicted murderer, which we must remember is not a matter left to the gaol chaplain's discretion or taste to do or not to do, is about as difficult and delicate a work as can be laid upon a man. And if, as we have said, there is no particular education or instruction provided by authority for training chaplains to this duty, which requires so much judgment and discretion, gaol chaplains, we think, must be judged with some lenity and consideration when they make mistakes.

We are led to these thoughts by a late incident. A woman, one Biggadike, was convicted on the 11th of December, at Lincoln, of the murder of her husband, on very clear evidence. The Judge had no doubt left on his mind of her guilt. She was executed a week or two ago. It seems that the woman would not confess; that the chaplain's efforts to draw from her one word of confession, or even contrition, were all along unavailing. On the scaffold the chaplain renewed or continued his entreaties. She still persisted in declaring her innocence. The chaplain was equally persistent. The execution, it appears, was for a time suspended, while the entreaties on the one hand, and refusal on the other, to confess were continued. At last—so the reporter says—the chaplain said, "Had you made a declaration of your sins, I should have done what, as a minister of Christ, I am entitled to do. I should have told you that your sins, though many, are forgiven. I am sorry I cannot exercise that authority at the present moment. I leave you to God." Whereupon it is argued, that though the chaplain was quite right in what he did within the prison, his "efforts are not to be justified when continued to the foot of the gallows . . . when the wretched woman was brought face to face with the executioner, she belonged to him and to none else, and nothing should have been suffered to delay the speedy termination of her sufferings." Further, a distinction is drawn between "a religion in which priestly authority figures," and our religion, and it is said that "an English clergyman ill understands his functions when he seeks to frighten the conscience of a condemned culprit by resorting to superstitious terrors." This last rodomontade we shall not enter into, because, whether we like it or not, the doctrine of confession and absolution—except as to the single point of its general necessity—is precisely the same in every branch of the Church, Greek, Roman, or Anglican. But the case does present points of interesting inquiry. It is by no means clear that the confession urged by the Lincoln chaplain was sacramental, or quasi-sacramental, confession at all. Perhaps it was, and some of the chaplain's expressions lead to this conclusion. If this is what the chaplain wanted, it will not be pretended that he ought to have absolved the criminal without confession; and if so, all that he said was perfectly justifiable. Indeed, had he said or done anything else—especially had he, which perhaps would have pleased sensation readers better, wafted the Lincolnshire Clytemnestra to an immediate heaven on the wings of an ecstatic congratulation—he would have "ill understood his functions." But ought a chaplain's exhortations to confession to be confined to the prison walls? We can quite understand that till the recent Act came into operation nothing but scandal would be the result of imploring such a person to confess in the presence of a roaring multitude of spectators. But this does not apply to these private executions. It must, we think, be left to every chaplain's private feeling of what is right and proper, how long or how persistently to continue what not only he feels to be, but what undoubtedly are, his duties. As to the cruelty said to be inflicted on "the wretched woman," we own to very little sympathy on that score. The only question which remains is the broad one, and we think an interesting one, how ought a chaplain to deal with obstinate murderers when condemned to death? In other words, for we make no doubt about the law—that is, the ecclesiastical and spiritual law—on the matter, was this chaplain's conduct on this particular occasion expedient or not? We should be sorry to have to decide, or to say whether he was right or wrong. Admitting—for so much we assume, as do the critics—that confession was the right thing, ought or ought not the chaplain to have ceased to urge it in the presence of the gallows? Was he discreet or indiscreet? All that we need say is, that he was placed in a most difficult position, and one in which he ought not to be left to his own sense of duty. If there is to be such an office as that of gaol chaplain, his duties under these terrible, but not unforeseen, emergencies ought to be settled by some authority. Bishops tell us how anxious they are, "as set over their clergy in the Lord, to give them advice and counsel when placed in difficulties," and they express their anxiety by sending their advice first to the newspapers, and afterwards to those most concerned. What if the Bishops were to offer their advice and counsel to these poor gaol chaplains about difficulties which must be constantly recurring, and to draw up some authoritative manual to assist the chaplains in such emergencies? We have looked with some interest to a popular manual much used in France, the Abbé Gaume's Manuel des Confesseurs, certain, as we thought, to find explicit directions in a case which, whatever its difficulties, must be, or at least used to be, common enough. But even the precise and technical and authoritative Roman authorities are very vague. "If the condemned absolutely refuses to confess . . . he is to be prayed for by religious communities . . . he is again and again to be exhorted, &c.; if at last he comes to the scaffold unrepentant and unconfessing, he is to be recommended to the prayers of the spectator." "Il peut encore être utile de l'épouvanter en lui disant, Va, maudit, en enfer, puisque tu veux te damner. Mais hâtez-vous de reprendre sur le ton de la douceur." "If, however, when on the scaffold, he desires to confess," &c. Whatever may be thought of the Lincoln chaplain's judgment, it is satisfactory that he did not do what the Roman penitentiary suggests. And, whether he was right or wrong, in the absence of authoritative instruction as to his duties, the particular way in which that functionary discharged them ought not to be too severely canvassed.

REVIEWS.

RELIQUIÆ HEARNIANÆ.*

WHEN the Reliquiæ Hearnianæ were originally published in 1857, the impression was limited to 200 copies, and, as the subscription price was not suited to every pocket, they ranked among library luxuries. But as there is some valuable contemporary history and much curious matter in these diaries, Mr. John Russell Smith has done good service in bringing them more within general reach. Nor are Dr. Bliss's volumes now merely reprinted. Considerable additions have been made to them from Hearne's manuscripts in the Bodleian, a good index is provided, and the late Mr. Beriah Botfield's corrected copy of the Bibliotheca Hearniana is now included in the appendix.

Thomas Hearne, the butt of some wits and many blockheads in his day, was born in 1678, and died in the summer of 1735. He was accordingly old enough in 1688, and to all appearance observant enough also, to retain a deep if not a lively recollection of the Revolution. Of the events of Queen Anne's reign he was a keen watcher; he survived her successor eight years, and thus he was contemporary with the entire Jacobite movement except its last spring tide in "the '45." He was twenty-four years old when, if Atterbury had had his own way, James III. and not George I. would have been proclaimed at Charing Cross and on Tower Hill. He was thirty-seven years old when the clans were at Preston; he saw Sarah of Marlborough supplanted by Dame Abigail Masham; Bolingbroke in opposition, in the Cabinet, in exile; Lord Oxford in the Tower; and the Duke of Ormond a fugitive. He was intimate enough with the adherents and envoys of the Stuarts to be aware that some of the Jacobite leaders were in the pay of King George, and some of the Whig Ministers pensioners of King James. He was a Nonjuror, and staunch enough in his principles to suffer them to stand in the way of his own advancement. The greater part of his life was spent in the most Jacobitical city of England, and his Journals display how slight and precarious were the ties then binding Oxford to the House of Brunswick. His political faith imparts some life to his memoranda. It is amusing to find him usually terming the crowned and anointed sovereign of Great Britain, Ireland, and France the Duke of Brunswick, and withholding from the second of the Georges and Queen Caroline their proper titles. He grudges Marlborough his victories; finds nothing to commend in the policy of Godolphin, Sunderland, or Stanhope; thinks meanly of Locke as a philosopher, of Addison as a writer, and rates Tillotson and Sherlock nearly on a level with Annas and Caiaphas. The first editor of these Reliquiæ could well enter into the feelings of Thomas Hearne in religion and in politics. Dr. Bliss was a Tory of the Tories, and viewed with dread and suspicion, if not indeed with a stronger emotion, the Ecclesiastical Commission, Reform in Parliament, and Reform in the Universities. He becomes quite eloquent when he writes of the Revolution of 1832. He mourns over a reformed House of Commons as the pious Jews who remembered the first Temple wept over the dishonours of the second. He was Hearnius Redivivus. The "Ichabod" of Hearne pointed to the throne; the "Ichabod" of * Reliquiæ Hearnianæ. The Remains of Thomas Hearne, M.A., of Edmund Hall; being Extracts from his Diaries collected, with a few Notes, by Philip Bliss. 3 vols. London: J. R. Smith. 1869.

Dr. Bliss to St. Stephen's Chapel; "every man of birth," he writes, "has been excluded to make way for linendrapers and dissenting ministers, railroad contractors and railroad speculators, gamblers on the Stock Exchange and founders of bubble-banks." Owls roost and satyrs dance, in the Doctor's opinion, in this assembly. Yet was he felix opportunitate mortis: he mourned over the degradation of Britain in 1832. His "head would have become fountains of waters" in 1868:—

> These Remains of Thomas Hearne [Dr. Bliss informs us] are derived from one hundred and forty-five small octavo manuscript volumes, one of which the writer was accustomed to carry constantly in his pocket and in it to note down, at the moment or immediately after, what he thought, what he read, what he saw himself; in short, everything he deemed worthy of preservation, or that he fancied hereafter might be useful; and these observations he accompanies with his own remarks, which are, in many respects, the more valuable as being the result of his immediate observation and opinion. They date from July 4, 1705, and extend to June 4, 1735. Hearne continually quotes them in his printed works as "Collectanea Nostra," and regarded them with peculiar affection; he tells Browne Willis that on no consideration would he suffer any of these note-books out of his own hands; and on more than one occasion was apprehensive lest the University authorities would break open his rooms to obtain possession of them. Had they done so, the consequences doubtless must have been most serious; for the reader will soon perceive that our author was very unguarded in his expressions towards the reigning family, and at no pains to conceal his predilections for that in exile, which he regarded as having a legitimate claim to the crown.

To carry a note-book continually, and to put down in it all that its owner sees, hears, or thinks at the moment, constitutes the perfect journalist. Gray's injunction to Norton Nichols, setting out on his travels, to "remember that a few notes on the spot are worth a cart-load of recollections afterwards," is equally applicable to the keepers of diaries. Smooth and polished "reminiscences of a life" are very often far less readable than such rough and unconnected jottings down as those of Anthony Wood and Thomas Hearne. Johnson's Letters from the Hebrides are far more entertaining than his Tour to the Hebrides; and his letters would have been far better than they are had their writer been less in the habit of casting his thoughts into a fixed mould. Gibbon records in his Memoirs the brilliant conversation and lax morals of John Wilkes; but we get a far livelier version of Wilkes from Gibbon's Journal, where he describes him roused from sleep, after he had left the supper-table, to drink one more bottle of Burgundy. There is no ashlar-work in Hearne's Diary; he leaves the stones and mortar of Collectanea Nostra exposed as they stood in the hundred and forty-five small octavos. Satirical writers, often indifferent and unjust portrait-painters of individual men, are as often useful indexes and echoes of the public opinion of their times. Their bows were not drawn at a venture; the butts were already planted in the ground of popular prejudice. There is much history to be derived from satire as well as from caricature. Donne and Hall throw some light on the dull pages of Rushworth and Rymer; Dryden and Pope illustrate Burnet and Defoe; and Churchill helps us to understand the hatred and jealousy of the Scotch that prevailed in South Britain for at least the first ten years of George III.'s reign. During a considerable period of the last century, if not indeed throughout it, the studies of antiquaries, philologers, and natural philosophers were favourite objects of satire; and Thomas Hearne shared with no less a man than Richard Bentley the distinction of being ridiculed by Pope. This fashion of mocking at important and laudable pursuits was, besides being a symptom of general ignorance in the nation, an effect of the belief that all sound knowledge and good taste were confined to the classical writers of Greece and Rome. It was in such a spirit that Boileau wrote his often quoted and very unjust line—

> Et le clinquant du Tasse à tout l'or de Virgile.

The student who a hundred years ago pored over Saxon charters, or collected coins and "auld nick-nackets," was set down by the fashionable vulgar and their poets as beyond the pale of the learned, or as an idly busy, if not half-witted, person. The stage seconded the banter or abuse of the satirists. Woodward, one of the precursors of our Lyells and Murchisons, was brought on the boards by Samuel Foote; the antiquary in the Bold Stroke for a Wife has for his "maternal uncle," whose coat he is wearing, "Mr. John Tradescant, a very curious personage indeed"; and the British Essayists from Alpha to Omega, from the Tatler to the Connoisseur, abound in ridicule of virtuosos and men of science. Could Thomas Hearne have seen in a vision the present position of archæologists, their transactions, their pilgrimages to shrines and churches, and the jolly-companionship of their periodical meetings, he might have fairly thought that the kingdom of the just would arrive in these favoured times.

Gibbon was more just to this plodding antiquary than many or most of his contemporaries. In his Address to the Public on a New Edition of Early English Historians he writes:—

> The last who has dug deep in the mine was Thomas Hearne, a clerk of Oxford, poor in fortune, and indeed poor in understanding. His minute and obscure diligence, his voracious and undistinguishing appetite, and the coarse vulgarity of his taste and style, have exposed him to the ridicule of idle wits. Yet it cannot be denied that Thomas Hearne has gathered many gleanings of the harvest; and if his own prefaces are filled with crude and extraneous matter, his editions will always be recommended by their accuracy and use.

There was, indeed, more than one reason why Hearne was a butt for the archers. He was an oddity, and there is scarcely, even unto this day, a graver offence to Englishmen than any departure in speech, garb, or manner from the prevailing norma loquendi, or the coats, hats, and opinions of the period. The stulti of Horace are oddities. Again, Hearne was a sturdy Nonjuror and a Jacobite; he was at war with the authorities at Oxford; he was odious to people whose conscience was more pliant than his was; his tongue was apparently as coarse on occasion as his style; he was one who would "keep his hat on even though he stood before the Cham of Tartary." The care and valour that was in him were out of fashion. Nearly every page in his Diaries that is not devoted to tombstones, epitaphs, pedigrees, manuscripts, and worm-eaten chronicles betrays his stiffness in opinion. He was no granter of propositions even when they were sanctified by a Bishop's charge; he scrupled not to speak his mind about hirelings in the Church, placemen in the Senate, or intruders on the Throne. His "hundred and forty-five manuscript volumes" deserve to have said of them what Jeffreys said of Baxter's folios, that they were "as full of treason as an egg is of meat." He did well to let no man see them. They would have made Oxford too hot to hold him; they might have drawn upon him the unpleasant attention of "the Duke of Brunswick's" (more commonly styled George I.) Attorney-General. They were as dangerous to bear about as Bellerophon's Letters, for he was not so prudent as Samuel Pepys was—he did not hide his perilous notes under a cypher.

We profess a fervent admiration for "gossips," especially if we can read their diaries instead of listening to their talk. We do not require it to be served up, as Horace Walpole's gossip was, on a china platter; we are content with it on cheap Samian ware. The earliest of the Greek historians extant derives half his value from having been a gossip of the first order. We dispute not the majesty of Thucydides, yet we would give up a moiety of the speeches in his narrative for an equal quantity of anecdotage. The Bishop of Sarum's "History of his own Times" is worth a cartload of "Histories of the Reformation." For this and other divers reasons we hold in reverence the memory of Thomas Hearne. Doubtless he did excellent service by printing Robert of Gloucester's and Peter Langtoft's Chronicles. His theory about the origin and purpose of Stonehenge may or may not be sound; his edition of Adam de Domerham, his Textus Roffensis, may be without spot or blemish; but it is not these labours and virtues that make his memory a sweet savour in our estimation. It is his gossip that entitles him to the wish of perpetual spring and ever-blowing violets on his grave. We will lay before our readers a few samples from the hortus siccus of the Reliquiæ Hearnianæ:—

> August 22, 1705: Yesterday Mr. Gilby, Bach. of Law, Fellow of All Souls Col. and one of the Proctors in the Vice-Chancellor's Court, died of a consumption, which he said a little before he died he thought verily to have proceeded from a piece of cherry-stone which some time since went down his windpipe and caused a corruption in his lungs, which though it might be one cause, yet 'tis said the chief was hard drinking.

In a note he says:—

> I have since been informed that his throate was cut by some atheisticall people of the college.
> October 14: The Mr. Cowper who is made Lord Keeper is but forty-one years of age, being the youngest lord keeper ever known; but he is a man of parts and learning, tho' of very bad principles and morals, being well known to have had two wives at a time; a man of no religion, &c.

The "two wives" lead us to suspect that Hearne's brains were wool-gathering at the time of this entry in his Journal. He apparently confounds William Cowper, who became in this year (1705) Lord Keeper, with his brother Spencer, for love of whom a young Quakeress of Hertford drowned herself in 1699. In the eyes of a Jacobite, indeed, any stone was good enough to throw at the Cowpers; for had not William defended Lord Chancellor Somers in 1700; had he not in 1696 supported the attainder of Fenwick; had not this par nobile of the Whigs been among the ablest and most strenuous supporters of the Dutchman William, and of the Godolphin Cabinet of Anne?

> November 6: Mr. Pullen of Magd. Hall last night told me that there was once a very remarkable stone in Magd. Hall Library, which was afterwards lent to Dr. Plott, who never returned it, replying, when he was asked for it, "that 'twas a rule amongst antiquaries to receive, and never restore."
>
> Dec. 9: To show that the Dutchess of Marlborough (commonly called Queen Zarah) has the ascendant over the Queen, I could not but remark these two instances: the first is, that when the Queen had made a grant to one Mr. Dobyns of a living, the said Queen Zarah made the Queen recall the grant before it passed the seals, upon this suggestion of Zarah's, that his father voted against Killigrew at St. Alban's. The second is this: that when Prince George (who is lookt upon as a man of little spirit and understanding) sollicited the Queen, his wife, for some friend of his, Zarah, who happened to be by at that time, cryed out, Christ! madam, I am promised it before!

From the following extract, 1706, January 27, it may be inferred that the "Great Duke" of the eighteenth century was no less chary of his venison than he was, according to common report, of his money:—

> Dr. Mill, who was one of those that went to wait upon the Duke of Marlborough at Woodstock, to complement him for a poor piece of venison which the Dutchess, without the Duke's privity, sent to the Whiggish heads of houses, slyly left his company and went to his parsonage at Bletchingdon, and the next morning borrowing a couple of horses went early to attend his Grace's levee, and let him know who he was (for it seems his Grace knew not one of those persons who were the day before to wait upon him—namely, a tutor some years ago to his youngest brother, who was commoner of Queen's Coll., and took the degrees of bachelor and master of arts, and entered into holy orders on purpose to have some great preferment which was designed for him; but he died of a consumption before it fell). It must be further noticed that the Duke, understanding that these persons were not sent by the University (but came of their own accord), received them after a slight manner, as is noted, and styled them a body of divinity, and, to enliven their stupid Whiggish clay, sent them half a dozen bottles of wine to a little inne at Woodstock, where they were content to be slenderly accommodated.

Mr. Mill was well advised in "slyly leaving" such "base bisognos" as his companions on the first day, and hurrying back on the second to let the great, but ignorant, Duke know who he was. He was no other than the Mill who collated the MSS. of the Greek Testament, corresponded with Bentley and Newton, and neither was nor considered himself to be unworthy of Marlborough's company, or one to be sent to a tavern to drink wine, as if he had been a groom. Hearne says that he gave considerable aid to Mill in his collations when at Oxford in 1696.

March 29, 1706: Mr. Francis Bugg having presented the Bishop of Worcester with his second volume against Quakerism, he refused to accept it, and shewed great resentment; the reason whereof may be because of Sir William Penn's being so great at Court, having persuaded them that there are 40,000 quaking freeholders in England.

August 6: We have an account from Whitchurch, in Shropshire, that the dissenters there having prepared a great quantity of bricks to erect a capacious conventicle, a destroying angel came by night and spoyled them all, and confounded their Babel in the beginning, to their great mortification.

We have heard that Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle was built with difficulty, owing to the "contradiction of" non-subscribing "sinners," but the age of chivalry is expired, and destroying angels are no longer at the beck of the Church.

March 1, 1707: When King William was in Oxford in 1695 Ant. à Wood who saw him in the Theatre resembled him to one Hen. Earle, a poor, thin, meagre, hawked-nosed fellow in St. Clement's parish; who was indeed exactly like him.

In the next, which must be the last extract from the Diaries, we get a peep at Hearne's occasional company:—

October 23, 1711: Mr. Giffard (a non-juror) told us last night (when several of us were in company, all honest men), that the young King (King James III.) was in England when the present Queen (as she is styled) his sister was crowned, and he further says, that the Queen kissed him at that time, he being present at the Coronation. This is a great secret.

The Reliquiæ Hearnianæ should be read immediately before or after the autobiography of Anthony Wood. Kindred in taste and pursuits, the two men were kindred also in their political and theological opinions. In either journal Oxford is ὀμφαλὸς γῆς—the centre, and with Hearne the circumference as well, of the narrow circle in which they moved. Wood, a Royalist, who lived in the University while it was the seat of a Court and a beleaguered town, Hearne, a Jacobite and Nonjuror, present us with a very lively portraiture of the faith and politics of their home. Of all English cities Oxford perhaps had suffered most in the Stuart cause. Her learned quietude was disturbed by the presence of roistering cavaliers; then by the visitation of their opponents; and, when what she considered better times had come, she was outraged and insulted by the bigotry of James II. Yet in Oxford, long after his abdication, even until Britain, at the accession of George III., was at last reconciled to the House of Brunswick, there was to be found more fervid Jacobitism than prevailed in the northern English counties, or among the Highland clans. From this hearth was distributed to many an altar in the land the sacred fire of right divine; and many a country parson, inspired by the genius loci of the Theatre and the Bodleian, while he prayed officially for the Act of Parliament King, offered up in his closet far more sincere petitions for the restoration of the house and lineage of David. Of such enthusiasm, honest, however stupid, Thomas Hearne is a fair example; and the salt that preserves his Diaries, and keeps them still readable, is his conviction that England would never be "merry world again" until a Stuart returned to St. James's and a Nonjuror to Lambeth.

BARTSCH'S CHRESTOMATHIE PROVENÇALE.*

OUR literature appears to owe to the Provençal poets the two important heirlooms of the doctrine of chivalry and the discipline of rhyming. It is perhaps possible to find a few microscopic rudiments of rhyme in classical Latin or in older languages, but it is in the early monuments of the Occitanian dialects that the system first commands our notice by a vigorous and exuberant vitality from which we cannot help inferring that we have entered into a new era. Moreover, the Troubadour loves to pursue the same consonance through ten or twenty consecutive lines rather than two or three, or to repeat it at intervals through pieces much longer than Campbell's "Battle of Hohenlinden." He lingers complacently in the element which others hasten to cross by the shortest ford, and amuses himself like a child with a long-drawn singsong which is apt to weary every graver brain —the singsong that Chaucer faintly imitated in the "rhyme of Sir Thopas," which mine host of the Tabard rudely interrupted with

> No more of this for Goddes dignitee.
> Mine eres aken of thy draftie speche.
> Now such a rime the devil I beteche.
> This may be clept rime dogrel, quoth he.

And there is no reason to suppose that the poet of Southern France derived his taste for this kind of euphony from any foreign source. The structure of his native tongue facilitated and thrust upon him performances which it might drive a man crazy to have to emulate in English or German. The words he used were more frequently accented on the termination than on the root, and easily grouped themselves together by a mere grammatical relation which imposed no narrow limits on the material import of his expressions. But these terminations were more clipped and assimilated than those that correspond to them in Italian, and afforded an agreeable variety of single and double rhymes, of which the modern French masculine and feminine rhymes are but a poor representation. For it was a characteristic of this language of gallantry that most nouns enjoying the dignity of feminine gender drew behind them a train at least as ample as they had in Latin use, while the masculine nouns were roughly and quaintly curtailed; compare amica, a fair friend, with amics or amicx. Thus it seems as if the richest and most varied euphony of which the Provençal was susceptible could only be drawn out of it when the minstrel employed himself upon some topic bearing on the relations of the sexes.

That the South of France, or of the Gaul not yet altogether Frankicized of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, was the native land of chivalric institutions is a common but not unquestioned belief which has of late been ably vindicated by M. Eugène Baret, in his volume on "the Troubadours." But it is needless to examine with him whether we should attribute a peculiar capacity for women-worshipping to any of the races that originally peopled this region. We will not balance the claims of the Germans (whom Tacitus had praised long before for their practical respect for the sex), of the Celtic Gauls, whose bards may always have remained an influential caste, and of the old Roman and Greek families, whose poets may have supplied the popular tradition with a few choice texts magnifying the moral influence of grace and beauty. To us it seems probable that a fusion of Northern and Southern races had been a necessary condition of the development of chivalric sentiment. We may conceive a period in which the two sexes were to a great extent distinguished by breeding and nationality—the land overrun with foreign warriors, and its male defenders fallen in battle or massacre, but the women left alive to serve or solace the conquerors. On the male side would have been the old Norse enterprise, somewhat humbled by conscious ignorance and by the awe the Christian ritual inspired; on the female side Roman refinement, cultivated piety, a coyness heightened by habitual antipathy, and a resolution to claim some appearance of deference as the price of the affections that are not to be constrained by power. And in this manner might have been distinctly realized, for the time being, that "moral superiority of woman" which M. Baret makes the first postulate in chivalric poetry. We do not, of course, suggest that similar circumstances are everywhere needed to sustain a belief in this relation of the sexes. But we speak of what was necessary to give the sentiment a certain vogue and familiar recognition, through which it came at first to be protected and encouraged by formal social institutions. For the culture which chivalry received was by no means merely literary, and the poetry of the Troubadours probably owed all its vitality to the display that was secured for it by the manners and customs of its native country. The sonnets and canzons that might have been coldly received in private circles, or have seemed insipid if committed to the press for remote and pre-occupied readers, must have produced a quite different, and more than theatric, effect when recited before a brilliant audience, and accompanied with appropriate music, dance, or acting. Besides this, the recitations led to challenges, tenzons, or controversies in the bucolic manner, and to debates in assemblies of ladies respecting curious questions of love and gallantry, into which a circle of courtiers often entered in a spirit of partisanship, while the practical bearings of so much fantastic love-making were in some quarters treated with disdainful tolerance, though in others they gave rise to tragic consequences.

We have referred to M. Baret's recent publication as a brilliant critical résumé, which may excite among many of its readers a desire to become more or less acquainted with the remains of the poetry of the Troubadours. M. Bartsch's work, on the other hand, is simply a delectus, suited to the perusal of those who are determined to get themselves thoroughly well grounded in the ancient dialect, and to overcome all the difficulties of the confused and variable orthography of the Provençal MSS. On this ground, the extracts are arranged in strictly chronological order; and elucidated by a grammar and glossary which are very complete and rich in references, though perhaps a little too compact to be at first used with all desirable facility. The text comprises selections from more than a hundred poets, besides a few chapters and miscellaneous prose productions. The plan pursued has of course necessitated the admission of many second-rate and commonplace pieces, and has almost prevented M. Bartsch from quoting any of the most celebrated troubadours much more largely than the most insignificant. On the whole, however, this Manual contains much that can be read with interest and pleasure, many fine strokes of wit and fancy, many graceful and musical stanzas, many curious illustrations of history and manners, and here and there some compositions which bear the stamp of a strong mind and character. One among the earlier names which will attract the attention of an Englishman is that of Bertram de Born, who is introduced to us by five short and very spirited pieces. Two of these breathe a love of strife which is quite ferocious, and one of them comprises a bitter denunciation of the too unwarlike policy of the Kings of both France and England. Another poem denounces rich parvenus with a virulence that might satisfy any modern Chartist, if it were the rights of labour, and not those of a feudal predatory gentility, which Bertram had asserted in opposition to capital. There is something more generous in his elegy on his friend Prince Henry; but the specimen of his addresses to his lady-love, or what he passes off for such, contains a singularly coarse jest. Among the other troubadours mentioned by Dante, we find Sordello represented by a single poem, but one very characteristic of the high-minded and disdainful spirit described in the Purgatorio:—

* Chrestomathie Provençale, accompagnée d'une grammaire et d'un glossaire. Par Karl Bartsch. Elberfeld: R. L. Friderichs, Éditeur. 1868.

> O anima lombarda,
> Come te stavi altera e disdegnosa,
> E nel mover degli occhi onesta e tarda.

It is ostensibly an elegy on a knight named Blacat, and intimates that with him valour is gone out of the world, and that there is no chance of its being recovered unless his heart should be taken out of his body and given to some of the heartless kings and princes of the age to divide among them. The Emperor Frederic should eat a piece, if he wishes to conquer the Milanese, who have now conquered and overthrown him in spite of his Germans. His example should be followed by the King of England, who has lost all his Continental provinces; the Kings of France, and Castile, &c.; and the poor Count of Toulouse, who has been turned out of his dominions as a heretic. Sordello concludes by saying, "The barons will bear me a grudge for speaking the truth about them; but let them be assured I esteem them as lightly as they do me." We cannot venture to say much of Arnaut Daniel, of whom Dante speaks so enthusiastically as a patriarch among the Troubadours. He is represented by a sestina, and another poem of six stanzas and a half—a wonderful labyrinth of rhymes, of which the meaning is beyond our reach.

A little beyond this period we find the love-songs of the Troubadours rudely interrupted by a martial ballad about the Crusade against the Albigenses, of which the writer is clever enough to give us thirty-five consecutive rhymes in utz, and forty-three in ens. He is a little outdone by Izarn, who describes with fanatical zest the examination of a heretic by a priest, who has it in his power to burn him alive. By the side of a fierce polemical attack on the corruptions of the Roman Church, we have hereabouts a pretty hymn to the Virgin, which gravely informs us that she received God through the medium of the ear, and ends with the quaint petition:—

> Lady, wife, daughter, and mother,
> Command thy Son, and pray thy Father,
> Speak with and counsel thy Husband,
> That mercy may be obtained for us.

And in these varieties we reach the close of the most flourishing period of Provençal state and literature, though M. Bartsch's selections are carried on into the fourteenth or fifteenth centuries, in which romantic narratives and glosses on older poems take the place of more personal effusions. But some of the most charming poems before us will be found among those of the twelfth century, as a dialogue by Marcabrun between a virtuous country-girl, or villana, and a young lord who does her the honour to admire her; also a young lady's lament (by the same author) for a lover who has gone to the Crusade under St. Louis. The poems of the eleventh century only comprise a few hymns and a metrical paraphrase of Boethius, a moralist whose influence is less traceable in Provençal than Italian poetry.

A BOOK FOR A QUIET HOUR.*

THE dedication of this curious book discloses straightway to the reader the manner of the man to whose hands he has committed himself, and the kind of writing which he may look forward to. "To John Ruskin, Esq., LL.D.," the author offers his little tribute in admiration of genius and character. "I wish," he goes on, "I had more to offer; but a flower shows the heart as much as a diamond." And a dedication may show character as much as a volume; if a writer takes an opportunity where he should be absolutely simple, unaffected, and genuine, to show how clever he is, and what pretty things he can invent all out of his own head, then we may be quite sure that he will take good care to make the same sort of opportunity for himself in every page of his book. And this is just what Mr. Cunningham Geikie does, and if he were the only person concerned, it would not much matter. Affectation and emptiness are no crimes, and one is too much accustomed to be taken by the button-hole by affected and empty writers to have any inward fires of resentment kindled by a new-comer of the same stamp. But though resentment would be out of place, one is warranted in feeling a kind of prickly amusement; we tingle, yet smile; smart a little, yet find no heart for reproaches. It is certain that Mr. Cunningham Geikie means well, that he thinks a high morality a good thing, that he admires the Christian religion, that he has read in some good authors, that he wishes all the world were as wise and as high-minded as himself, and that he honestly believes that the publication of his present book is a very important contribution towards this most desirable consummation. All this shows that good feeling towards the human race which is the very flower and fruit of all the virtues. But then we sigh for more. We would fain have, as well as universal benevolence, particular common sense; a little knowledge of self as well as a great sympathy for others; a certain modesty in measuring capacity as well as grandeur in conceiving the task to be executed. It is when Mr. Geikie comes to details that he stumbles and is weak. His aspirations are sublime; his execution is sublime in manner also, but the fabric and matter of it is a sort of strange moral shoddy.

* Life: a Book for a Quiet Hour. By J. Cunningham Geikie. London: Stevens & Haynes. 1868.

Mr. Geikie, whom we take to be a young man, is like a great many young men, and a few elderly men. He has read Mr. Carlyle and Mr. Ruskin, and the fervid words of them have possessed him fully and entirely; they have filled him with notions of nobleness and duty, and contempt for shams, and hatred of villanies. This is all for good, but there is another side which is the opposite of good. The preachers have inspired the acolyte with a rash and impetuous thirst to turn preacher himself. It is always so with powerful speakers and writers operating on ingenuous youth, or on unusually impressible middle age. To stir up this eager desire to imitate is almost the first test and sign of preaching or prophetic power, and we have most of us learnt to our cost that Mr. Ruskin and Mr. Carlyle have both of them exerted this peculiar influence of the gift of tongues, though without any will of their own, still to a most terrible extent. The number of puny Ruskins, and very, very diminutive Carlyles, is all but tragic; souls born as homely and plain as may be, yet tricking themselves out in the garments of giants or gods. We can say no more to them, to Mr. Cunningham Geikie and the rest, than what their own teachers have said. Why copy things out of a book, when the whole world of actual circumstance, that with which men have really to do, lies at the door? We do not hint that Mr. Geikie is a plagiarist, yet his best friend, if he be candid as friends should be, will not pretend that there is a page of his own in the book. In short, he has filled himself with one or two writers, and then he has unfilled himself. It is natural. You are impressed by a picture, a book, a doctrine, a person; you cannot rest without seizing other men by the button and urging upon them the necessity of being impressed in like manner. So Mr. Geikie, overflowing with Ruskinism, is in as sharp pain as a cow unmilked, until he has taken the public into his confidence and told us all about it. It is amusing, if it is not startling, for men who have gone through the Carlylian stage, more happily than Mr. Geikie, without writing while the fever was yet upon them, to come suddenly upon an author in whom the old sensations are still fresh, the old impressions still powerful and irresistible. One has the thrill as of meeting an ancient friend in once more reading the Carlylian evangel of labour, from which as preached by Mr. Carlyle every man may profit, reproduced in somewhat shabbier guise by the Carlyliculus of the moment. "Where there is a will," remarks this volunteer occupant of our quiet hour, "the way will never be wanting," which is inexpugnably true. "Look around you; there is plenty at your hand that needs you. Only, Work. It is a cold world, and you cannot keep warm, except by constant activity." Is it a hundred or a thousand or ten thousand parallel passages to this that one would undertake to find in Sartor Resartus and its companions? Not even the big W in work is able to make it original. Or take the close of the effusion on Character. "You were made for God, young man," the author hails his reader, "and no Lie is of him, be it in trade or profession, in act or in word. Insincerities are marks in the devil's tally, and so are all hypocrisies and shams. Let your character be real, the shining warp and woof of each day working out the part God has set you in the great loom of Time." Now is it credible that Mr. Geikie, calmly retiring within himself, and pondering upon his own great injunction that we should look round in assured certainty that "there is plenty at your hand that needs you," has come to the conclusion that writing this kind of stuff is the work for which he was pre-ordained, that it is the sort of activity which keeps a man warm in this cold world, and generally that the reproduction of trite and elementary moralities is the thing needed at his hands? We should have supposed that of all forms of sham work, to be printed with the smallest of w's, the more bald bidding men be real is the least satisfactory, and that warp and woof spun out and woven in this fashion is not in any sense worthy of the great loom of time.

The funniest thing, and what makes Mr. Geikie's sins rather hard to pardon, is that he prints a letter from Mr. Carlyle to some young man who had written to ask him for advice, as to which that true sage replied, that "a long experience has taught me that advice can profit but little"; that the good reason why advice is so seldom followed is, "that it is so seldom, and can almost never be, rightly given," and so forth. Yet with these most sound and salutary counsels in his own private possession, our moralist is so pressed by we know not what unhappy cacoethes, that he undertakes to write a whole book of advice to mankind at large on things in general. Can such advice be rightly given? "No man," said Mr. Carlyle to his disciple, "knows the state of another; it is always to some more or less imaginary man that the wisest and most honest adviser is speaking." But to men such as Mr. Geikie appears to be, real or imaginary is all one; advise they must, or die. Not to advise is not to exist—is as though one were not. And such advice, too! There is something dramatically solemn in this great spectacle of Mr. Geikie on the one side commanding the human race on the other to be real; only, Work. His counsel is so specific, so realizable, so very useful to men in sore straits and doubts. But this is the point at which the imitator of the bigger preachers so wofully breaks down. Mr. Ruskin illustrated the general precepts of veracity, sincerity, thoroughness, and so forth, by reference to special arts; when, as in his later days, he took to discoursing generally, without special reference to anything, then he fell away and became as one of the weakest of mortals. Mr. Carlyle, again, abounds in particularities of illustration and precision of reference. The man who simply bawls to us to be real, and eschew the devil's tallies, and all the rest, is only filling his belly and the bellies of others with the east wind. Tell us, how, when, where; and this is just what the Monitor of the Human Race cannot do, because, as Mr. Carlyle says, no man knows the state of another, much less of all others. Yet let us not be unjust to Mr. Geikie. Now and again he is specific and enumerative, as when he warns us that a single gross defect spoils a character: "A Violent Temper, or Untruthfulness, or breaches of Confidence [by the way, why should not Breaches have a capital letter as well as confidence?], or morbid Vanity, or want of Common Sense, or Consciousness, or mere Lightness and want of Solidity, may undo you." This is indubitably true, and if we are not persuaded of its truth by this, the plain categorical statement, there are a couple of metaphorical or allegorical ways of putting it, which nobody will, we believe, be able to resist. "One bone in the mouth is more noticed than all the dinner besides," and "One nail in the shoe is enough." Neither of these quaint utterances is exactly true, the first being much in excess, and the second surely very inadequate; still we know what the author means, and if he thinks that the apophthegms about one nail and one bone are likely to carry conviction home to the bosoms of men, who are we that we should differ from a view so original?

Perhaps the great masterpiece of commonplace is the essay or outpouring, or whatever else it is, upon Reading. It is an interesting and fruitful exercise to note the successive heads of the paragraphs which bring Mr. Geikie safely, and we will add soundly, from the beginning to the end of what he thinks he has got to say. "There is an endless pleasure in reading." "Like the minds of which they are the lasting images and outward presentments, books are of all tempers and tastes." "Books are the great trainers of men, for work of whatever kind." "But it must not be thought that books alone make a man." "Immoral books are of course to be avoided." "It is not always possible, however, to have exactly what you want in books." Alas, it is not, and it is too possible to have exactly what you do not want—for example, tumid commonplace, affectation, and colossal priggishness. There is one favourite saying of Mr. Carlyle's about silence being golden, to which Mr. Geikie's attention has perhaps not been properly called; but in the letter which Mr. Geikie quotes, the sage bids his pursuer silently devour the chagrins of life, and silence does not at all mean the composition of windy and priggish books.

A CONVERT'S VIEW OF THE ROMAN CONTROVERSY.*

WE have heard a good deal during the last twenty years of "converts," and something of "reverts," to adopt an awkward term which has been coined to designate those persons, like Mr. Arnold and Mr. Hemans, who, after passing from the Church of England to the Church of Rome, have returned to the communion they had left. A somewhat different and more interesting phenomenon is presented to us in the Letter to Archbishop Manning just published by Mr. Ffoulkes, late Fellow and Tutor of Jesus College, Oxford. Mr. Ffoulkes is a convert of some fourteen years' standing, and he manifests no intention of retracing his steps, nor any desire to do so. He not only avows his abstract belief in what are usually regarded as distinctive principles of Romanism, such as invocation of saints and prayers for the dead, but adds that he "can unhesitatingly pronounce them from experience to be full of comfort and profit," and that he is sorry for those who live in ignorance or neglect of them. Yet he treats of the points in controversy between the rival Churches, not only with great learning and careful balancing of the results of his own experience, but with a fulness, a frankness, and a conscientious, though not cold, impartiality, which are so exceptional among controversialists of any school, and especially among converts, as to be almost singular. Even those who do not take any keen interest in the religious controversies of the day—and there is a large and growing number of thoughtful men who do—may well be disposed to listen to what such a writer has to say on such a subject. It comes to us—to borrow the expressive Grecism which he uses in another connexion—with an ἠθικὴ πίστις of overwhelming force. Few writers have had equal opportunities for an experimental comparison of the systems under review; fewer still have given the same pledges for their sincerity. It is not simply that Mr. Ffoulkes sacrificed to the dictates of conscience the assured competence and pleasant position of an Oxford Fellowship, with its reversionary prospects of Church preferment. Others have done as much, and some of them—notably the distinguished personage to whom this letter is addressed—have attained positions of dignity and influence in their new communion equal, to say the least, to any they could have looked for in the old one. Mr. Ffoulkes has allowed himself no such compensations. The same scrupulous loyalty to his sense of truth which banished him from the Church of his first affections has forbidden him to seek the position which his talents might fairly claim for him in the Church to which he has conformed. He has had to bear what, to a generous mind, is a far heavier trial than loss of income and position only; he has sacrificed the career to which he was committed, with all its scope for his energies and varied opportunities for good. Nor is this all. A far less keen observer would have known well enough what line of speech and conduct is alone tolerable to the present temper of the Roman hierarchy and the Ultramontane rabble who partly cringe to them, partly egg them on. And it is never agreeable to be sneered at, and suspected, and vilified, by those among whom your lot is cast. To English Roman Catholics who cannot see things through Ultramontane spectacles every consideration of personal comfort or convenience would suggest, if not a diplomatic utterance, at least a prudent silence. If any doubt could exist as to the sort of reception which an unreserved avowal of deep and honest convictions like that now before us would be sure to meet with, it has been already dispelled by the very journal which chiefly represents Dr. Manning, to whom the letter is addressed, and which, under pretext of a review, has printed a string of garbled extracts from it, with a running commentary of coarse and stupid sneers. The author must have known that he had nothing better to expect.

We have made these prefatory remarks to show what peculiar claims on attention this pamphlet has, nor are we at all surprised to learn that it has already been three or four times out of print. We shall not attempt to analyse it, partly because it consists of only 66 pages, and our readers may well be left to study it for themselves; partly because it is already too condensed to admit of further analysis. But, in saying this, we do not mean that it is dry or unreadable. It is exactly the reverse. It is condensed, not by the clumsy hand of the compiler of a popular abridgment, but with the luminous precision of a practised judge summing up the whole result of the evidence for the verdict of the jury. But we may say, in brief, that it is partly taken up with an historical inquiry into the modern claims of the Papacy, partly with a statement of the conclusions which the writer's experience—first as an Anglican, then as a Roman Catholic—has led him to form of the comparative effect of the two systems on the religious life of both priests and people. To ordinary readers this last will probably be the most interesting portion of the pamphlet, but it is the previous inquiry which has suggested its title of The Church's Creed or the Crown's Creed? and it requires no theological skill—nor indeed anything beyond capacity to appreciate the force of very simple and direct evidence—to understand the force of Mr. Ffoulkes's historical argument. He does not enter here on the theological aspects of the famous Filioque controversy, which he has amply discussed elsewhere, but contents himself with a succinct and lucid summary of the history of its interpolation into the Creed, showing that it was, from first to last, the act, not of "the Church," but of "the Crown." Reccared, a Spanish king at the end of the sixth century, first inserted the clause in the Creed in his own dominions. Two centuries later Charlemagne forced its acceptance on the whole Western Church, not only without ecclesiastical sanction, but in the teeth of the decision of an Œcumenical—and therefore, in Roman Catholic eyes, infallible—Council, ratified by the reigning Pope; after two more centuries the Emperor Henry II. compelled or persuaded Benedict VIII. to incorporate the words in the Nicene Creed as used at Rome, which till then his predecessors had refused to do, though they had been unwilling or unable to prevent its adoption elsewhere. And all this was done in direct defiance of the solemn and explicit anathemas of several successive Councils. Startling as such a remark sounds in the mouth of a Roman Catholic, we can hardly wonder at Mr. Ffoulkes observing, at the end of his account of these proceedings, "that, whether absolutely inerrant or not in matters of faith herself, Rome has abundantly proved during the last thousand years that she can be a most negligent, hesitating, fickle, self-seeking, hypocritical guide to others, even when the Faith is concerned." This observation is, indeed, strikingly confirmed by the scandalous history of the Council of Florence—disgraceful enough to all concerned, but especially disgraceful to the Pope—which Mr. Ffoulkes has told at length in his book on Christendom's Divisions, and repeats very concisely here; adding a very pertinent question as to "what guarantees we have, or can have, that the same conduct may not be displayed again (at the forthcoming Council), while the same system remains in full force . . . . the undying system, which has always proved immeasurably stronger than any Pope, when its interests were threatened? Are there not," he proceeds, "Papal Zouaves to be cared for as well as bishops, and Papal territory to be thought of and battled for, as well as dogma?" The special point of this earlier portion of the letter as an argumentum ad hominem lies, however, in its turning against Archbishop Manning his own favourite argument from the jurisdiction of the civil courts in the Church of England:—

> How, after this, the Creed used by us both in our Liturgy can be called the Church's Creed, and not the Crown's Creed, I am at a loss to comprehend: how Rome can, after this, be exculpated from the charge of having succumbed to the "Crown in Council," infinitely more than England, I should be pleased in all honesty to learn from you. For this, as I presume you would admit, is no mere matter of "antiquarian research" or "dreary speculation." The formal definitions of the Church are still as obligatory, still as dogmatically correct, as when first promulgated. And one of them, repeated by a series of General Councils in the same words, says that what the Creed taught explicitly with reference to the Trinity was perfect when it was without those words, "and from the Son." Now, to contend that there can be any further explanation of that which is explicitly perfect already, is to deprive words of their obvious meaning and to insult common sense. The majority by far of the Church was with Adrian I. and Leo III. when they defended the uninterpolated Creed against Charlemagne: the majority by far of the Church was against Benedict VIII. when he yielded to the threats or persuasion of Henry II. The same majority of the Church broke off communion with the Pope for abandoning, and finally submitted to be annihilated and cut off from the face of the earth itself, sooner than abandon, the Creed of the Church for that of the Crown. I am utterly unable to see where the parallel fails in principle. Reccared, Charlemagne, and Henry II., prescribed a Creed for the West, at least as much as Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Elizabeth, prescribed one for England. Subsequent soceptance cannot alter their origin in either case: and whether one consisted in a compound word of four syllables, and the other in thirty-nine articles, embodying six hundred propositions, the fruits were the same; a schism in each case followed, and both schisms are still in force. When the West separated from the East, the East constituted the majority of the Church by far; when England separated from Rome, the majority of the West by far sided with Rome. Thus it came to pass that Rome was literally paid back in her own coin. Adding to the Creed of the Church produced one schism; subtracting from the Creed of the Church of Rome another.

On these historical grounds alone the writer considers that "if ever there was a justifiable revolt from authority, it was the revolt we call the Reformation," and that the union of Christendom, which has been the dream and prayer and study of his life, and which he appears to think is approaching, can neither be expected nor desired "till material guarantees have been secured that Rome shall never again be what she has been, and to some extent still is." Strong language this from a Roman Catholic convert, but Mr. Ffoulkes is one of those comparatively few theologians who form a deliberate and independent judgment on a review of the whole evidence before them, and who explain precisely what it is, and why. He adds significantly:—"So irresistible, to my mind, are the evidences that it is her [Rome's] conduct more than anything else which has divided Christendom, her conduct since she became a Court as well as a Church—not her faith, but her policy for the last thousand years, dating from her endowment under Charlemagne." And he quotes the stern reminder, addressed by St. Bernard to Pope Eugenius III., of a truth which Eugenius and his successors from that day to this have always studiously forgotten—"Your power is by no means the only power from God." Mr. Ffoulkes might, indeed, have gone further back than Charlemagne's time, for the Ultramontane pretensions of the Papacy are based on a series of forgeries, extending from the sixth century downwards. The Isidorian Decretals are the most conspicuous link in the chain, but that is all. When, indeed, he says that "there is no certain proof of their being manufactured at Rome, or by order of Rome," he, for once, rather overstates his case, though in a very immaterial particular. There is certain proof of their not being manufactured at Rome, but in the province of Tours, somewhere about 840, and without any cognizance of the Popes. But this is all that can be said for them. The Popes were not slow to avail themselves of the forgery, though they did not originate it. Nicolas I. used it unscrupulously in his dealings with the Greeks, though he had at least every means of knowing that the documents he cited were not to be found in the Roman archives. As Mr. Ffoulkes puts it, Rome "studiously forbore from inquiring, and said nothing." And a host of other forgeries have been fabricated at Rome. All the acts of the Roman martyrs, for instance, are deliberate forgeries compiled for pecuniary advantage in the exhibition and sale of relics. The compilation was begun at the end of the fifth century. Only the other day the phial of blood in the Catacombs was declared by a fresh decree of the Congregation of Relics to be a sufficient proof of martyrdom, though eminent Roman Catholic antiquaries like Rossi and De Buck have conclusively shown that it proves nothing of the kind. The persistent maintenance of absurd fables like the "Holy House of Loretto," and a number more contained in the Breviary, "which it is still thought possible for the clergy to derive edification from, though they cannot believe them"—such as the story of the martyrdom of St. John Nepomuc, which was known at Rome to be an invention at the time of his canonization—will strengthen Mr. Ffoulkes's "inference that truthfulness is not one of the strongest characteristics of the teaching of even the modern Church of Rome." Even a Jesuit writer of the day, in a feeble attempt to excuse the adoption of the spurious Decretals, is constrained to admit that "le mensonge demeure toujours un mal," and more than that, "les fausses décrétales n'ont produit que du mal." "Unerring faith," adds Mr. Ffoulkes, "is necessary for the Church, but it is not all that is necessary; honesty, justice, truthfulness, meekness, and self-denial are among the determining principles that bind Christians together, as well as their faith. Unerring faith must govern in accordance with these, or it must cease to govern."

We have left ourselves no space to dwell in detail on the second part of the letter, which compares the religious life of members of the Roman and English Churches. It is this consideration quite as much as his historical inquiries which, as the writer tells us, has "modified his views considerably on the whole question" since he became a Roman Catholic. During that period he has resided a good deal abroad as well as in England, and has had opportunities of observing the religious condition of France, Spain, and Italy. His general conclusion is that "English Christianity—that of members of the Church of England in general, I cannot speak from experience of any other—is as good and genuine, and, for ordinary purposes, as beneficial, as what is found in other nations." And from this, as well as from historical arguments, he infers that the sacraments of the Church of England are as valid as those of the Church of Rome, and that the reordination of convert clergymen is a superfluous ceremony:—

> Holding myself that there are realities attaching to the Sacraments of an objective character, I am persuaded, and have been more and more confirmed in this conviction as I have grown older, that the Sacraments administered in the Church of England are realities, objective realities, to the same extent as any that I could now receive at your hands: so that you yourself therefore consecrated the Eucharist as truly when you were Vicar of Lavington as you have ever done since. . . . . The only test of the efficaciousness of the Sacraments appreciable by common sense lies in their influence upon conduct. If therefore it were capable of proof, as distinct from assertion, which it is not, both that all the Sacraments administered in the Church of England but one were shams: and all administered in the Church of Rome, without exception, realities, how comes it that we are not incomparably more exalted characters ourselves than we were formerly: or that Roman Catholic countries on the Continent are not incomparably more penetrated to the core with Christianity than England?

There was this vast difference between the moral tone of Christian and Pagan society in the early ages, and to it mainly the Church owed her triumph. Julian the Apostate's impotent attempt to galvanize a corpse, by putting new wine into old bottles which could not hold it, only served to bring out the contrast more prominently. Mr. Ffoulkes tells us, after fourteen years' experience as a Roman Catholic, that he can find no such contrast between his present and former co-religionists, and that he cannot see that the foremost of the converts "have progressed in any perceptible degree," while many of them "have notoriously descended to a lower level of Christianity" since their conversion. We can but indicate the line of argument in this portion of the pamphlet, but it will well repay careful and minute perusal. To expect the writer's words to produce any effect on the dignitary to whom they are primarily addressed would be something more than sanguine. But he is sure to find plenty to listen to his candid revelations if the authorities of his Church will not. And one thing, at all events, they will have sooner or later to learn to their own cost, whether they choose to listen to him or not. What Luther said of theology is terribly true of every fact, whether natural or religious, whether affecting the condition of the world or of the Church; neglectum sui ulciscitur.

KIRKBY'S SURVEY OF YORKSHIRE.*

JOHN KIRKBY was a famous statesman and ecclesiastic of the days of Edward the First, under whom he held the office of Treasurer, and several times had the care of the great seal during the absence of the Chancellor. Having held various ecclesiastical preferments as a deacon, he was in 1286 ordained priest and consecrated Bishop of Ely, and four years later he died. He had been before elected to the see of Rochester, but he was rejected by Friar John Peckham, Archbishop of Canterbury, "who took exception against him for holding many several spiritual preferments, saying that a man of so good conscience as a Bishop ought to be would rather content himself with a little living than cumber himself with so many charges." His Inquest of Yorkshire was made in the thirteenth year of Edward, 1284–5. To it the editor, Mr. Scaife of York, has added the Inquisitions of Knights' Fees, taken in the thirty-first year of Edward, or 1303–4, and the Nomina Villarum, which belongs to the ninth year of his son, 1316–7. Documents of this kind, we need not say, may be looked at in various ways. Their interest within the district described and their interest without it are of quite different kinds. To antiquarian students in Yorkshire a record of Yorkshire places and Yorkshire families has of course a local attraction. But historical students of any kind, however little they may care for Yorkshire places and families as such, are sure to pick up, out of such a collection as this, something or other which illustrates their particular pursuits. Dry bones as these records may seem, they contain plenty of good food for the legal and constitutional historian, or indeed for the historian of any kind. But, out of the many uses to which a list of this kind can be put, we propose to put it to a very narrow use indeed. A Survey of this sort is primarily a list of names, local and personal. Now we have looked through these Surveys specially as a list of names, with the distinct object of seeing what light it throws on the state of personal nomenclature at the time, as regards both Christian names and surnames.

The beginning of the fourteenth century is a good time for such an inquiry. It is a point of time about equally distant from the two periods when our personal nomenclature underwent the greatest changes. The first of these was the Norman Conquest; the second was the change of taste in this, as in other respects, which came in with the Reformation, the Renaissance, or whatever we please to call it. Now, it was during this interval that our present system of surnames was developed. Before the Norman Conquest Englishmen had nothing which could be strictly called a surname. By the time of the Tudors Englishmen bore surnames of pretty nearly the same kind as those which they bear now. As regards Christian names, we need not say that the Norman Conquest brought with it a complete revolution, driving out most of the old English names, and bringing in a whole mass of new ones of various origins. The changes of the sixteenth century again caused a revolution in nomenclature, less sudden and complete, but no less abiding, than the earlier one. Many of the favourite mediæval names now die out, and new ones from all manner of quarters come in. The date of Kirkby's Inquest stands, as we said, at about the same distance from these two periods of change; it is in fact the very middle of what we may call the later mediæval period, the period of rather more than four hundred years between the Norman Conquest and the Tudor times. It seems therefore a point well chosen purpose.

We must remember, however, that an Inquest of this sort illustrates the nomenclature of particular classes of society only. It deals with land-owners only, though with land-owners both great and small, and with land-owners both of Norman and of Old-English descent. But it tells us little or nothing about the names of the peasantry, among whom we should expect to find old traditions lingering longest. And it is only incidentally that it tells us anything about the names of the burgher class, among whom we have mainly to look for those names of purely foreign origin which, both in their natural shapes and in various grotesque corruptions, have so largely affected our later nomenclature. We have only a list of the names of the gentry and yeomanry, two important classes certainly, but not the whole people.

The Christian names in use among these classes in Yorkshire in the time of Edward the First were almost wholly of what, as far as England is concerned, we may call the Norman type. These names consist of two classes. There are, first, certain names of Teutonic origin, formed out of the same elements as the Old-English names but quite distinct from them, and secondly, certain scriptural and saintly names which seem to have been just beginning to make their way into Normandy about the time of the invasion of England, and which that invasion carried into England along with the more strictly Norman names. William, Richard, Gilbert, may stand as examples of the one class; John, Thomas, Adam, of the other. Of both classes some still remain in common use, while some have become almost as rare as the Old-English names which they displaced. The vast mass of the names in our Survey and the other documents in this book belong to one or other of these classes. The Old-English names are very rare; the later style of fancy names is very rare also. The one class had well-nigh died out; the other class had hardly begun to appear. Let us take a few pages at random. Among the knights and others in the Wapentake of Morley, pp. 224-227, we find seventeen Johns, sixteen Williams, five Roberts, five Simons, five Adams, four Thomases, three Rogers, three Richards, two Hughs, two Ralphs, two Jordans, two Eliases, one Nicholas, one Henry, one Peter, one "Ribaldus" or "Roaldus," and one Geoffry. Among women we have four Margarets (if we are right in counting a certain "Magot' de Bramley" as one of them), three Alices, one Cecily, and one Albreda. Any one can compare this with the nomenclature of our own day. As compared with that of Domesday, the most striking thing is that John, a name known to Domesday, but not very common, had already won the pre-eminence which it still keeps. William held, as it still holds, its ground, but such intensely Norman names as Roger and Hugh are clearly beginning to go out of fashion. The French Henry only just appears, the French Philip not at all. Of distinctively English or Danish names there is not one. But neither is there any trace of what we may call fancy names, unless we count Jordan as one. The nomenclature is thoroughly Norman, though the proportions among the several names have changed since the time of Domesday.

Looking through the whole book we find, among Old-English names, that Edmund is not uncommon. Edward is rare, and is generally followed by the surname Charles, of which more anon. In p. 207 we have an Alfred. Now Alfred and Edward, it should be remembered, are exactly the English names which the Normans adopted, though sparingly, from the beginning. Edmund was reintroduced by Henry the Third; the odd thing is that it should have become so much more in fashion than Edward, which had been equally favoured by Henry, and which was moreover the name of the reigning King. The distinctively Scandinavian names, so characteristic of the district in Domesday, do not appear as Christian names, but clear traces of their existence are seen in the surnames Knowte, Ughtred, Ulf (p. 193), and Thurkill. And to these must be added the at first sight amazing surname of Charles, already mentioned. This must be the old Northumbrian Carl; it can hardly be the later French reintroduction of the name, seeing that Charles is quite unknown as a Christian name. With these few exceptions the Old-English names are gone. It may be remembered that in a former article we were able to fix the age of Henry the Second as the time when they pretty well came to an end—a sign, be it borne in mind, of the more complete fusion of the two races.

Among less usual names of other sorts, James occurs now and then, once (p. 138) with the surname Jordan. There is a Constantine (p. 22), a Marmaduke (p. 9), an Osbert (p. 19), who bears the fine Norman surname of "De Archis," of which we have had need to speak elsewhere. Alan commonly occurs, characteristically enough, with the surname "Le Breton" following. We find also Patrick, German, Anceline, Gocelin, "Hartimus," "Leysing'," Amandus, Atto, Aubricius (Alberic?), Anthony, and others, singly or rarely. Alexander is a little more common. Among the less usual female names are Cassandra, Avora, Laterana, and Egidia. We have not lighted on a single Old-English female name; there was indeed very little chance of any except Edith, and perhaps Etheldred and Mildred.

Surnames had become universal by the time of this Survey among the classes to which the Survey extends. The only question is as to the rather large class who are described by the formula "Johannes filius Willelmi," and the like. The Latin does not make it quite clear whether John was simply John the son of William, or really John Williamson or Fitzwilliam. "Willelmus filius Elenæ," i. p. 57, raises some questions. Men called after their mothers belong to two very opposite classes—either bastards whose fathers were unknown, or men, like Swend Estrithson and Henry Fitz-Empress, whose mothers were of much higher rank than their fathers. Without fuller information we can see no more about William the son of Helen, but his name in modern nomenclature would be Nelson, and possibly in English was so then. Some Christian names, however, had, as we have seen, already become surnames so completely after the modern sort as to have dropped the "filius" altogether. Such, too, is "Stacius Colman"—his Christian name was probably Eustace; and Colman is a good Domesday name in the borough of Oxford, where the Colman of these days "habuit tres mansiones T. R. E." The entries in our Survey generally give the names very accurately according to the rules, if not of Latin, at least of French, grammar. A purely local name has "de;" a name of nation, office, or trade has "le;" a purely descriptive name has nothing. Thus we have "Johannes de Thornhill," but "Johannes le Vavasour," "Alanus le Breton." Where one manuscript (p. 189) has such an inaccuracy as "Rogerus de Blackman," another, more accurately, leaves out the de. Such an absurdity as "Johannes von Müller" could not have occurred in those days.

Of notable surnames, one rejoices to find (p. 177) the ever-honoured "Rogerus Smyth," though we must confess that we regret the innovation of the y. "Martinus Clerk" and "Laurentius Carpentarius" (p. 111) are also to be noticed, the former upsetting the absurd notion that names of that class came in at the "Reformation." We have also "Galfridus le Charpentier" in p. 89. "William Todd" and "John Browne" are to be noticed in p. 190, "William Proudefote" in 196, "Andrew Grammary" in 287, "Roger Tempest" in 17, "Thomas Totty" in 151. The name of "William Hatecrist," which appears in various spellings in p. 140 et al., has most likely some origin quite different from that which would seem most obvious. Otherwise one might be tempted to compare him with "Guillelmus Judas" in a far earlier Norman charter. Anyhow one may be allowed to chuckle over "Galfridus Cheseandbrede" in p. 263. Here is a characteristic heap of names from Eseby in the Wapentake of West Gilling:—

> Willelmus Thurkill tenet j bov.; Johannes filius Henrici ij bov., Ricardus filius Conani j bov., Willelmus filius Ricardi j bov., Willelmus filius Galfridi ij bov., Willelmus Drinkhale tenet ij bov., Willelmus Carpenter iij bov., Stephanus filius Johannis ij bov., Matilda Ape j bov., Adam de Ask iij bov., Alicia Adamswyf j bov., Cecilia de Sadbergh ij bov., Hamo Madd j bov.

We do not think that there is any distinct instance of a man being personally called, in the modern fashion, by his surname without his Christian name, but we see formulas which are distinct approaches to it in such expressions as "hæres de Percy," "feodus de Nevill," and the like.

It appears from p. 61 that Stamfordbridge retained the name of "Pons Belli," which certainly got attached to it soon after the event. But was it ever called in English "Battlebridge," as some people say? It should not be forgotten that "battle" is a French word, and that at all events modern usage has returned to the ancient name.

One extract we make, not for any inherent interest, but because every scrap is precious which concerns the most memorable spot in Britain:—

RECOLLECTIONS OF ENGINEERS.*

THIS book contains many interesting particulars of the professional lives of the engineers by whom the English system of railways was established. It purports to be written for the most part from personal recollections. The author was employed as a pupil on the London and Birmingham Railway, and he was well acquainted with at least two of the most eminent of the engineers mentioned in his pages. They, as well as others who approached them in celebrity, are "beyond the reach of praise or of attack." The author professes to give names only where his recollections tend to exalt the reputations of the bearers of them. Where the tendency is otherwise he supposes himself to have observed such reticence that the feelings of private friends or relations cannot be hurt. We think, however, that some of his characters wear a very thin disguise; and when we meet, in a chapter on Contractors, "a member of this active fraternity who, subsequently, during his passage to a disastrous collapse, assumed the prominent renown of a national benefactor, a religious founder and philanthropist, and a not untitled legislator," we wonder that the author did not revive an absurd practice of the last century and introduce this well-known personage as Sir S—l M—n P—o, Bart. It strikes us that the author's reticence is rather like that of the gentleman who said to another gentleman whom he had not the most distant intention of insulting, "One of us two tells a lie, and I'm not the man." The author is more fond, we think, of the word "reticence" than of the thing. Indeed, he is so fond of this word that he uses it in a new and wholly unwarrantable fashion. He says that the chief engineers of railways would have lived longer if they had practised greater "reticence of labour"—meaning, if they had laboured less. Another example of disagreeable affectation is where he calls a sporting parson a remanet of a bygone age. The word "remnant" is good English. The word remanet is Law Latin for a case which goes over from one sitting of a court to another, and it has not the slightest claim to be naturalized as a noun substantive in English. These criticisms may appear trivial, but they serve to show, what some people pretend to doubt, the utility of learning Latin to those who undertake to write English. The use of remanet for remnant is worthy of certain sages of the English law who knew six words of Latin and were never tired of repeating them; and such an expression as "reticence of labour" would be inconceivable to any moderately good Latin scholar.

Putting aside some unpleasant efforts at smartness in description, this author's account of the things which he has seen and the men whom he has known, in the early days of railways, is in general highly deserving of perusal. The character of Stephenson has already been made familiar to the world, but a large portion of the public know little of Brunel except that he planned the Great Western Railway and the Great Eastern steamship. The author gives a full account of the impression made on his mind by intercourse with Brunel, and no reader can fail to be struck with the verisimilitude, as well as with the beauty, of the picture which he draws. Here is a passage at once truthful and eloquent:—

> Robert Stephenson and his contemporaries died full of honour, and not unrewarded by wealth, but barren as to length of days. The iron frame and noble intelligence of Isambard Kingdom Brunel succumbed to his contempt for the laws of health. He crowded the activity of a long life into a few short years, and his unresting devotion to his profession made him a victim in middle manhood to the infirmity of age.

The author tells us that he knew Stephenson first, but he knew Brunel best. He tells us also that, as a pupil of Stephenson, his first impression of the very different method of Brunel was unfavourable. The first "peculiarity" which he noticed was the personal share which the untiring energy of Brunel led him to take in every detail for which he was ultimately responsible. "The order of Stephenson's office was not such as to overburden the engineer-in-chief with details that fell properly within the competence of the Residents, or even of the Subs." Another "peculiarity" of Brunel was the scientific knowledge of a pupil of the École Polytechnique, which contrasted rather sharply with the general and time-honoured English system of the "rule of thumb." Another "peculiarity" was an extreme and unprecedented insisting on excellence of work. The author traces to these "peculiarities" the heavy cost of Brunel's earlier works. The contractors dreaded the power entrusted by Brunel to his inspectors to render the work ruinously expensive. Contractors declined to compete. Some contracts fell into incompetent hands; others were put into the hands of competent persons at extravagant prices. The manner in which the attention of Brunel's staff was concentrated on the technical minuteness of the specifications, and the unexampled finish of the work, produced an undesirable effect on the estimates. Many of the details of the work were left to the discretion of the engineer, and thus came under the schedule of prices for extra work. Alterations of design entered largely into the sources of cost, as compensation had often to be made for abandoned work. "But experience was never thrown away on Mr. Brunel, and while his earliest works left the question of ultimate cost very much to come out as it would, nothing could exceed the accuracy and the detail of the scientific information which was prepared before the putting in hand of his later contracts."

The above is a brief abstract of the chapter of this book which treats of the method pursued by Brunel in his earlier railway works. We have neither the means nor the space to discuss the correctness of the author's view, but it seemed desirable to present that view to the reader's mind by way of introduction to what we take to be the best piece of writing in the book; we mean the passage which begins to bring before us the author of the Broad Guage. This chapter should be read by everybody who desires to understand Brunel's character and career. It opens thus:—

> The preceding references to some of the disadvantages which attended the earlier contract work of Isambard Kingdom Brunel must not be held, either directly or indirectly, to detract from the well-established fame of a man who, in the opinion of every competent judge, was second to none in the profession of which he was so distinguished an ornament, and who possessed many rare and noble qualities in which very few could claim to rank even as second to him. The speed and luxury of English travelling, both by land and by sea, is probably due even more directly to the genius of Mr. Brunel than to the labours of any other man.

Again, he says, and he may be taken to know at least the impression made on his own mind by intercourse with Brunel:—

> Those who had the privilege of sufficiently close access to Mr. Brunel to enable them to trace and watch the workings of his mind, must have been very incompetent judges if they did not become aware of the presence of a genius of the highest order.

Once more he says, and of the justice of this judgment we can all form some approach to an opinion:—

> The imperfections in the character of Mr. Brunel were of the heroic order. He would have been, commercially speaking, a more successful engineer had he possessed a less original and fertile genius.

It is impossible to abridge the passage in which this idea is developed and supported, for it hardly contains a superfluous word. The passage has high merit as a composition, and the secret of its excellence is doubtless this, that the writer strongly feels that which he endeavours to express. We do not assume the accuracy of all the features of the portrait, but we would recommend those who feel interest in the history of engineering to read the passage, and form their own opinion whether it looks like truth. The untiring and insatiable industry; the conscientious resolve to see and order everything; the exquisite taste; the perfect knowledge what good work should be; the boundless fertility of invention—all these are lineaments of a great man, and perhaps there may have been among us a man greater than we thought, and greater even than was necessary for the work he had to do. It may be, as this author suggests, that the perfection and success of each individual work was more the study and aim of Brunel; the return of benefit to the shareholder the more constantly present idea of Stephenson. "The former prepared the luxurious cabins of the Atlantic steamers, and the commodious sofas of the broad-guage carriages; the latter opened the way for Parliamentary and workmen's trains." The author says, again, and here he is entitled to belief, that there was in the character of Brunel that which endeared him to those who knew him. Until his health began to fail, it was more pleasant to have relations with him the older he grew. It has been often said that the cost of the Great Eastern was enormous, and so it was; for, besides all the money that was spent, Brunel wore out upon her the remnant of his strength. The labour and anxiety of that work led him to the grave.

It would have been well for his health, says the author, if he had allowed the ship to be built at Milford Haven, where he would not have been able to give his own personal attention to every detail of the work. It is perhaps not generally known that the great misfortune of the launch was due entirely to Brunel's anxious care for human life. The presence of crowds of spectators invaded the space which he had desired to be reserved, not only for the moving monster, but for the wave which it would drive across the Thames. Boats full of foolhardy trespassers were tempting submergence. It was to protect the occupants of these boats from the effects of their own contempt of danger that the movement of the launch, when well under way, was suddenly checked by Brunel. No substructure could resist such a strain. This misfortune of the launch was without parallel in Brunel's career, and, perhaps, it has not yet been fully explained; for, even if we knew nothing about Brunel except what may be gathered from this book, we should infer that, of all engineers, he was the least likely to leave any avoidable incompleteness in his arrangements. We cannot better conclude this portion of the subject than by quoting the author's description of the Great Western Railway station at Paddington, which is one of the most accessible, as well as one of the most favourable, examples of Brunel's work:—"This station, perhaps the most admirable in the world, if beauty, convenience, and moderation be equally studied, is an instance of what was done by the engineer who deferred the design of the terminus till he knew what was really requisite." The moderation of this work may perhaps be better understood if it be compared with the Charing Cross, Cannon Street, and St. Pancras Stations.

Another remarkable character of that epoch was General Pasley, the Inspector-General of Railways. He was a man of whom any service might have been justly proud. The Royal Engineers owe much to his laborious study of his profession. Perhaps no officer or man of science ever put the result of experimental labour in language so clear and precise. And to a patient, constant, conscientious toil at the practical details of his profession Sir Charles Pasley added a courage that was heroic and romantic. Another military portrait of this book is not distinguished by any name, but it is impossible, we should think, that the smallest hesitation would be felt by any person at all conversant with railway history in supplying the omission. We are told that the engineer here mentioned was obliged, like his brethren, to attend to urgent business on Sundays, but he satisfied his conscience by a method peculiar to himself. A resident assistant sent a mounted express to him for orders on a Sunday. He wrote precise instructions, despatched the messenger with them at a gallop, and he was found to have dated them as of Saturday night. There is a story of a man who was not exactly an engineer, but was employed as a correspondent at some great works, and it is suggested that this man was a disguised Jesuit. This story is suitable for the consumption of Protestant ladies, but we regard it as throwing doubt upon other parts of the book, which perhaps ought to be described as personal recollections, subjected to the working of an active imagination. There is another story, however, which is extremely like truth, and which pleasantly exhibits the three great rival engineers—Stephenson, Brunel, and Locke—in friendly converse. They were travelling by railway together, and Stephenson was wrapt in a plaid, which Brunel contemplated with attention. Stephenson offered to bet Brunel 10*l.* that he could not put on the plaid rightly the first time. Brunel agreed to bet 10*l.* to the plaid, which he was to have for his own if he could put it on. Stephenson fell into conversation with Locke, while Brunel remained silent studying the folds. At the first platform they got out; Stephenson took off the plaid, Brunel put it on without hesitation and without a fault, and thus won the plaid, which he wore for many years. We will add a story, which is told with affected "reticence" of the name of the engineer concerned. Any reader of the book who cannot guess the name ought to have a gold medal for stupidity. This engineer had built a bridge which caused the death of the guard of a train passing under it. A year or so afterwards he prepared plans for a proposed railway, containing an exact reproduction of the homicidal bridge. A brother engineer explained the reason of this apparent oblivion of a terrible disaster. "He wants to build this bridge, to prove that the other was right, and that the guard had no business to be killed."

It is a sad thought that the English railways have been built with the lives of men. The hurry of frantic competition crowded the work of half a century into twenty years. One generation of engineers perished from excess of labour; another generation now languishes for lack of it. Devotion to the public service and the desire for fame caused the makers of our great lines of railway to lead lives of ceaseless toil. The energy of their minds fretted their bodies to decay. When Stephenson was making the railway from London to Birmingham he walked the length of it twelve times, and he almost lived upon the line. To a period of eager, mad excitement has succeeded a period of slumberous repose. Yet the work of the engineer is not yet done, nor will the great examples of whom we have been speaking have lived and died without utility to those who follow them. There remains a boundless field in which the engineer may labour for the benefit of mankind. He may purge our rivers, cleanse our towns, and bring within the reach of the dense masses of our population some of the conveniences and amenities which are now the privilege of a minority. He may prolong life, improve health, and open the way for civilization and Christianity; and thus he may make good his title to be numbered with the road-making children of the Fire-god, who enthroned the God of healing and of the arts of peace among the nations of antiquity, and his name shall be written with those of Stephenson, Brunel, Locke, and others, their associates in the work of making the rough places smooth and the crooked straight, who may be most aptly called

NIGEL BARTRAM'S IDEAL.*

THIS is essentially a woman's work. We do not say it in any sense of disparagement, but rather with due honour to a clever woman's plea for clever women, made in a quiet and feminine manner, and yet ably and humorously turning the tables. Of course this is done on her own ground, where she has it all her own way; but still it is well and gracefully done, and the only failure is far from being wilful. This failure is in the delineation of the hero, who is a greater prig than the authoress perhaps intended to make him; though some amount of priggishness was essential to his office in the book as well as probable in his situation, since he stands in the attitude of one accustomed to lay down the law both to his family, and as a critic and literary man in a small way. His "ideal" of a wife is just such a man's ideal, the being so often held up as the woman to be created by education—a collection of negative qualities ready to fit into his positive ones, a creature with just understanding enough to enter into and foster all his ideas, but without any inconveniently substantial ones of her own; in fact, a sort of jelly ready to receive his mould and then retain it; and the humour of the story consists in his imagining that he has found this "impossible she" in the writer of the cleverest and most sensational novel of the day.

Marion, this unsuspected authoress, is the real character of the book, and is truly a careful study of a personage too rare in our present literature (and, we fear, out of it)—possessing a combination of talent and originality with a shy, shrinking, retiring manner, and great modesty and humility of nature. The production of her book is explained by her having been in early girlhood the companion of a father who had spent a life of dissipation, and who still surrounded himself with books and friends which gave his daughter's intellect a certain familiarity with the externals of evil, while the bashfulness and purity of her nature preserved the inner woman untainted. The foundation of her story, we are told, is a horrible anecdote narrated by her old nurse; the French novels she has studied were examples of dextrous plot-weaving; her father's friends taught her how to make her villain a real man, instead of a lady's hearsay monster; and the whole is a sort of exhalation of a mind in a morbid state, thrown out like a disease clearing the constitution. Long before it sees the light, her whole circumstances have altered. Her father has died, and she has gone to live at the dullest of country parsonages, with a brother-in-law, absorbed in his parish and never touching a book, and with a spoilt beauty of a younger sister, who looks on her as a born serf and a bondslave to herself and children. The gentle, contented spirit, in the reaction from a formerly overstrained state, adapts itself to its surroundings, accepts the drudgery, and looks back on her past life as on a painful dream. The brother's plans for Church renovation lead to her secretly offering her tale for publication through the intervention of one Fabian Ord, a young Roman Catholic gentleman, who had been the playfellow and companion of her childhood; and it has so extraordinary a success that she is enabled to send a large anonymous contribution to her brother-in-law, in such a manner that he believes it to come from Mr. Ord.

It is at this crisis that she is introduced to Nigel Bartram, who is then full of the book, engaged in writing a review of it, and loudly proclaiming his pious horror, first at the idea of a woman having written it at all, and next at the supposed woman who might have written it—much as people were wont to talk before experience taught them that sensation was the lady's peculiar field. Marion, without betraying herself, shows much sensitiveness to his opinion and a certain tender, humble, and intelligent acquiescence in his dicta, which so touch Mr. Bartram that he believes himself to have discovered the unappreciated, responsive, submissive negative of his dreams:—

> He was ridiculously blind, you will say. Yes; I grant it; but so many a one has been before and since. We fancy that we can gauge each other's natures and we complacently assign certain qualities to certain faces, and our own conception of our neighbour's character is so present with us that it comes between us and the reality and prevents our reading it aright. First impressions have with most of us all the force of tradition, if not of historic truth; and strong in our preconceived ideas, we miss the knowledge which further acquaintance might have given us. We pass over facts, and warnings and surprises, which might, one would think, have had significance for any one not resolutely obtuse. Marion had the outward characteristics of Mr. Bartram's ideal, therefore she had, no doubt, the inward too; his ideal was not to be a genius, so Marion was not one, and suspicious appearances conveyed no suspicion to him. It was very illogical and absurd, but it made him very comfortable.

So he thus describes her to his young sister Ada:—

> "She seems to me not clever exactly, not quick at least, but full of real intelligence; not gay, but cheerful and brave; not showy at all, but with quiet good sense, and many sterling qualities, a woman that one could trust in short, that would never disappoint or deceive you."

"I see! All nots, in fact your very ideas," is the sister's reply; but on being further pressed, it appears that Ada, a quick, lively girl, had formed a very different opinion:—

> "She seems somehow to make herself what one would consider her; that is the curious thing. Her sister, you can see, thinks her stupid, a good affectionate drudge. Well she makes herself so to her. You think her an intelligent, sensible girl, full of nice appreciation—a timid creature who has been misunderstood, and must be gently and tenderly encouraged; well, she will always be so to you, I suppose, unless something happens to break up the surface. But it does seem as if no one would let her be what nature made her."

Of course Nigel is too pragmatical to accept the notions of his somewhat precocious sister. His prepossession, loudly and authoritatively expressed, absolutely stifles her timid endeavour to disburden her mind of a confession which her love and fear rendered her only too willing to keep back during the courtship. When she asks whether he is sure that he would not like her if "I could do something which the world would admire—write a book like 'Mark's Dream' for instance?" his answer is "'Mark's Dream'! You could not be what you are and have written that. Under any circumstances I should not care to have an authoress for my wife, and one who could write such a book as 'Mark's Dream' would be positively repugnant to me. My innocent love, be sure that I neither covet you for genius or fame, that I could not love you as I do if you were anything but just what you are!" Thus we soon have the only too commonplace plot of the wife's secret, but Miss Willford has endeavoured to avoid this well worn wheel-rut of fiction, and to save her heroine from being lowered by deceit, by making her, after a time, confess her authorship; but this is in the midst of a fever, when her husband imagines her to be labouring under a delirious delusion, and humours her by expressing his free forgiveness. She is now at ease, and they are perfectly happy so long as Nigel thinks that every sparkle of wit and genius that she shows has been evoked by his magic touch, and is a proof of his own discernment. By and by, however, comes a pressing call for ready money, to clear off liabilities incurred by his extravagant younger brother; and Marion, with an almost completed and perfectly unobjectionable novel in her portfolio, cannot withstand the temptation of employing Fabian Ord again to carry it to the publisher, that she may surprise her husband with the supply so much needed.

His jealousy has been already excited by the perception that there is a certain understanding between his wife and Mr. Ord. And he has some justification for his instinctive suspicion, for Fabian really loves Marion, with a hopeless silent affection, of which she has no perception at all, having always regarded him with a certain compassionate elder-sisterly feeling which entirely prevents her being on her guard. Nigel's wrath is brought to a climax by the sight of the two driving home from the City in a cab. On reaching his own house he finds them exulting together over a splendid offer from the publisher, and then for the first time opens his eyes to the knowledge that his wife is veritably the author of his bête noire, "Mark's Dream." He might fairly consider himself illused, but we must confess that he is rather too weak and womanish in his petulance and would-be dignity under the misfortune. He professes to forgive Marion, but it is in the style of Wamba's definition of Christian forgiveness; and he has not the strength of mind to feel that a man's force of character must necessarily give him the superiority over any accidental talent in a woman. Of course he quashes the new novel; and though he does not quite suppress the old one, yet he permits his wife to sell out 200*l.* of her own fortune, as a substitute for the sum which its profits had supplied to the funds for her brother's church. He had, indeed, once called it sacrilege to apply money so gained to church-building; but such consistency is decidedly unnatural, even upon the very high horse he had mounted, and whence it is the story-teller's business to bring him down.

This is accomplished through the debt he has undertaken for his brother's sake, which drives him to hack work of a kind he is not fit for, and of which poor Marion is forced to say to herself:—

> "I don't know how it is that he can't succeed so well on abstract subjects, but he doesn't; he writes very good English, and I suppose some people like it. If I were the good little humdrum creature he once thought me, perhaps I should like it too, but I don't much, it is poor; and yet I wish I didn't think so!"

Nigel, with his critical mind, feels this poverty, examines her on her opinion, and then cannot bear either the truth which he elicits from her unwilling lips, or even her merely mechanical assistance. But he is only under a course of severe discipline at our novelist's hands, and when Fabian Ord is safely disposed of in a Benedictine monastery, his temper sweetens perceptibly. Then he is afflicted with a wholesome illness, so that Marion's wifely perfections become evident, and the permanent ill-health that remains brings him to real straits. Common-sense views of Marion's powers are borne in on him. His morbid view of the book is corrected thus by his brother's exclamation—"Why that was no end of a jolly book; the villany was rather lightly touched upon, as I suppose it always must be in ladies' books"; and then enviously—"By Jove, if my wife could write novels that paid, wouldn't I keep her up to it!"

The gentle yet severe Nemesis who hovers over the story requires that the well-tamed hero should conquer the fear which his brother imputes to him of being known as "the clever Mrs. Bertram's husband," and patiently submit, not only to the infliction of having a wife cleverer than himself, but of letting her be the bread-winner of the family; and he is finally brought to confess his perfect acquiescence in his destiny, and his conviction that the imaginary being of his dreams would have been an intolerably tedious companion. We doubt if so petulant a person as he had shown himself would have reached such magnanimity as this; but we are well content to have the very loveable heroine brought to happiness at last, and that within the reasonable compass of a single volume. We greatly recommend the good taste and forbearance which has kept the story terse and compact, instead of diluting it to meet the undiscriminating demands of purveyors for circulating libraries whose cry for three volumes is the bane of literature. There is altogether a freshness, refinement, and purity about the whole atmosphere of the book which renders it very pleasant reading, and which is not always to be found in company with so much cleverness.

The subordinate characters are sketched in with great humourousness and delicacy of touch. The heavy, estimable brother-in-law, who disapproves of novels and never reads anything else; Nigel's naughty little clever sister, who sees his mistake in Marion from the first; his blundering stepmother, with her tribe of "dear little men," and her endeavours at Fabian Ord's conversion by lending him very clever books, "something about Truths and Creeds"—are all neat portraits. Fabian Ord, with his rather weak tragedy airs, is less cleverly executed, though capitally conceived; but these are all kept well in the background, and Marion herself is the real portrait and chief interest of the tale. Both her powers and her success find full example and justification in the example of Charlotte Brontë; and her whole character is one which, though not so common in real life as to come within every one's experience, is yet so perfectly true to nature and to itself as to be well worthy of the careful drawing it has received. Indeed we have never seen the real nature and limits of the special ability which she shows better expressed and acknowledged than in her own sad meditations:—"It is genius; I know that—I cannot help knowing it. It is not superiority of mind, only a special gift, just as others have a gift for music. And being so outside of one, it is not half so likely to make one vain, I do believe, as that kind of quickness, readiness to learn, brightness in answering, which is what I understand by cleverness, and which I'm sure I haven't got." This consciousness of power of a certain class, coupled with perfect feminine modesty and humility, renders Marion Bertram a picture of no common order both as to subject and delineation, and one which so evidently comes from inward experience that we regard it as a real and valuable contribution to the existing evidence on the much-vexed question as to the capacity and sphere of "clever women." We hope we may see more of "Florence Wilford."

WESTERN SOUDAN.*

In no part of the world has the progress of geographical knowledge of late years been more rapid or more decisive than in tropical and central Africa. Year by year we observe the lines of discovery stealing over what was not long ago one utter blank in our maps. Where was commonly supposed to stretch one wide trackless and lifeless waste of sand, we now know that the face of nature is rich in noble streams and fertile plains, and teems with numerous busy tribes of men. The very terrors of the climate, no less than the ferocity of the savage, appear to have been exorcised by more familiar intercourse; and where the graves of Laing and other early explorers, or the violent end of Mungo Park, seemed to scare away the rashly intruding foot of the white man, schemes of colonization are now held out to the enterprise of Europeans, and the fever swamps of the Niger are seen in prospect to open a highway of thriving and healthful river communication. In the memory of living men the course of the Niger was scarcely less profound a mystery than the source of the Nile. The most vague and contradictory delineations were laid down in our best atlases, and the narratives of Park and others were held not much less mythical than the travels of Bruce. Even when the source and the track of the great river were at length defined with something like an approach to accuracy, there remained the woful gap between the geographical systems of equatorial and Northern Africa, as well as that between the settlements on the Western coast, or in the tropical bight, and what little was known of a narrow strip upon the Eastern seaboard. It was not before the great step taken by Dr. Barth in linking on our knowledge of the wide district of Senegambia and the Niger with the general scheme of discovery stretching from the Mediterranean southwards, and from Abyssinia towards the west, that the heart of the continent was thoroughly and decisively pierced. The main lines of connexion being secured, it becomes a matter of increasing security and precision to carry on the work of exploration, and to fill in the blank spaces of the chart in detail. In the particular region of which we are now speaking much has been done by the enterprise and the well-directed skill of the French. From the twofold vantage ground of their Algerian conquest and of their settlements on the Western coast, the Imperial Government has pushed on more than one chain of active exploration into the little-known interior. It is true that the absence of water transit, or even of an adequate water supply, must in all probability render sterile and vain the line of communication opened up between Constantine and Timbuctoo. But where natural advantages of a higher kind are to be found, there need be no limit to the results which may be looked for from thus grafting the skill and energy of Europe on the stock of African fertility and resource. An expedition with this end in view suggested itself within the last few years to the mind of General Faidherbe, Governor of Senegal. Under his auspices, encouraged by the Home Government of France, Lieutenant Mage, of the Imperial Navy, was placed—with M. Quintin, on the Medical Staff of the same Service, for his colleague—in command of a small but select force, for the exploration of the rivers Senegal and Niger. The objects laid down in the commission of these officers were of a higher kind than those of mere curiosity, or even of science, in the technical sense. They embraced the philanthropic purpose of bringing the native races into closer and more brotherly contact with their white neighbours, and of raising their condition by the introduction of European arts, morals, and religion. Bound up with this was the indispensable condition of repressing the odious traffic in human beings—a motive which mainly impelled Lord Palmerston to support the enterprise of Richardson and Barth. Full of a generous belief in the moral qualities of the negro race, these emissaries of France might, it was thought, go forth in the spirit and with the energy of Livingstone, apostles of progress and enlightenment to the land of the black. The volume before us amply justifies the confidence reposed in the author. His style is simple and manly, free alike from egotism and from the tricks which it is the proverbial temptation of travellers to play upon the popular weakness for marvels. As an artist, he has an eye to whatever is striking or picturesque, and the illustrations by which the narrative is liberally accompanied throughout contribute to make the volume handsome to the sight, as well as instructive and interesting to read.

Five years' previous service in Senegal, together with two years on the naval station of St. Louis, had well qualified M. Mage for the exploration of the interior. Besides this, he had spent nine months amongst the blacks at Makhana, a large village on the Upper Senegal, midway between Bakel and Medina. He had also pushed his way into the difficult oasis of Tagant, among the Moorish race of Douaïch, and had in this way made himself a proficient in the native dialects, and had read up carefully other records of previous travels, from Raffenel, Caillé, and Park, to Pascal and Barth. These studies, however, aided by the best of the existing charts, did little more than open the real questions and impediments which beset the knowledge of the country. Beyond Medina, whence M. Pascal had turned back in despair in 1859, was the land inhabited or not, and what was its nature? Would the river population be found friendly or hostile? How far off was Bafoulabé, the half-mythical city which was the commercial and political goal of the expedition? Who, or of what character, was El Hadj Omar, the reputed all-potent chief of the unknown territory? Was he even alive? For rumours of his death had floated down the banks of the stream. With the precaution of a formal letter of credit to this mysterious potentate, M. Mage started up the stream in the face of these manifold uncertainties, in the gunboat Couleuvrine, October 12, 1863, the unusually low state of the flood at that season being much in his favour. Passing the successive armed posts which dot the left bank of the Senegal, Richard Toll, Dagana, Podor, Saldé, and Matam, he reached Medina on October 30. The flat banks of the stream are diversified by the broad falls of Félou, the natural barrages above and below that point, the bold twin peaks of Maka Gnian, and the striking defile from Natiaga to Mansolah. The cataract of Gouïna, sketched by the author both when the river is at flood and at its lowest depression, exhibits a remarkable contrast. From these falls the author, pressing for the last time the hands of his European comrades, branched off to explore for the first time the upland district that separates the two great rivers, face to face with the unknown desert. From Banganoura to within a day's journey of Bafoulabé, no inhabitants were to be looked for. Fires had to be lighted every night to keep off the wild beasts of the interior, as well as the hippopotamuses, whose grunting kept the travellers on the alert. The party—two officers, ten natives, two mules, three horses, fourteen asses, and five oxen—had most frequently to force their way in single file. Thickets of the prickly mimosa played terrible havoc with garments and skin. Abrupt and deep ravines drove them to make many a long and painful détour. Often their portable canoe had to be half-towed, half-carried, by men wading with difficulty through the shallows or rapids. The river at this point was not more than from 150 to 200 mètres across. On the banks or from the tops of trees grave cynocephali looked down the doings of the unwonted intruders. At one point our [illegible]r's pencil records a strange and highly comical spectacle. A [illegible]p hill, rising abruptly from the water's edge, scarped into natural terraces, each marked by a fringe of trees, was literally alive with monkeys and baboons of all sorts, swarming, fighting, and saluting the voyagers with gambols and wild cries. Tracks of the lion on the sand inspired a wholesome caution; but it was only once, on the threshold of the capital they were seeking, that our party had a transient visit from the king of beasts. The writer, who has a keen sympathy for animal life, had here a touching spectacle. A large herd of hippopotamuses had been put to flight by the shots of his party. A young one, losing its footing, was carried down the rapids. The mother, a huge monster, rushed eagerly to the rescue, but, catching her offspring only on the brink of the precipice, both rolled together to death down the terrible abyss. The very negroes, we read, were touched, but nevertheless went to look out below for the bodies, in hopes of a feast royal. Our author himself, though not driven to this species of meat during the present expedition, has eaten it before, and found it not unlike beef—nourishing, but coarser in texture, and rather rank as regards the fat. At length, the temper of his attendants nearly worn out, our traveller had the pleasure of reaching Bafoulabé on December 11. The direct course thence to the Niger would be by way of the Bakhoy, an affluent of the Senegal, which here joins its clear waters (Ba, water, khoy, white) to the blue stream of the Bafing (Fing, blue or dark). Hence the name of Ba-foulabé, literally "two rivers." Our author's mission comprising more than the mere geographical determination of lines of route, his resolution was taken to make here his head-quarters for twenty days. His inquiries were directed to ascertaining the resources of the district, acquainting himself with the natural features and the tribes of the neighbourhood, and establishing friendly relations with the chiefs. A message from El Hadj Omar here reached him, requiring his presence at Koundian, the chief fortress of the empire, a few days' journey off. The envoy Racine Tall, chief of His Majesty's forces—a handsome black of the Toucouleur type—escorted the party thither. On the way a characteristic fantasia on a grand scale was executed by the royal horsemen in their honour. The saddest sight on the route was a long file of slaves of both sexes, their necks bound together by a long and stout thong of leather, each carrying a heavy load upon the head, and not a few laden with a musket or two apiece. Nothing could more powerfully bring home to the travellers' hearts the supreme object of their mission, the suppression of that horrible traffic which is the curse of Africa. All they could do on the instant was to mitigate these poor wretches' sufferings, by hoisting first their burdens, and subsequently, as the consumption of provisions eased the baggage animals, the women themselves upon the mules' backs. Reaching Koundian, they were told that His Majesty was to be sought in the further province of Ségou. The vast and unknown district of Kaarta had to be traversed. At Diangounté a kind of palace of El Hadj, not unlike an Indian hill fort, was seen, but could not be entered, being jealously watched in Mussulman fashion. It does not appear that the party succeeded after all in gaining access to the potentate himself, who was busy at the time in the suppression of a revolt in Ségou. Two or three chapters of the work are occupied in tracing the rise and fortunes of this prince, who seems to be a man of much energy and comparative enlightenment. Ahmadi Amadou, chief of Macina, was taken by him and put to death while our party was in the neighbouring province, and El Hadj was left master of the entire empire from Senegal to Timbuctoo. In the meanwhile M. Mage and his escort traversed the intervening highlands of Diangounté and Fadougou, and on the 22nd of February hailed with joy the towers of Yamina, and from the sandy bank gazed for the first time upon the turbid waters of the Niger.

At Yamina Lieutenant Mage cast wistful glances up and down the stream, uncertain for awhile in which direction to turn his further steps. We might have wished that his choice had led him to the exploration of the upper waters of the Niger, and to the dissipation of the mystery which shrouds that mountain range whence the great river is speculatively held to take its source. Other considerations, however, than the curiosity of the discoverer, or the ambition of rivalling the solution of the Nile problem, held their place in our traveller's mind. The result is to be seen in his clear and exhaustive survey of the lower course of the river, and of the territories adjacent, to the point where Dr. Barth's elaborate charts take up the geography of the Niger in its circuitous passage to the sea. These combined systems put us in possession for the first time of a very complete picture of so much of the vast and vague region known by the name of the Soudan as is irrigated and fertilized by the largest river of Africa next to the Nile. In the political department of his mission M. Mage, in spite of many drawbacks, met with a degree of success which satisfied his superiors no less than himself. To have opened up a country rich in the elements of progress, and to have set on foot friendly relations with a population roughly estimated at not less than forty millions, was no mean reward for manifold hardships and privations. To his view a brilliant vista opens itself for the extension of French influence. Here is a region where the boundless resources of nature may yield more than an equivalent for what is wasted on the barren triumphs of Algerian conquest, and where a mild and docile population gives promise of a rule infinitely less troublous and insecure than that over the fierce tribes of the Sahara or the Tell. This vision of a French Empire of Senegambia and the Niger, he intimates, entered into the plan of the general who sent him forth. It might, we are told, be promptly secured by the extension along either stream of the chain of military posts already existing upon the Senegal. For ourselves, we confess that the prospect fills us neither with jealousy nor fear. Its realization would be the means of removing, at all events, from a vast district the curse of slavery which now hangs over the African race, and it would impose a check upon that narrow and debasing creed of Islamism in which slavery finds its most powerful source and spring. Should M. Mage's simple plan find favour in the eyes of the rulers of France, and a flotilla of steam gunboats and launches ascend the Niger, backed by presents at the cost of 300,000 francs or so, we should not be slow to express our best wishes for its success.

PHYSICAL EDUCATION.*

It is fully time that the theory of physical education should be placed upon rational grounds. The discussion has lately passed through several stages, which may remind us of those laid down by a celebrated philosopher. First, there was the half-superstitious belief in the virtues of cricket and rowing, when their admirers were still a small, and frequently a despised and discouraged, sect. Then came the theological period, in which we were taught that muscular excellence was a branch of Christian duty, and that, as some satirist asserted, the perfect man was one who feared God and walked a thousand miles in a thousand hours. We are now, it is to be hoped, emerging into a more intelligent era, when the advantages of proper bodily exercise will be understood without being exaggerated, and the muscular system developed in an intelligent fashion without any sacrifice of the brain. Among those who are acting as the first promulgators of this rational creed, a high place must be given to Mr. Maclaren. He is an enthusiast, but his enthusiasm is bounded by common sense. He is, in a sense, a man of one idea, but he does not depreciate the value of other men's ideas, and he can point to certain more tangible results than most missionaries of a new faith. We really envy his feelings as he walks about and contemplates the tangible benefits he has conferred upon mankind. Here, he tells us, is a youth to whose stature, by enforcing "systematized exercise," he has added 8¾ in. in nine months. There is another who, after stopping short at 5 ft. 2⅝ in., has been persuaded to shoot up to the more reasonable height of 5 ft. 6¼ in. A third patient may thank him for having increased five inches in actual girth of chest; and, he proudly asks, "who shall tell the value of these five inches of additional space for the heart and lungs to work in?" Nay, a whole squad of soldiers upon whom he first tried his skill expanded so fast that in the fourth month several of them could not put on their uniforms without assistance, nor make them meet down the middle by more than a hand's breadth. In a month more they could not put on their tunics at all, and were obliged to go to and from the gymnasium in their great coats until an additional supply of clothing could be procured. There is certainly a comfort about a system which produces results appreciable by the measuring tape. A missionary preaches to a savage for years, and after he has taught him the Catechism and made him a regular communicant, the interesting convert suddenly strips off his clothing and makes a hearty meal off his benefactor. But about Mr. Maclaren's disciples there can be no mistake; they have got their five inches round the chest, or their two stone in weight, to say nothing of the equally tangible increase in strength and activity. Mr. Maclaren can expand the chests and increase the stature of men as certainly as a sculptor can carve a piece of marble to the desired shape; and he deserves the national gratitude as an actual manufacturer of soldiers; for one who converts a weak, undersized recruit into a strong, healthy soldier, does as good service as if he had added another man to the strength of the army.

The great need of a sensible system of gymnastics is put on very plain grounds by Mr. Maclaren. Year after year, we are gathering in greater crowds to cities. We are losing the advantages of exercise in fresh country air, and instead of it are being nailed down to desks in crowded offices. The field sports which are still kept up in spite of many difficulties become less accessible to the multitude, and less easily reconcileable with the needs of a civilized community. The spirit of competition in schools and universities occasionally produces even the pale student of ordinary fiction. Mr. Maclaren believes in the existence of the unfortunate youth "whose lamp is lit at the setting of the sun, and barely extinguished at its rising." "Does he never think," asks Mr. Maclaren indignantly, "when the wick is burnt down and the oil is consumed, when the one is renewed and the other replenished, does he never think, I wonder, as he sits with his wet towel round his forehead, and sips his green tea, stimulating and urging the weary brain to greater effort, that the lamp of life within him needs trimming and renewing?" Certainly, if that reflection never occurs to him, it is not for want of example; he may see plenty of lads around him who are only too careful to replenish the lamp of life so far as that can be done by the consumption of large quantities of solid food in the short intervals of exercise or idleness. It must be admitted, however, that the extreme popularity of athletic sports is a very uncertain and insufficient remedy. Excellent as they are in moderation, and Mr. Maclaren has an evident enthusiasm for every variety of muscular exercise, they have many palpable shortcomings. They are apt, when pursued in excess, to inflict severe injuries; rowing is charged, though perhaps rather unjustly, with having shortened many lives. Mr. Maclaren gives a case of a man who walked with his son—a lanky lad of thirteen—from Oxford to London in a day, with the result that the boy died within a year, never recovering from the exhaustion; and it is needless to recall instances, only too common, of similar evils subsequent upon thoughtless exertion. It is another shortcoming of athletic exercises that, for the most part, they strengthen only those who are already strong. The poor stunted creatures whom Mr. Maclaren causes to shoot up in height, and to expand in breadth, do not care to expose themselves to the ridicule of their companions; indeed, we fully believe his statement that a very large number of boys, and especially of those who would benefit by exercise, would take none at all if left to themselves. And finally, the games, excellent as they are in many respects, produce a very partial effect upon the frame. Thus, as Mr. Maclaren shows, most of our national exercises do much more to strengthen the lower half of the body than the upper. Football, rowing, walking, running and leaping, are all executed chiefly by the legs and loins; and even in such games as cricket, racket, and fives, the arms, and especially the left arm have much less to do than the legs. Consequently, he tells us, he finds that the lower limbs of our young men are usually large and sometimes massive, whilst the upper region is small, imperfectly developed, years behind the lower limbs in development, and sometimes so different that it might belong to a different person. Amongst hundreds of pupils, he says that he would find it hard "to point out one in whom this lower half was really faultily grown, whilst I could with painful facility point to dozens in whom the upper was distorted from its proper conformation." We will not ask whether this explanation is quite sufficient, nor will we endeavour to draw any moral for athletic performers from the inordinate development of the "lower half" of their natures. But it will be readily admitted that our popular games have faults both in excess and defect, and that they leave room for at least a supplementary training such as can be best given by gymnastics. The purpose of this little book is to provide a kind of grammar of the exercises thus desirable. It is a short account, with complete diagrams, of a great variety of contortions which the human frame may be set to perform. There are devices for strengthening and suppling every muscle and joint in the frame; dumb-bells and bars, and horizontal beams and vaulting horses and parallel bars, and trapeziums and rings and ladders, and masts and ropes and walls enough to provide employment for life. In turning over the pages one arrives at a sense of bewilderment that four limbs and a body can be made to assume so great a variety of positions, every one of which, to a casual observer, must be exceedingly unpleasant. As Mr. Maclaren tells us that the instructor should perform each of these feats by way of example to the learners, we presume that he is capable of going through the whole series, and we regard him with the unfeigned reverence which is obviously his due. It was with some pleasure, we must confess, that we read a confession which seemed to lower him to the ordinary level of humanity—namely, that he had never been able to walk more than six miles in an hour. Satisfaction at the weaknesses of great men is perhaps unamiable, but we should feel the same sort of pleasure in learning that Shakspeare could not do a rule of three sum, that Newton was a poor classical scholar, and that Mr. Maclaren is unable to walk much faster than many feeble men.

The value of the book in laying down a regular course of exercises and in suggesting new combinations to teachers will be considerable; but the essential merit of Mr. Maclaren's theory depends upon its systematic application. Running up ropes and lifting weights are by themselves of questionable utility. A lad left to his own devices in a gymnasium is not unlikely to have an accident, and may very probably receive dangerous strains. What is required is a skilful instructor, who will adapt the exercises to the strength and needs of the individual, and will conduct him through a progressive series of gradually increasing difficulties. Thus, at Radley and Marlborough, as we are told by Mr. Maclaren, the whole school is divided into classes, each of which attends at the gymnasium, and is placed under a single teacher, who gives the instruction suitable to each boy. One hour a week is the whole time occupied, and according to Mr. Maclaren, is sufficient, provided the instruction begins early and is continued through the school life. The boys may, however, attend as a volunteer on the days of other lessons. It is specially noticed that the hour thus taken is to be considered as part of the school-time; and even it seems that the boys should receive marks as for other school-work. Without this there would not be the necessary earnestness and discipline. We should have been glad to see the opinions of the school authorities as to the benefit of the system; but from Mr. Maclaren's sensible and moderate account, we have no doubt that it may be managed so as to produce very great benefit to the boys, and to correct some of the evils which are common under a totally unregulated system of athletic sports. Amongst other advantages, we hope that it may impress upon boys the important truth upon which he dwells, that "natural and suitable exercise strengthens, false or undue exercise weakens and injures;" though, if we were inclined to be critical, we might ask what is meant by "false exercise."

Mr. Maclaren gives some sensible remarks on the system of gymnastics pursued in the German, French, and English armies, and, if his views are well-founded, our new gymnasiums should do wonders in expanding the chests and strengthening the limbs of our soldiers. Indeed, even the unfortunate class of middle-aged cockneys may take hope. Poor creatures whose only notion of exercise is a dreary walk along monotonous streets to and from their offices, and who are too often seduced even from that by the blandishments of cabs and omnibuses, have generally resigned all hopes of physical development. At most they look forward to a few gasps of sea-air or a scramble up a mountain side in the summer. Yet even they may do much with a pair of dumb-bells after the morning tub, if better means of exercise are not at hand; and for their consolation we will quote one comforting piece of statistics. The greatest increase in development of the first 500 men at the Oxford Gymnasium was made by a man in his 36th year, who increased ½ in. in height, 13 lbs. in weight, and 4½ inches in girth of chest, besides a great increase in size of arm. Halfway through life, there is still, it seems, hope for the virtuous gymnast.

THE CONFERENCE.

THE Plenipotentiaries of the Paris Conference, or the Governments which they represent, must be easily discouraged if the protest of the Greek Minister has caused them any serious embarrassment. The parties to the Treaty of Paris had a right to hold a meeting for any appropriate purpose; and Greece was not included in the number of signataries. On the other hand, Mr. RANGABE might plausibly contend that his Government would not be bound by the decisions of a body from which it was excluded; but the technical equality of independent States is in practice modified by their comparative strength or weakness. Notwithstanding the votes of imaginary men and non-existent money which have been carried through the Chamber at Athens, Greece is, in fact, entirely dependent on foreign protection for the means of resistance to Turkey. The approval by the Conference of the terms, or of the substance, of the Turkish ultimatum would compel the Greeks to submit. The case is so clear that any dissentient Power must avow its virtual hostility to Turkey; and it is therefore probable that, in spite of the conflict of interests and political designs, such pressure will be applied to Greece as to ensure the present maintenance of peace. The Porte, which would gladly have avoided all interference on the part of the European Powers, consented to enter into the Conference only as a party to the Treaty of Paris. If the terms of the treaty have not been infringed, Turkey retains the right of self-defence against an implacable and indefatigable assailant. Without allies Greece cannot be a formidable adversary in open war; and there is no reason to believe that Russia is as yet prepared to incur the risk of joining in the attack on Turkey. Unless the intentions of the various Powers were known, the peaceable Governments were ill advised in consenting to take part in the Conference. No ceremony can be idler than a meeting of five or six diplomatists who will not be severally bound by the decision of a majority, while neither custom nor common sense allows of serious discussion. The arguments recorded in reports of Congresses and Conferences have as little of the dramatic or forensic character as the questions and answers in a catechism. Every speech is equivalent to a despatch, and the course of the debate has often been preconcerted among the ostensible disputants. At the Congress of Vienna, when the Great Powers were engaged in serious and angry controversies, all the real business was transacted in private meetings, while the regular Congress met from time to time to sanction arrangements which had been made out of doors. Even when a vote is taken at a Conference, the result is known and practically accepted by the minority beforehand.

Both Turkey and Greece have been requested to postpone hostile operations until the decision of the Conference is known; nor need there be any difficulty in complying with the suggestion, as no troops are ready to move on either side, while the Turkish Admiral is employed in the easy task of preventing the Enosis from leaving the harbour of Syra. The only actual warfare has been terminated, to the advantage of the Porte, since the beginning of the negotiations. Not only the Greek volunteers, but the insurgent Government of Crete, has been captured; and it may at last be considered certain that the civil war is at an end. As it is scarcely probable that the Greeks will engage in the hopeless enterprise of reviving the insurrection which they originally promoted, it would seem that neither belligerent has anything further to fight for. It is not worth the while of the Turkish Government to insist on a verbal understanding to maintain neutrality, especially as the promise would inevitably be broken on the first opportunity. The Greeks must necessarily discontinue the equipment of auxiliaries when there are no longer any principals in the contest; and the cruises of their blockade-runners will for the same reason be unavoidably suspended. It was only in Crete that the Greeks could inflict serious annoyance on Turkey, unless, indeed, they had become parties to a general conspiracy of the Christian subjects of the Porte against its sovereignty. There is no reason to believe that any confederacy of the kind has been at present organized. The SULTAN has lately exchanged civilities with the Prince of ROUMANIA; the Servians are engaged in a reform of their Constitution; and the discontent of the Bulgarians appears to be principally directed against Greek priests and functionaries. In general, Austria, in her own interest, will keep a watch over the turbulence which may be excited on the Northern border; and Greece alone is incapable of molesting Turkey by land. Unless some hidden policy throws impediments in the way of peace, the Conference may probably quiet the warlike propensities of the Greeks by a few words of authority and of warning.

The Conference may confine its deliberations to the affairs of Turkey and Greece, but the Plenipotentiaries and their Governments are far more deeply interested in the ulterior question of a general war. The failure of the Conference, or the refusal of Greece to acquiesce in its decisions, would not so much create a serious risk as betray its imminence. The violent language of the Russian newspapers indicates the only contingency which could produce a final rupture between Greece and Turkey. According to the Russian version of recent transactions, the Conference was proposed by Prussia for the express purpose of preventing an understanding on Eastern questions between Russia and France; and the Emperor NAPOLEON is consequently exhorted to defeat the insidious policy of his enemies by frankly consenting to a policy of conquest and partition. He would thus secure a Russian alliance against Northern Germany; and of course he is informed that open war is better than precarious peace. No fallacy is more commonly propounded by political rhetoricians, although the evil of an uncertain peace consists in the possibility of war. An armed truce is expensive, and it causes much diplomatic discussion; but war is incalculably more costly in money, and it involves the additional evil of indefinite bloodshed. Talk about fighting is incomparably less pernicious than actual slaughter, and the postponement of a war often ends in averting it altogether. Nothing can be more improbable than that the Emperor NAPOLEON should be tempted by the coarse and dangerous overtures of Russia. A league of France and Russia against Turkey would alienate not only England but Austria and Hungary, which in any other quarrel might probably incline to the side of France in a contest with Prussia. It is true that a year or two ago the French Government coquetted for a time with Russia; but the purpose of interfering in Crete, if it had ever been entertained, was ultimately abandoned and disavowed. As there is no longer any Cretan insurrection to encourage, it would be difficult to devise a cause of quarrel with Turkey; and the French MINISTER of FOREIGN AFFAIRS, in assuming the presidency of the Conference, acquired an interest in bringing its discussions to a satisfactory termination.

Some astute politicians attribute to the Emperor NAPOLEON the far-fetched design of founding the quarrel with Prussia, which is assumed to be inevitable, on some pretext which would not interest the rest of Germany. According to this ingenious theory, war would commence in the South-East of Europe; and the eventual advance of the French armies to the Rhine would seem to be the result of strategic necessity. Experience shows that high State policy seldom justifies so elaborate a calculation, and the supposed scheme would be open to more than one fatal objection. Nations are not easily deceived as to the real bearing of a great conflict, whatever may have been the professed cause of rupture. There is no possible reason for a war between France and Prussia, except jealousy of the greatness achieved at Sadowa, and anxiety to prevent the further aggrandizement which may be easily foreseen. In the event of a French war, Prussia would be entitled under the military treaties of 1866 to demand aid from the States south of the Main; and notwithstanding the French leanings of some of the Southern Governments, national feeling would compel the performance of all such obligations. Whatever might be the military result of a first or second campaign, a French war could not fail to accelerate the completion of German unity; nor, during the continuance of the contest, would it be for the interest of France to be encumbered with another gratuitous struggle in the East. If there are many reasons which must deter France from commencing war, it is still more certain that Prussia has no desire to begin a general European convulsion; and, except with the support of either France or Germany, Russia will be unwilling, and perhaps unable, to move. It is not creditable to the rulers of Europe that a petty and ill-governed State should be able to produce universal alarm by a violation of the rules of good neighbourhood. If France and Russia had not been suspected of sinister designs, Greece would never have ventured to precipitate a rupture with Turkey; and the assemblage of a Conference, in the place of a peremptory prohibition, to a certain extent shows that the calculations of the Greek Government were not without foundation. At present there is reason to believe that the mischief will be checked, as none of the Powers will accept the responsibility of a war, and as they have collectively the means of preventing it.

THE TRIAL OF ELECTION PETITIONS.

THE trial of Election Petitions under the new system has begun this week, and it has begun under every advantage. Judges of great professional reputation and experience have initiated the practical working of the method of trying these petitions in the localities where bribery or corrupt practices are alleged to have taken place, and the proceedings have consequently been conducted both with despatch and decorum. The Judges very much disliked the task imposed on them by the Act of last Session, and did their best to escape the burden. But when they found they must yield, they did so frankly, and have done their utmost to give the system over which they were called to preside the best chance of success. It may be said that this system was conceived so as to effect as far as possible three main objects—the punishment of bribery or corrupt practices where a candidate or his agents have been guilty, the protection of persons duly returned against frivolous and vexatious petitions, and an assurance given to the public that the trial would be conducted without political bias, and so as to elicit all material facts tending to show whether corruption or corrupt practices had deeply tainted the constituency. To secure the attainment of these objects, the three Judges appointed to try petitions drew up a most elaborate and skilfully framed set of rules, which has greatly simplified and determined within precedent and intelligible limits the course of the proceedings. On one question, however, of primary importance the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas was taken this week. Mr. Justice WILLES had decided that particulars of alleged acts of bribery should only be given three days before the day of trial. The sitting Conservative member for Westminster, Mr. SMITH, complained that, with such a constituency as he had to deal with, such a notice was not nearly long enough. When thousands of people vote, and agents are counted by hundreds, a candidate and his friends can never, as it was argued on his behalf, know where he will be attacked; and if he has only three days to sift the facts, inquire as to persons and characters, and get a clear account of what happened months ago between people of whom he has no personal knowledge, he runs a great risk of losing his seat simply because he has not had the opportunity of refuting a story which his adversaries have had months to cook up against him. The Court began by inquiring what was the old Parliamentary practice, and was informed that when petitions were tried by Committees of the House of Commons, no notice of the particular acts of bribery to be alleged was given, save that the sitting member learns the case against him for the first time from the opening speech of the petitioners' counsel. Obviously it was at least a great step in favour of the sitting member that he should have three more days given him than he would have had if petitions were now tried as formerly, and the Court refused to alter the time of notice which Mr. Justice WILLES had prescribed. The old system was not really so indefensible as it seems. It would be next to impossible to [illegible] any case of bribery if too long notice was given. The [illegible] would be tampered with, frightened, or spirited away, and counter evidence would be manufactured, so as to meet exactly the evidence of bribery that was to be tendered. It must be remembered that public opinion is scarcely yet in favour of regarding it as a social duty to prove bribery, and people would not hesitate to do very strong things to screen their party and the constituencies to which they belong from the reputation of being tainted with bribery. Probably in old days the odds would have been too much in favour of the sitting member if even three days beforehand he had known exactly what was going to be said against him. But now, with a better public opinion growing, with increased certainty of publicity, and with the Courts of Law ready to watch everything that goes on, three days' notice may not be at all too much to give. Experience may show that the length of notice may be safely and advantageously extended, but for the present the Court has probably gone as far as it was safe to go; and in any particular case where it may be apprehended that, owing to the shortness of the notice, injustice would be done, the presiding Judge can adjourn the trial.

The inquiry into the circumstances on which the Windsor Election Petition was founded is not yet at an end, and we cannot, therefore, express any opinion as to whether the sitting member, or his opponent, or neither of them, ought to sit for Windsor. But the proceedings have lasted long enough to enable us to form some estimate of the practical working of the new system. That there is no political bias, and no suspicion of political bias, that the trial is conducted properly, that counsel are kept in order, and that there are none of the old attempts to try it on, and to see what absurdities of rhetoric and what malversations of the law of evidence a Committee would stand, are matters of course, and this naturally and necessarily from the substitution of a Judge for a Parliamentary tribunal. But there are minor, and yet very considerable, advantages apparent in the new mode of trial. A Judge has a habit of putting the maxims or principles that are to guide him into general legal propositions, at which he arrives with ease and certainty, and which he and the counsel engaged take as beyond dispute. The question as to who is and who is not an agent, so often debated before Election Committees, was soon disposed of by Mr. Justice WILLES. Every person authorised to canvass is, as he said, an agent. In two cases adduced by the petitioners this simple rule disposed very easily of the allegation. Mr. Justice WILLES did not, indeed, lay down in so many words the converse of the proposition, and say that no person not authorised to canvass is an agent, for there might undoubtedly be persons authorised to do other things than canvass who would be agents. But in nine cases out of ten, the question whether a given man is or is not an agent can be settled by asking whether he was authorised to canvass. The petitioner in the Windsor case happened to have got hold of several instances where it was supposed that bribery had been committed, but where there was nothing to show that the supposed briber was the agent of the candidate. In one remarkable instance Mr. LYSLIE, a barrister, was said to have bribed a fisherman to vote for Mr. EYKYN by buying a new landing-net from him and giving him a sovereign. But the petitioner found the evidence of the fisherman so weak that he had to call Mr. LYSLIE himself, and that gentleman gave his evidence in a manner that did credit to him and his profession, and showed that the conception of SAM WELLER in the witness-box may be realized in actual life. Mr. LYSLIE, like that Pickwickian hero, might have the comfort of thinking as he went away, that he had said as little to commit himself and his friends, and as much to damage his opponents, as possible. His answer to the question whether he had ever talked to the fisherman about the election, that he never said anything, so far as he could recollect, except casually remarking one day that Mr. EYKYN was, he thought, a gentleman, while he supposed Colonel RICHARDSON GARDNER, as he was always bragging about his money, must be a snob; and his answer to the question how he happened to engage such a person as the fisherman to go as an electioneering detective to Chippenham, that the fisherman looked a fool but was not one, were efforts in the highest WELLER style. There was, in fact, nothing whatever to show that Mr. LYSLIE had been authorised to canvass for Mr. EYKYN, or had ever canvassed for him. It is not to be supposed that a Parliamentary Committee could have made any mistake about so very clear a case; but there was always a hope that a case might not be very clear, and that if there was the slightest obscurity about it the Committee might be induced, or bullied, or wearied into thinking that possibly a man might be more of an agent than he seemed. With a [illegible]e, to attempt to steal an advantage of this sort would be hopeless; and election agents will soon realize that it is hopeless. They will dismiss altogether much evidence which they have hitherto been accustomed to offer on the speculation that no one could say a Committee might not be made to think it was worth something. If the agents for the Windsor petitioner had clearly put before themselves the general rule that they must show the alleged briber to have been an authorised canvasser, they would scarcely have taken up this fisherman's case. Of course they knew the rule vaguely, for it was established election law before Mr. Justice WILLES enounced it; but they had not probably realized the difference between such a rule being enforced by a Judge and by a Parliamentary Committee.

It is evident, we think, from the evidence offered by the petitioner, that the new Act had so far a salutary effect, that it made his opponent and his opponent's agents very much afraid of breaking the law. They may or may not have been guilty of bribery and treating, but they undeniably strove very hard not to commit these offences in a way for which they could be made responsible. There was only one case in which it was alleged that money was given by the sitting member, or with his direct cognizance; and in that case, the sitting member had been so particularly cautious as to deposit the money he wished to be bestowed on what he thought an object of charity in the hands of the clergyman of the parish, who was a political opponent. This is quite in accordance with all the information that has been received about the last election. There was, we fear, some direct and wholesale bribery; there was much intimidation—so much, that the HOME SECRETARY, who is a moderate and careful reasoner, has just announced in Renfrewshire that it has converted him to the Ballot; there were frightful sums squandered in expenses too legitimate to be easily questioned; but in constituencies where money used once to be spent freely, there was last autumn the very greatest caution used to avoid coming under the scope of the new Act. The bribery and treating at Windsor, even if taken as alleged by the petitioner, were of the mildest type. There was no man in the moon, no buying cats for a ten-pound note, no floods of beer and gin in public-houses. Until we have the Judge's decision we cannot tell whether Mr. EYKYN has brought himself within the reach of the law; but the public may congratulate itself on having got an Act passed which made a candidate so very anxious as Mr. EYKYN was to do nothing that would commit him. It is not that he did illegal things, and tried not to be found out. As much as that might be said of the most corrupt member in the most corrupt days. But he tried so to manage that if he behaved handsomely to his neighbours about election time, his handsome manner of behaving to them should at any rate not be positively illegal. Mr. EYKYN and his friends would say that he did a great deal more than this; but, taking what he did or is said to have done at the worst, yet if he was, as his opponent conceives, a person who wished to get into Parliament by bribery and treating, he certainly was a person whose bribery and treating were toned down, by fear of an Act of Parliament, to a very mild and limited form. Happy is the borough where a wicked person, anxious to get into Parliament by treating, confines his personal efforts to giving some pale but indistinguishable liquor out of an Irish can, some weeks before the election, to a lamplighter who voted against him. So far the Act may be taken to have worked very satisfactorily. But it may be that Windsor is too favourable an example; and even as to Windsor we have yet to hear what was the behaviour of the petitioner, Colonel RICHARDSON GARDNER, who was also a wealthy man, anxious to get into Parliament, and who ought to have stood equally in awe of the Act and of the Common Law Judges.

GIBRALTAR.

THE Gibraltar controversy affords an extreme and untoward illustration of the inconvenience of public or open diplomacy. It is too late to inquire whether public opinion, roughly ascertained by discussion, ought to have a decisive control over domestic politics. The majority, or the most active section, of the community may perhaps, on the whole, form sounder judgments than a Minister or a Cabinet; nor would the actual distribution of power be affected by any proof of its inexpediency. The publicity which is inseparable from popular government has, among other recommendations, the advantage of repressing or exposing personal and selfish motives of action. While all parties are compelled to profess a regard for the general good, arguments which cannot be turned into a plausible shape are necessarily kept in the background. In matters of legislative or administrative policy it may be assumed that the nation has a common or preponderating interest, and the best and wisest measure which can be devised ought, of course, in every case to be applied. But the rule of international morality has not hitherto been as definitely established; nor have Governments yet admitted that the greatest happiness of the greatest number of States would necessarily be preferred, even if it could be accurately defined, to the rights or to the wishes of a single independent Power. There is scarcely a nation in the world which would surrender a square mile of its territory for the acknowledged benefit of the rest of mankind. At some future time perhaps self-denial may become a national virtue, but hitherto ascetic excellence finds a place only in private morality. Enthusiastic propagandists have indeed often professed their readiness to diffuse religious or political truth among their neighbours by revolutionary agitation, or at the point of the sword; but, from the time of PHILIP II. to the days of the French Convention, cosmopolitan magnanimity always happened to be identified with national aggrandizement. As long as nations retain their present consciousness of independent personality, they will find it convenient to follow the ancient practice of entrusting their external relations to the management of confidential agents. It is impossible to consult publicly on foreign affairs without taking strangers, who may be enemies or parties in a dispute, into an embarrassing confidence. Even in the humbler sphere of corporate enterprise, directors of joint-stock companies are often compelled to withhold information from their shareholders, because a public statement would be available to commercial adversaries or rivals. In dealings between nations it has always been held that impenetrable secrecy was the habitual duty of diplomatists. In the good old times, ambassadors employed burglars and highway robbers to get possession of the despatches of their colleagues, with full knowledge that their own correspondence was exposed to similar risks. It was not until a Government had finally determined on its policy that its intentions were communicated to a foreign Power.

It is proper that English politicians should from time to time consider whether a possession such as Gibraltar ought to be retained. In the last century more than one Government contemplated the surrender as possible, although the measure was never definitively adopted, or proposed to Parliament. After the famous siege of 1782 greater value was naturally attached to the fortress; and during the long war, and for many years after its close, there could be no question of the abandonment of any English possession. Modern changes of opinion and popular theories have tended to reopen a discussion which is unluckily no longer confined to Cabinets. Letters to the newspapers form a suitable vehicle for ordinary controversies, but a landowner would scarcely choose such a method of investigating his title to a farm which happened to be within the ring-fence of an adverse claimant. Notwithstanding the pressure of their own political difficulties, some Spaniards have probably leisure to attend to the progress of a dispute which must appear to them equally satisfactory and surprising. Their pretensions to Gibraltar cannot but be encouraged by controversialists who appear on both sides to assume that they are discussing an open question. The right of England, founded on an occupancy of a hundred and fifty years, cannot but be compromised when it is made to depend on the hydrographical peculiarities of the roadstead of Ceuta, or even on the range of the guns of Gibraltar. The very existence of a controversy seems to imply a doubt; and foreigners may excusably attribute to the entire nation the crotchets or opinions of a few irresponsible persons. Admiral GREY, having a position which insured official attention to his representations, would have been better advised if he had submitted his opinions to the Government rather than to the readers of the Times. There are no longer any secrets in domestic administration, but a great Empire can hardly be kept together without some use of mystery or reserve.

The political arguments in favour of the abandonment of Gibraltar are obvious and forcible. An enemy of England could at any time offer to Spain, as the price of an alliance, assistance in the recovery of a fortress which is regarded as national property. It cannot be denied that the English possession of the Rock must be disagreeable to patriotic Spaniards, although Gibraltar has been detached from Spain longer than the German provinces of Alsace and Lorraine have been possessed by France. There has not, in fact, been any chronic hostility between England and Spain in the last or present century, although the BOURBON family alliance at one time united Spain with France on all questions of European policy. At a later period, NAPOLEON inherited from the Republic a friendly connexion with Spain, which he afterwards forfeited by his own wanton perfidy and violence. There is at present no cause of ill-will between England and Spain, except perhaps the contraband trade between Gibraltar and the neighbouring ports which is the most vexatious result of the English occupation of the fortress. It would not be prudent or justifiable to retain the Rock if it were unconnected with the safety of other English possessions; but it lies between England and Malta, on the highway to India. It appears from the late discussions that the most cogent arguments against a surrender would have been inapplicable in the time of sailing vessels, or while troops and stores were despatched to India by way of the Cape. It is as a coaling station, and only incidentally as a stronghold, that Gibraltar is now valuable, if not indispensable. From the Channel to the entrance of the Mediterranean there is a voyage of seven days, which nearly exhausts the stowage capacity of modern ironclad men-of-war. If they have gone so far with steam, they have no means of reaching Malta except with sails, unless they can replenish their stores at Gibraltar or at some neighbouring port. A maritime enemy with ports in the Mediterranean might command the access to Malta and the Levant, if English vessels were prevented from coaling near the entrance of the Straits.

The question of coaling was not put prominently forward when the cession of the Ionian Islands was under discussion. Corfu was, in fact, not in the line of transit to any English possession; and if military advantages were considered, it may have been thought that the garrison which must otherwise occupy the islands would, in case of war, be more usefully employed in defending Malta. There would be a similar economy of troops if Gibraltar were evacuated, provided no other fortified station were substituted for an impregnable fortress; but it seems to be abundantly clear that, while Gibraltar might be held against all assailants by a sufficient garrison, Ceuta could only be secured as a coaling station by the presence of an army. Under some possible system of organization, England may perhaps hereafter be able to dispose of forces on a scale of Continental magnitude; but up to the present time soldiers have always been scarce and costly, and a station which cannot be held by a few thousand men will be practically useless. It is unlucky that a few acres of coal wharves should have priceless value in time of war; but ironclad ships and the food of their engines are as necessary in modern warfare as the thirty or forty horses which CORTEZ contrived to take with infinite pains from the coast to the table-land of Mexico. It is scarcely worth while to discuss the inconveniences of the harbour of Gibraltar, or the number of berths for ships which could be provided at Ceuta, if it is true that the coals would be safe under the batteries of the Rock, and that they would be liable to capture on the Moorish coast. It would be desirable and pleasant to gratify Spanish sentiment, even at the doubtful risk of disturbing the susceptibilities of Morocco; but coals are even more indispensable than amicable feelings, and it has not yet been proved that they can be safely kept at Ceuta. Admiral GREY has had much the worse in a dispute which he would have done well not to originate.

THE CONSOLATIONS OF THE CONSERVATIVES.

MR. DUDLEY BAXTER, who generally acts as the cheerful statistician of his party, has published a pamphlet in which he proves how legitimate is the consolation which Conservatives may find in the results of the elections. No one ought to think of grudging them such consolation as they can get, for it is an excellent thing that a great party should retain its buoyancy and spirit, and bad consequences might ensue if the Conservatives were thoroughly cowed, sulky, and irritated. On the contrary, nothing can be more satisfactory than the present state of things—a strong Liberal Ministry with a very large majority, and the Conservatives congratulating themselves on a peculiar kind of party triumph of their own. What they pride themselves on is that, in the first place, the constituencies in which Conservatives gained were large ones, and those in which they lost were small ones; and secondly, that taking the United Kingdom as a whole, the Conservative members represent a proportion of the population larger than they did in the last Parliament by nearly half a million. This last is a subtle sort of comfort, and wants the Tory COCKER to understand or appreciate it. But, putting aside arrays of very big figures which convince nobody who is not already convinced, the Conservatives may at any time fall back on the indisputable fact that they carried a great many large constituencies, and that in two or three of the most important counties they had a sweeping success. This is their consolation. They were thoroughly beaten in Scotland, in Wales, in Ireland, and in the English boroughs, if those boroughs are taken as a whole; but they had some few successes in English boroughs, and of those successes some were in large constituencies; while in the counties they were triumphant. In spite, however, of their successes in England, they only diminished the Liberal majority against them in the English constituencies by five, while the English population represented by Conservatives is larger by two millions than it was in the last Parliament. Mr. DUDLEY BAXTER naturally mourns over this as an anomaly, and the true deduction from all his statistics and facts appears to be that the true policy of the Conservatives would be to advocate household suffrage in counties as well as boroughs, coupled with equal electoral districts. But the deductions he actually makes are of a more modest kind, and are as follows:—First, that the Conservatives having got so well out of the elections shows that Mr. DISRAELI'S Reform Bill was wise as a party move; secondly, that whereas history shows Conservative reaction to be the inevitable sequence of a Reform Bill, the reaction may be expected to be quicker and more effectual than that which in 1841 placed Sir ROBERT PEEL in power, in proportion as the present Liberal majority of 111 is less than the Liberal majority of 362 in the Parliament of 1832; thirdly, that the Irish Church question did produce, as Mr. DISRAELI prophesied it would produce, a considerable effect on the English elections in favour of the Conservatives; fourthly, that as the real opinion of England is sufficiently shown by the vastly increased population which Conservatives represent, the Ministry cannot wisely venture to go too far in overbearing the voice of England by the preponderance of the other parts of the United Kingdom; and lastly, that the Conservatives cannot be an unpopular party when they have received so much support. These are very sweeping inferences from very uncertain premisses, and of course they are open to very easy criticism. Still, when we notice how very meek the aspirations of the Conservative party are, and how good-humoured and readily satisfied it is in the moment of defeat, we cannot find the heart to criticize its little sources of comfort too narrowly. A party that thinks it quite creditable not to be utterly hated and despised, and that pooh-poohs a majority of a hundred and eleven against it as a mere nothing, wins upon our sympathies. It is impossible not to take kindly to people so humble and so cheerful; and we may quite allow that the recent elections did show a strength in the Conservative party that was not known to exist, and revealed how strong was the tendency of small suburban people to take what they think to be the side of respectability and good manners.

But, allowing all this, and without the slightest wish to take away any of the sources of consolation which the Conservatives may now be enjoying, we may ask what is exactly meant by saying that the voice of England has pronounced in favour of the Conservatives, and that it is not to be overborne by the voices of the other parts of the United Kingdom? The Conservatives claim to be representatives of all the population contained in the areas of the constituencies for which they return members, and of course in this way the whole county population is made to figure as represented by Conservatives where the members belong to their party. According to the theory of the Constitution they are quite justified in doing so. The House of Commons represents not only the electors, but all the commoners, and a county member represents every one in his county. Those who are returned by the majority are also supposed to represent the minority as well as the majority, and it is the whole constituency that is represented by the sitting members. But if we are to look only to the bare legal position of the persons returned, the majority of the House of Commons must prevail, however it may be composed. There is no superiority of English members over Irish members or Scotch members, and there is no superiority of the representative of the largest county over the representative of the smallest borough. Even if we look at England only, there are forty-five more Liberal members sitting for English constituencies than there are Conservative members. In point of the population represented, there is still a majority for the Liberals, for, out of the nineteen millions of the population of England, about ten millions are represented by Liberals as against nine millions represented by Conservatives. It is only, then, in a very peculiar sense that it can be said that the voice of England has pronounced in favour of the Conservatives. All that is meant is, that the proportion of the English population represented by them is greater than it was in the last Parliament. Now why should this fact have much weight with a Liberal Ministry? and why should it be supposed that the Liberal party will hesitate to carry out the views it is pledged to support, simply because, although the English constituencies have returned many more Liberals than Conservatives, the portion of the population represented by Conservatives is greater than it was? Scotland, Ireland, and Wales are permitted to send members to the House of Commons, and if these members go there, the administration of public affairs can only proceed on the supposition that a majority created by the accession of their votes shall prevail. But then it may be said that no one can deny that the opinion of the great English constituencies has, and ought to have, a weight which makes itself felt by all Ministries, and which it is mere folly not to take into account. That is true. We do not for a moment suppose that a majority composed chiefly of members from other parts of the kingdom could long keep a Ministry in power that was warmly opposed by the bulk of Englishmen. But then a Ministry which is asked to believe that the voice of the great English constituencies is against it will naturally examine the facts very closely. In the present Parliament two-thirds of the boroughs support the Government, and seven millions out of nine millions of the borough population are represented by Liberals. The voice of the boroughs, and of the population of the boroughs, is against the Conservatives, as Mr. Dudley Baxter very frankly admits. In the counties the voice goes the other way, and is in favour of the Conservatives; but before this voice is likely to frighten Ministers very much, they will take into consideration two things—first, that the voice of the county population means, practically, the voice of the great landowners, and of the county clergy. A Liberal Ministry proposing a measure affecting the Irish Church knows beforehand that these classes will be against its measure, and is not to be moved or frightened much by finding its anticipations realized. In the next place, there was a very large Liberal minority even in the counties where the Conservatives won their greatest triumphs, and especially in Lancashire there was much that was accidental and local in the decision at which the constituency arrived. It is rather a come-down to descend from saying that the voice of England is against the Liberals, to saying that the majority of the electors of Lancashire, being scared by Fenianism and hating the Irish, were successfully got to the poll by Conservative agents and the excited parsons of their parishes.

Then, again, the inquiry suggests itself whether Mr. Dudley Baxter is warranted in assuming, on the analogy of what took place after the Reform Bill of 1832, that there will be before long a Conservative reaction, and that the prospects of the party are very much better now than they were in 1832, because there was then a majority against them three times as great as that which has just made them resign office. The Conservatives all cling to this hope. They think that time must work in their favour, and they flatter themselves that at any rate the present Ministry must soon break up. If they look back on the history of the period intervening between the two Reform Bills, they will find that in the course of thirty-six years there were five Conservative Ministries in power, but that only one of these Ministries had a Parliamentary majority and in any way governed the country. All the others were Ministries more or less on sufferance, the strength of which lay in the divisions of their opponents, and the last of which lived by copying the policy and mistaking or exaggerating the measures of the Liberals. The probability is that in the course of the next few years something of the same sort will recur, and the Conservatives will now and then enjoy a hasty snatch of office when personal or political quarrels have disunited their adversaries. But the better spirits of the party have the sense to feel that this, after all, is very poor work, and that unless the Conservatives can some day hope to get office with the full approbation of the country, and with a good Parliamentary majority to back them, their party is in a very poor way. Accordingly, they try to persuade themselves that, because there was a Conservative reaction after 1832, there must be one after the Reform Bill of 1867. That there will not be such a reaction no one can pretend to say, and the likelihood of it would be rapidly and greatly increased if the Liberals, when in office, proposed any measures that seriously frightened holders of property, and the haters of mob tyranny and of the bluster of political ranters. The Conservatives might also gain a sudden popularity if their adversaries ran counter to the national feeling with regard to undertaking a war or carrying it on. But the mere fact that a majority of 360 was turned, within ten years after 1832, into a minority of 82, seems a very inconclusive ground for arguing that, as the Liberal majority after the last Reform Bill is only 111, a Conservative reaction must come, and come very quickly. A majority of one hundred is really much more to be relied upon than a majority of three hundred; for it is less the product of temporary excitement, and excites less hope, and therefore causes less disappointment. That there has been no great outburst of popular enthusiasm after the new Reform Bill, but that the constituencies have on the whole given a steady unromantic support to the Liberals, may be taken as a sign of the times as adverse to the hopes of the Conservatives as any that could be offered them. It is obvious, also, that there are two sides to reflections on the influence exercised by the Irish Church question on the elections. Mr. Dudley Baxter said that it exercised a great influence on some county elections, and he is very much pleased with this. But, on the other hand, it was surely very remarkable that it exercised such a very small influence on the English borough elections. That, in spite of a No Popery cry started by the Premier, two out of every three English borough seats should now be held by a Liberal, must be allowed to be a striking proof of the strength of the Liberal party in those constituencies. And it must be remembered that if the influence exercised by this question in some county elections was noticeable, yet it was evidently of a merely temporary and accidental kind. Constituencies that would otherwise have returned a Liberal did, in point of fact, return a Conservative, because the electors were disturbed with thoughts of the fate of the Irish Church. The inference, we should have thought, would have been, not that these constituencies would retain a permanent Conservative character, but that when this special question was removed from the sphere of practical politics, they will return to their old allegiance, and withdraw themselves from the range of Conservative reaction.

THE FRENCH EMPIRE.

Even in Paris, that city of New Year's gifts, there can have been no such acceptable present as that received from Toulouse by the ex-Minister of the Interior. When M. Pinard was dismissed for mismanaging the Baudin prosecutions, and giving occasion to the Opposition journals to take up their parable against the Empire, he could hardly have hoped to see the discredit transferred in a week or two to the shoulders of the Keeper of the Seals. Yet this, and nothing less, is what has been done by the publication of Baron Séguier's letter to the Toulouse Emancipation. The folly of M. Pinard in instituting these prosecutions at all has dropped out of memory, and in its place as a subject of discussion has come the yet greater folly of M. Baroche in conducting them in the manner described by the late Procureur-Impérial. M. Séguier's resignation has been made the text of endless invectives against the claim of the Minister of Justice to lecture his subordinates upon the performance of their official duties. It cannot be said that these invectives are strictly in place, for, so long as Government prosecutions are conducted by Government servants, and not by the Bar, it is only natural that if the former do not do their work properly they should be reprimanded by their official superiors. But the mere possession of a right implies nothing as to the wisdom of its exercise, and it is in this latter respect that M. Baroche has shown himself so singularly deficient. The offence alleged against M. Séguier is want of zeal in his speeches for the prosecution. In plain words, he has not been sufficiently dictatorial towards the Court. He has contented himself, it may be supposed, with stating the law, and pointing out how its provisions have been infringed by the article selected for prosecution. He has not been eloquent enough in describing the dangers which an acquittal may entail upon society, nor has he hinted with adequate significance at the Imperial favours which will be called down on the Toulouse magistrates by a judgment of the right sort. The French authorities do not care to be served in this way. They cannot put up with Laodicean indifference. They demand of a subordinate that he shall see with their eyes and speak with their tongue. It is an awkward thing to censure a legal functionary for displaying too much impartiality; at least the want of an obvious animus against the prisoner has not before now been declared to be a fault in a public prosecutor. But M. Baroche has risen superior to considerations of taste or prudence. Moderation is well enough in Ministerial circulars, but there is no place for it in the Toulouse Court of Appeal. Whether the mere expression of this opinion on the part of the Keeper of the Seals would have provoked M. Séguier to resignation may be doubted. But, coupled with reproaches for what he had left unsaid, came others for what he had said, and M. Séguier was thus enabled to discover that he must have been misreported to the Minister. An officer may be willing to take his chance of giving displeasure by the speeches he actually delivers, but few men would feel secure against doing so when the secret police is made the channel through which their oratory reaches the Government. For that, when this medium has once been employed, recourse will continually be had to it, may be taken for granted. An Imperial Minister knows too well how to adapt an authorized report to place much confidence in the information supplied by such documents, and the taste for governing by espionage is eminently one that grows by practice. It is probable, therefore, that M. Séguier did but anticipate his dismissal when he resigned his office, and had he waited in the hope of averting the blow he would have lost an admirable opportunity of revenging himself on his persecutor. To publish the cause of his resignation is to put an end to his official career, but it is at the same time to make M. Baroche feel that his own standing in the Government is hardly as secure as he could wish. The Emperor is an easy master, but to be made ridiculous in the eyes of his subjects is exactly the fault he is least likely to overlook.

M. Séguier comes of an eminent and honourable family, and can probably afford better than most of his colleagues to enjoy the luxury of independence. But the ties of professional life are so strong that there is some colour for the theory that he would have insensibly adapted himself to the Ministerial standard if he had not distrusted the permanence of the present system of administration. A man is greatly encouraged to cut himself loose from the Government by a secret conviction that the Government itself is going to the bad. M. Séguier has not thought fit to take the world into his confidence upon this point, but the training of a Procureur-Impérial is not of a kind which leads a man to take the losing side in a quarrel; and when M. Séguier elects to identify his cause with that of the Press, it is not wonderful that a practical public draws the inference that he thinks the Press, and not the Government, the best card in his hand. It would be extremely unsafe to place any reliance on such indications as that afforded by M. Séguier's conduct; but the readiness of the French people to see in his defection the forethought of a rat who suspects his present dwelling, is worth noticing as a political symptom. The rapidity with which the Empire has lost prestige during the last year or so is really startling. It is explained in a measure by the failures which have attended its foreign policy; but, considerable as these may be, they are far from sufficient to account for the whole of the result. A nation will excuse much to a vigorous Sovereign, while it is inclined to put the worst interpretation upon the acts of a Sovereign whom it regards as played out. Certainly this appears to be the light in which the Emperor Napoleon is now viewed by a good number of Frenchmen. His administration is at all events not less severe than it was formerly, but the attacks of the Opposition are no longer tempered by that wholesome awe which once held them in check. Or, if they do still evince their wonted caution, it is mingled with an assured anticipation of coming changes, which is not at all more consoling to the supporters of things as they are. The Emperor's own acts, perfectly natural as they are to a man in his position, still seem to betray a consciousness that there is no great part reserved for him on the political stage. He leans more and more on the Empress, to whose faculty for conciliating a superficial popularity he probably trusts to secure an undisputed succession for his son; and the prominence given to the Prince Imperial is not apparently interfered with by any of that unwillingness to take off his shoes before bed-time which has usually characterized princes who feel life still strong in them. Sixty years is not in itself a very formidable burden, but ill health adds an item to the account, the significance of which can only be appreciated by the victim.

Those who look back upon the history of the last seventeen years will be slow to believe that the Second Empire has entirely corresponded to the original design of its founder. Circumstances rather than either natural disposition or deliberate purpose, have made Napoleon III. a despot. That crowning of the edifice which has now become a jest was probably, in the first instance, the expression of a real intention. Though the "old parties" have all along had representatives whom nothing would have satisfied except the restoration of the particular dynasty or form of government to which they pinned their faith, they have always been few in number compared with that much larger body of Frenchmen who would never have quarrelled with liberty because she presented herself under Imperial forms. At no period has the Emperor wholly abandoned the idea of addressing himself to this class. That he has never frankly acted on it is probably to be attributed to the conditions under which his Government had its birth. The coup d'état has cast its shadow forward over all the years that have intervened, and the Emperor has never been able to extricate himself from the dilemma to which that event condemned him. He has had continually to choose between the tacit admission that the state of France did not justify the measures of December 1851, and the maintenance of the restrictive policy alleged to be demanded by the ever present danger of Socialism. With the experience he has had, the Emperor can hardly doubt that the pear would have fallen into his lap if he had not been in such a hurry to pluck it. The forces which have worked for him since the coup d'état would have been equally efficacious if the coup d'état had never been devised. In its dread of revolution the bulk of the French nation condoned the imprisonment of its legal representatives, and the slaughter of its unoffending citizens. Would it have been less likely to welcome a deliverer who came to it with unstained hands? The real gainers by the coup d'état were the immediate followers of the President. Prince Louis Napoleon might in all probability have mounted the throne in any case, but a year later it might have been with the consent of the Parliamentary leaders, not by the aid of a few reckless adventurers.

Englishmen have every cause to regret the turn which events took. Neither the Legitimists, nor the Orleanists, nor the Republicans have deserved so well of this country that it has any special ground to desire the restoration of their distinctive shibboleth. We are bound in common morality to desire for France the freedom which we claim for ourselves, but we may fairly wish that it could have been enjoyed under a Sovereign whose attitude towards England has been one of almost uniform friendliness. That the opportunity which has been lost can now be recovered, it seems useless to hope. The Second Empire has become impressed with a character of its own, and it can hardly afford to change it during the lifetime of Napoleon III. Whether it will have the chance of doing so afterwards is too remote a speculation to occupy the thoughts of reasonable men.

THE IRISH RAILWAYS.

The project for the purchase of the Irish Railways has reached a crisis the issue of which it is not very easy to surmise. Outwardly all the symptoms are favourable to the scheme—almost too favourable, if the truth must be told. The first hint of the enterprise was given, as will be remembered, by Mr Gladstone. Mr. Gladstone is now all-powerful. The Tories took up the idea with alacrity, and sent one of the best Commissions that ever were constituted for a purpose of the kind to investigate the actual condition of the Irish lines, and to estimate on a liberal but reasonable basis the purchase-money that might fairly be given for them. The Commission did their work thoroughly well, and their first Report established on the most conclusive grounds that something more than 19,000,000*l.* was the full value of the dividend-paying lines, including their loan capital, and that the remaining lines were burdened with a debt of 3,000,000*l.*, and were not worth half that amount. The whole affair might therefore fairly be bought for about 21,000,000*l.*, that sum being very considerably above what the prices of the bonds and shares in the market would amount to. The result of the inquiry was more favourable than had been anticipated; for, after the piteous complaints of the Irish Railway interest while the Duke of Devonshire's Commission was sitting, it was a relief to find that the finished lines, which originally cost 27,500,000*l.*, were still, on a liberal estimate, worth nearly three-fourths of that amount, and that the total railway revenue from all Ireland exceeded 850,000*l.* a year.

The Commissioners who had arrived at these results had no sooner completed their task than they were set to work again to inquire at what annual sacrifice of revenue the Government, if it bought the lines, could reduce the rates to something like the Belgian scale, and how many years the experiment must be continued before the loss would have recouped itself. The answer to this inquiry is supplied by the Second Report of the Commissioners, which has recently been printed. Before referring to its contents, let us take note of what had been doing in Ireland in the meantime. From the very first the movement had been taken up as an essentially beneficial project for Ireland, as indeed it could not fail to be. Meetings of influential railway magnates had combined with Irish peers and Irish members to press the matter on the attention of the Government for the time being. The Irish Railway Companies, backed by the Irish people, were begging and praying the Government to buy them up en masse, and save them from impending ruin; and English opinion was becoming favourable to the proposal, not indeed as an economical investment, but as a boon which might be fairly granted to struggling Ireland. As the progress of the investigation showed how seriously the Government had taken the subject into consideration, the Irish agitation, without abating any of its force, began by degrees to change its character. Meetings, bigger and more influential than ever, continued to pass unanimous resolutions urging the Government to buy the railways, and one of the most recent of them has elicited from Mr. GLADSTONE a letter, in which he rejoices over the attention which the subject has attracted in Ireland, and goes as near as a Prime Minister can do to pledging himself to make a bid for the property. But while popular enthusiasm in Ireland and deliberate policy in England have been pointing more and more decidedly to the transfer of the railways to the State, the Irish Companies have been judiciously cooling down the ardour with which they at first sought absorption into the State. They seem, if the bull may be pardoned, very willing to be unwilling sellers, but that is all; and each successive meeting on the subject has exhibited the railway world as more and more conspicuous by its absence. The Electric Telegraph Companies last year successfully used the cry of confiscation as a means of obtaining for their property twice as much as it was worth in the market; and the prudent reticence of the Irish Directors at the present moment looks only too much like a prelude to a similar attempt. Of course they will get the best price they can, but there are many reasons why they cannot hope to enrich themselves out of the public purse on anything like the same scale as the Telegraph Companies. In the first place, the value of the property has been carefully investigated, and this with the most indulgent consideration for the Companies. In the next place, the English Government is not an eager purchaser, and chiefly desires to do something, if possible, out of kindly consideration to the Irish people. Moreover, it is certain that, if the Government effects the purchase with the object of reducing the fares to such an extent as largely to stimulate Irish enterprise, it will do so with the clear expectation of having to bear an annual loss for many years to come. Then, again, the amount to be dealt with is so much larger than the whole cost of the telegraphs that the same reckless generosity with public money becomes altogether impossible. In fact, with the able Report of the Commissioners before it, Parliament is certain not to sanction any scheme of purchase at a price materially in excess of the estimate which has been so carefully framed. All these considerations will too probably be overlooked by the Irish Companies, and it is not to be expected that their unnecessary staff of between three and four hundred Directors will do much to encourage a bargain which must put an end to their official existence, with its patronage and emoluments. We do not at all expect that the Irish Companies will consent to reasonable terms, and it is quite certain that Parliament will not listen to any unreasonable demands. Probably the treaty of purchase will fall through, as many treaties of purchase do, from excessive greed on the part of the sellers; and if it should do so, the great losers will be, first, Irish shareholders, and secondly, the whole Irish people.

But, though we are not sanguine as to any practical result from it, the last Report of the Irish Railway Commissioners has an independent interest of its own. In order to qualify themselves for predicting with reasonable accuracy the consequences of a large reduction in the Irish tariff, they informed themselves minutely of the working of a similar policy in Belgium, and have given, in an accessible and compendious form, the history of railway management by the State in that country. The mileage worked by the State itself is less than one-third of the whole system of Belgian railways; and notwithstanding the extremely low tariff on the Government lines, the old Companies do not become bankrupt, and, what is perhaps more surprising, new lines are continually projected and formed. It was one of the first objections started to the proposal of a purchase by the British Government, that railway extension would be at an end, and that the competition of the State would ruin all the Companies that endeavoured to maintain an independent existence. Both these fears are proved by the experience of Belgium to be groundless; and a third fallacy is demolished with equal effect. It is commonly assumed that Government management must be more costly than Company management, and cannot result in profit when carried on side by side with what is called private enterprise. Like most other errors of the kind, this notion derives itself from an undoubted truth. Personal management by actual owners is always more prosperous than delegated management by hired officials; but the mistake is to suppose that the action of a Board of Railway Directors has anything in common with the personal supervision of two or three partners in a firm. Railway Directors are worse paid and more negligent than the least effective of public servants, and exhibit, as a rule, the most flagrant vices of officialism without having the strong support which the officers of a Government derive from their public position. Probably, taking good Companies and bad Companies together, the average management is, upon the whole, the very worst that any system either of public or private organization has produced, and the experience of Belgium strongly confirms this view. The Government lines under the Department of Works are confessedly conducted more liberally to the public than any private enterprise ever has been, and yet they have proved a great financial success. Until 1856 the Belgian authorities worked their lines on the same timid principles which have done so much harm in England, and so much more harm in Ireland; and during all that time the net revenue showed considerable fluctuations, with at last an alarming tendency to disappear altogether. In 1856, an enormous reduction was made in the goods tariff, especially for long distances, and in nine years the profits had steadily risen from their lowest point, 67,000*l.*, at the commencement of the experiment, to 344,000*l.* Quite recently the passenger fares have also been largely reduced, and, as was expected, the revenue at first fell off considerably, but there is not much reason to doubt that the policy which prospered so well in the conduct of the goods traffic will be equally successful when applied to the passenger business. Except so far as it establishes these general principles, the Belgian case is not at all parallel to that of Ireland, as the Commissioners are careful to point out in their Report. Belgium has important iron and coal industries, which are scarcely to be found in Ireland, and though the cattle trade of Ireland will feel the stimulus of any reduction of tariff as readily as it was felt in Belgium itself by ironmasters and coalowners, it is not to be expected that revenues will increase with the same marvellous rapidity exhibited by the Belgian returns. But after weighing all these considerations, and bringing to bear upon the subject their own extensive experience in the working of railways, the Commissioners do not hesitate to recommend reductions varying from 30 to 45 per cent. in passenger fares, and from 30 to 78 per cent. in the cattle and goods tariff. The immediate loss of revenue from measures so bold as these must necessarily be great, and is estimated to amount to upwards of 500,000*l.*; but the same calculation gives the cheering result that after a few years the balance will begin to turn, and that a period of about twelve years will suffice to recoup all previous losses, and leave the railways (if purchased at the Commissioners' estimate) in the hands of the Government as a concern returning a profit of 50,000*l.* a year over and above all working expenses and the interest on the money invested. These, it is true, are estimates only, but they are the estimates of men who have investigated the problem with the minutest care, and who have more knowledge and experience of railway management than almost any others who could have been selected.

Such are among the benefits which might be expected to flow from the purchase of the Irish railways; but mere money profit to the State is a bagatelle compared with the stimulus to Irish industry and civilization which new facilities of transit would give. The prospect is so charming that it tempts one to forget that the Companies are almost certain to reject any offer which the Government is likely to make or Parliament to sanction. If they are wise and moderate, the shareholders will close with a bargain largely beneficial to themselves and their country; but we fear it is too much to assume that shareholders in Ireland will show a wisdom and moderation which shareholders as a body do not often exhibit in any country in the world.

AMERICA.

THE American Congress employed itself during its short Session before the Christmas recess chiefly in considering proposals for increasing the tariff; but one Bill was introduced into the Senate which raises an important political issue. It is proposed to repeal the Act by which Georgia was re-admitted into the Union, and to remit the State once more to the provisional condition of Virginia and Texas. When nearly all the Southern States were in the course of the last year restored to the right of representation in Congress, and to the management of their internal affairs, it was provided in their respective Constitutions that the suffrage should be impartially granted without reference to colour; and the Republican majority in the Federal Legislature understood that all political distinctions founded on race were at the same time virtually abolished. At the subsequent elections the negroes were in some districts prevented, by violence or intimidation, from voting; but for the most part their nominal claim to political equality was not openly disputed. The Legislature of Georgia alone, affecting to rely on the old law of the State, refused to admit the coloured members who had been returned by some of the constituencies; and Congress is now considering the best method of punishing or overruling the contumacy of the State. The disfranchising Bill will probably be passed over the inevitable veto of the PRESIDENT, and one of the reconstruction processes will have to be recommenced. It is not the business of foreigners to inquire minutely into the constitutional merits of the dispute. The white inhabitants of Georgia are probably provided with some legal argument in vindication of their proceedings; but, on the other hand, it is evident that the policy of Congress has been effectually thwarted. The general interest of the dispute is derived from the illustration which it affords of the enormous difficulty of closing a revolution. The American Conservatives who contended, at the close of the war, that the Confederate States had never been out of the Union, were met by the forcible argument that technical formulas were inapplicable to great national convulsions. Dominions recovered by force after a desperate struggle were supposed to be at the disposal of conquerors; and Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS and other fanatical partisans reproduced the theory which Prince SCHWARTZENBERG had applied to Hungary, that the so-called rebels had forfeited all rights whatever, and had blotted out their previous history. The Reconstruction Acts involved a compromise between the extreme doctrines. While Congress assumed the right to dictate the terms of readmission, the States, by complying with the prescribed conditions, acquired once for all the right of returning as equal and sovereign members of the Federal Union. The dominant party in Congress had taken all possible precautions to ensure the election of Republican members for the reconstructed States, and thus far they have not, on the whole, been disappointed by the result; but, whatever might be the working of the new State Constitutions, it might have been supposed that reconstruction was in its nature final. The Bill for severing Georgia once more from the Union implies the absolute supremacy of Congress over the several States, and over the Federal bond by which they are united; and yet it appears to have excited little surprise. Perhaps the measure may be necessary and expedient; but, if a State can be detached from the Union by an Act of Congress, the Constitution has ceased to be operative.

If Mr. GLADSTONE's acuteness had not been temporarily diminished by an excess of humility, his submissive apologies to an American correspondent who has lately published his letter might have been supported by a reference to the difficulties of reconstruction. Perhaps he is right in saying that arrogance and self-confidence, peculiarities unknown to America, are among the national faults of Englishmen; and yet it is hard on a well-meaning community that its foremost statesman should gratuitously undertake the task of publicly confessing its sins. The Fragment of Autobiography, though it was only a personal act of penance, was not favourably received by Mr. GLADSTONE's admirers; and vicarious or representative remorse is still more provoking. It may possibly be true that American criticisms and abuse "ought to help every Englishman individually who is called upon to discharge public duties to "discharge them, with the help of the ALMIGHTY, to the "best of his feeble powers"; but there are so many excellent reasons for doing right in public as in private, that the URIAH HEEP class of motives may perhaps as well be left in obscurity. In his anxiety to avoid arrogance and self-confidence, Mr. GLADSTONE does less than justice to the more material part of his own defence against his critic. His real and venial error consisted in giving premature and unnecessary expression to an opinion which prevailed widely at the time, both in England and in America. Mr. GLADSTONE thought that the Confederate States had finally established their independence; but, as a Cabinet Minister, he might conveniently have avoided a public statement of his belief. His sympathies were, as he declares, with the whole American people, and he perhaps still fails to understand why one-third of the entire community should have been excluded from sharing in his good-will. Mr. GLADSTONE will not have to complain of any want of that encouragement in the beneficent exercise of his "feeble powers" which can be supplied by vigorous American comments on the shortcomings of England. Mr. LOWELL, in his late article in the Atlantic Monthly, kindly approves of a "first-rate Englishman," while he declares a second-rate, and of course a third-rate or tenth-rate, Englishman to be entirely intolerable. The condemnation of the vast majority of his countrymen will not directly affect Mr. GLADSTONE, who is certainly a first-rate Englishman; but many of his inferiors have public duties to discharge to the best of their still feebler powers.

Mistaken anticipations of the results of a war can only be avoided by a judicious abstinence from all conjecture. The calculations of soldiers as well as of civilians are constantly falsified by military events; nor was the American contest any exception to the rule. A fairer test of foresight is furnished by more or less accurate appreciation of the necessary sequence of political causes and effects. Probably Mr. GLADSTONE, although remorseful modesty now prevents him from vindicating his own sagacity, may have judged that the Union of the American States rested on the free consent of the members of the Federation; and he may have also perceived that voluntary co-operation could not be a subject-matter of conquest. The Southern States were beaten, but they were so little conciliated by defeat that the victors have tried the novel experiment of admitting the negroes to full political rights. No such arrangement was contemplated as possible for several years after the date of the speech for which Mr. GLADSTONE has done penance. Impartial suffrage may perhaps succeed, in spite of antecedent probability, but no American statesman could have imagined in 1862 or 1863 that Congress would a few years afterwards meditate the expulsion of a State from the Union as a penalty for refusing to admit coloured members to the local Legislature. That reconstruction in some form will be sooner or later accomplished is perfectly certain. The question of secession has been finally settled by the war, nor will the South at any time recommence a hopeless rebellion. Isolated disturbances or outrages in Tennessee or Texas will be repressed when they assume a formidable character; and in the meantime they can scarcely be supposed to endanger the general peace. The Federal Government has nothing worse to apprehend than the existence of a disaffected minority, separated from the North by a geographical line, and from the coloured population by ineffaceable distinctions. This was the community which Mr. GLADSTONE, sharing a common misapprehension, once described as a nation; and although it has been reunited to the mass from which it had detached itself, it has not been assimilated or absorbed. Some American politicians hold the opinion that the military administration which has been lately withdrawn was better suited to the condition of the South than a nominally independent Government. For the time there can be little doubt that the general officers, who for the most part exercised their functions with firmness and moderation, were more impartial, and perhaps more efficient, rulers than the nominees of either party. The fundamental objection to military government is its essentially barren character; for as soon as the provisional system is removed, the organization of more permanent institutions has to begin from the beginning. It is not improbable that Georgia will be better governed by a major-general, with two or three regiments at his disposal, than by an elected Governor and Legislature; but at some future time reconstruction must be again attempted, and the ingenuity of the white population will be once more employed in baffling the Republican policy. The extraordinary difficulty of the problems which await a practical solution furnishes the best apology for failure or for deferred success. It is impossible that foreigners should be prevented from discussing some of the most curious and important questions which have ever been raised in current history. Mr. GLADSTONE's self-imposed sackcloth and ashes ought perhaps to serve as a warning against dogmatism; but, notwithstanding the sensitiveness of Mr. LOWELL and his countrymen, there are graver crimes than the utterance of a sincere and probable judgment on passing events.

M. MAGNE'S FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

FRENCH Budgets run perpetually through regular cycles. There are the budgets of alarm, when extra military expenditure is supposed to excuse more than ordinary deficits. There are the budgets of tranquillity, not indeed balanced, but promising the most surprising future if only the hopes of peace should be sustained. The most marked distinction, however, is between the budgets of the eve—the eve of a loan, that is to say—and the budgets of the morrow. M. MAGNE has just produced a budget of the last class. Less than a year ago the French Government borrowed upwards of 17,000,000*l.*, and M. MAGNE, before revelling in the luxury of appropriating this little windfall in addition to his ordinary resources, proceeds gravely to explain how very proper a thing a loan is, and to what admirable purposes the Government and the Chamber have devoted this particular 17,000,000*l*. Political events in 1867 had augmented the floating debt. Armaments could not be allowed to remain below the standard of science and the attainments of other countries. Commerce needed an acceleration of public works. Such are the reasons assigned for the pressure which led to the loan. That a recourse to credit was the true way to meet the difficulty, M. MAGNE establishes with equal facility. Budgets must not be exposed to excessive sacrifices (Frenchmen always talk of budgets as if they were live animals), and there is nothing gained by adjourning the decisive remedy of a loan.

Probably this reasoning is entirely satisfactory to M. MAGNE's master, whatever it may be to the Finance Minister himself, and it is followed by the pleasanter task of enumerating the good things to be got out of the loan. The deficit of 1867 was intended to swallow up 7,300,000*l*. of the amount, and M. MAGNE rejoices greatly to say that 7,000,000*l*. will suffice, and has the honour to propose to HIS MAJESTY that the odd 300,000*l*., which he oddly enough calls a surplus, instead of going towards the further reduction of the floating debt, shall be poured straightway into the ever open gulf of Public Works. The last year's deficit had been met by the issue of Treasury bonds which raised the floating debt to 36,000,000*l*., and M. MAGNE starts on his budgets for future years with this burden reduced to something less than 30,000,000*l*. Still, after this operation, there remained the handsome sum of 10,000,000*l*. of borrowed money to dispose of. Rather more than half of this is devoted to breechloaders for the army, nearly half a million goes to naval armaments, and the rest—more than 3,000,000*l*.—to the inevitable Public Works.

Having thus easily taken the sting out of the demands for warlike and peaceful purposes, M. MAGNE has little difficulty in making the next two budgets balance, at least on paper. That for 1868 stands exactly balanced, less a trifling extra charge, below 300,000*l*., for expenses connected with the loan. The increase of productiveness in the taxes is expected to cover this and more, and the balance is destined to Public Works. The provision made for 1869 and 1870 is not less satisfactory in appearance, and, coming so immediately after the loan, it is probable that the anticipations indulged may be more nearly realized than is usually the case with the budgets of the Empire. M. MAGNE assures the EMPEROR that he has calculated the future with all sobriety. In framing the Estimates for 1869 he has worked upon the basis, not of the original budget of the previous year, but of that budget after it had been duly rectified and supplemented, and with unusual moderation he has abstained from taking credit for the presumed increase in the proceeds of the taxes. This is so unusual a course in France, that for once the hopes which the Finance Minister expresses of a favourable result may be regarded as something more solid than the phrases by which France delights to be flattered.

The year 1870 is far enough off to excuse a considerable amount of error in the preliminary estimate, but M. MAGNE seems fairly to have faced the obligations before him, and has not concealed the fact that in that year he must provide for some further increase in expenditure. He quotes indeed the maxim of TURGOT against exceeding the national income, and pronounces it eternally wise and true; but in the same breath he propounds the undeniable truth that it is impossible for any country to keep its expenditure within fixed limits. In all countries public expenditure increases with the growth of population and the advance of civilization; or, as M. MAGNE puts it after the manner of his nation, no Government can escape the law of progress, for to do so it must contend with the irresistible force of events. All this is very sound philosophy no doubt, but M. MAGNE's application of it is remarkable. The inference he draws is, that the devouring monster which in France they call Public Works is too strong for any Minister to deal with, except by supplying its demands with continually increasing donations of public money. The Restoration, he says, the Government of July, and the Republic, did this no less than the Second Empire, and the statement is undoubtedly true; and yet, if there were not an imperious necessity behind, to the nature of which M. MAGNE in no way alludes, one would suppose that if any part of the Government outlay were strictly optional and within control, it must be the money spent on improvements, many of which are designed more for the benefit of those who make than of those who use them. But M. MAGNE tells us that it is the irresistible force of events that pulls down houses and builds palaces, and employs countless labourers in the construction of roads and bridges, and a multitude of other luxuries, of undeniable value, if only they do not cost more than they are worth. After such a prelude, it must be quite reassuring to timid Frenchmen to find that the expenditure, ordinary and extraordinary, of 1870 is set down at less than 70,000,000*l*., which is only about half a million beyond the estimate for 1869, and nearly 7,000,000*l*. below the outlay of 1868. If these figures should be justified by the event, M. MAGNE will be entitled to the credit of economical management, notwithstanding his exalted ideas of the necessity of public works, and his plausible arguments in favour of raising loans even in time of peace. Oddly enough, the statement which begins with the loan ends with the sinking fund. In defiance of the settled conclusions of political economy on the subject (which it is only fair to say Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. DISRAELI have concurred in disregarding), Frenchmen retain a marvellously persistent faith in a sinking fund. This very year, while borrowing with one hand, they profess to be redeeming debt with the other; but the contrast between the figures is as striking as between FALSTAFF's sack and his bread. The funded debt is increased, we are told, by a loan of 17,000,000*l*. The sinking fund, after many years of existence, is making such progress that in 1870 it will have a free surplus for investment in the redemption of debt of about a million and a quarter. An operation on this scale may be pardoned by the severest doctrinaire, however difficult it may be to reconcile it to scientific views.

M. MAGNE concludes his statement with the usual complimentary references to commercial progress. It is probable that the revival from the long period of stagnation has been more marked in France than in England. It certainly must have been so to justify even the mitigated satisfaction with which the Minister regards it. He deplores the alternations of confidence and depression which have distinguished the past year, and persuades himself that public opinion is learning to judge political circumstances more soundly. It may be so, but it would be a great relief to France and the world if the EMPEROR would provide his subjects and the world at large with fewer political circumstances on which to pass fallible judgments. But on the symptoms of the day M. MAGNE speaks with a confidence which is very reassuring. He sees a sensible resumption of activity shown in commercial matters by the position of the credit establishments, progress in the general well-being of the people manifested by the increase of the taxes on consumption, and an advance in wealth established by the improving prices of all securities. Something, but very little, of the same kind may be traced in this country; and if a slow recovery is likely to be lasting in proportion, it ought to be long indeed before the next time of panic comes round to us. In these days progress in one country means progress in all, and we trust that M. MAGNE's picture is not too highly coloured, and that the revival he speaks of has fairly commenced. It proves, as he observes, the necessity of peace and the abundant gratitude due to an EMPEROR who, by friendly intervention, lays so far as in him lies the quarrels which might disturb it. If to such friendly intervention the French EMPEROR would only add on occasion the virtue of non-intervention, M. MAGNE would have additional reason for contemplating the future with the cheerful, but chastened, serenity which he either feels or affects. Altogether he may be congratulated on the present occasion on having made triumphant progress on a road from which the recent loan had removed all obstacles.

ETHICAL SHORTSIGHT.

THE uncommonness of common sense is an old subject of reflection which must have not unfrequently occurred to those who, during the late elections, were driven, either by the course of duty or by a morbid curiosity, to hear or read the speeches, autobiographical chapters, and other manifestoes of certain leaders of that party to which Mr. Mill once arrogated the monopoly of intelligence. To some people it may appear to be a contradiction in terms to speak of common sense as uncommon. But there must be many who will find it easier to digest the paradox than to deny the fact. What may be the true solution of the apparent paradox we need not here discuss. Perhaps the term "common sense" is, in its present ordinary signification, a misnomer. Perhaps it ought to have been kept strictly confined in vulgar usage, as it still is in metaphysics, to that province to which its etymology and the history of philosophy assign it, and ought never to have been applied to that felicitous combination of prudence, tact, judgment, discretion, and other practical virtues which we commonly call "common sense." It may be that "common sense," in this employment of the term, has always been uncommon, and that those who thought otherwise were deluded optimists. Or perhaps it may be that common sense was once more common than it now is, especially among politicians, and that there is something in the nature of transcendental Liberalism which tends to render its use unnecessary, and thus gradually, by a well-known natural operation, to cause it to decay and die away. Mr. Lewes, writing on Berkeley's philosophy, very properly remarks, that "the first step which a philosopher takes in any inquiry is a departure from common sense." Would it be an unpardonable play upon the double—that is, the philosophical and vulgar—usage of the term "common sense," if we were to say that, since the Liberal party began to swear allegiance to the philosophers, it has likewise shown signs of taking the philosophical step of "departing from common sense"? There does at any rate seem to be some ground for supposing that, if one consummate tactician has been able to educate the Conservatives up to the mark of swallowing their principles, certain moonrakers on the other side are trying both by example and precept to teach their friends to fly through political space without the ballast of common sense. Whether, however, the term "common sense" is a misnomer or not, we all very well know what we mean by it. And the quality is so absolutely essential to success in life, that it may not be out of place to note how the want of it in some instances appears to work.

Want of common sense is principally shown in two respects—namely, in undue neglect of particulars, and in false estimates of particulars. The first is the amiable weakness of dreamers—of poets, philosophers, and others who live in the kingdom of ideas; who think that it rains legs of mutton at regular intervals, that with so much bread and butter about it must be impossible to starve, and that if there should ever be a deficiency of bread it will be no great hardship to fall back upon toast. The features of this phase are too broad and too well known to require comment. But the other phase, where want of common sense is shown in a false appreciation of particulars, is more subtle and more interesting. It depends upon a condition or habit of mind entirely different from that which occasions the first-named phase. It often originates in perfectly contrary ethical circumstances. For whereas the former arises from a dreamy or generalizing ethical habit, and shows itself in undue neglect or contempt of particulars, this latter arises more frequently from a too microscopic or particularizing habit, and shows itself in an inability to ponderate or classify particulars. The habit is not one of overlooking particulars, or of hasty generalization; it is not the dreamy imaginative disposition which renders its possessor liable to castle-building or Quixotism. It is not the habit which would cause a man to talk of Lancashire as if it were the new Atlantis, or of Birmingham as Utopia, or which would induce him to start off on a voyage over an unknown sea in search of an earthly paradise. On the contrary, it is a habit which, originating perhaps in a want of fancy or of humour, is fostered and magnified by an overstudy of particulars, until the student's ethical vision has become almost incapable of distinguishing the value of one particular from that of another, and quite incapable of appreciating their proper bearing upon the universal. It is the mental or moral condition analogous to that physical defect which (as Mr. Kinglake would say) men call short sight. It is a too great convexity of the cornea of the soul, causing the beholder to see details, when he looks closely at them, with almost microscopic acuteness, but preventing him from studying them at such a distance as to get the proper light and shade upon them, and so robbing them of all their true and natural tone and colour, and quite disabling him from seeing what part they bear towards forming the general harmony of the whole. It is in fact a kind of ethical shortsight.

The effects or operations of ethical shortsight may of course be traced in each of the two great border domains wherewith ethical science is concerned—the domain of thought and the domain of action; and though it would be absurd to attempt, within the limits of such a paper as the present, to describe all those effects or operations, yet a few hints may be suggestive. In the domain of thought we are struck by the obvious fact that this shortsight is the besetting defect of statisticians. It is the weakness of the social student who rests more on the number than on the kind of his instances, and is apt to ignore their relation to the general theory which should preside over his investigation. Lord Macaulay, in his celebrated criticism of Bacon's Method, seems—if we may judge from the application he makes of the story of the judge "who was in the habit of jocosely propounding after dinner a theory, that the cause of the prevalence of Jacobinism was the practice of bearing three names"—to have supposed that the value of any induction depended on the number, and not upon the kind, of instances collected; and a similar error is frequently committed by the professed statistician, and is partly at least the result of ethical shortsight. When once such a person comes to be employed on any public work, such as an educational or other social inquiry, he is overwhelmed by the minuteness and diversity of his materials; he is quite unable to sift the evidence which pours in upon him; and, unless in the course of fate he becomes the prey of some fanatic, or the useful tool of some master mind, he is hopelessly lost in his Cretan Labyrinth of details. In the domain of thought, the tendency of all laborious and scrupulous à posteriorists is in the direction of ethical shortsight. They are like tourists who are trying to work their way across an overgrown country, or a country with much sameness of feature, without having first climbed a height in order to take a general survey of it; or rather, perhaps, they are men who did climb the height, but who, owing to their shortsight, were unable to make any use of their position, and so set to work to grapple with the details of their task unprovided with any mental map.

In the two great provinces of the ethical domain of action—namely, politics and morals—we find this defect of the ethical vision operating in a mode closely analogous to that in which it works within the domain of thought. Here also its effects are shown in an inability rightly to regard, and judiciously to manipulate, particulars. It is, both in morals and politics, an incapacity for duly apprehending what Aristotle calls the minor premiss of the Practical Syllogism. And it is the exercise of this tact for apprehending the minor premiss, so as to know when and how to apply it to the major, which the marvellously practical genius of Aristotle declared to be the very essence of common sense or of social wisdom. False estimates of particulars are, both in politics and in morals, mostly due to ethical shortsight; but of course, as the matter on which the wisdom of politics works is somewhat different from that on which the wisdom of morals works, the results of such false estimates differ in their social importance. Shortsight in politics affects the collective happiness of mankind much more than shortsight in morals. The shortsighted politician is a pest to his country; the shortsighted moralist is a curse to himself. It is only when such a moralist turns legislator or agitator, and therefore drops the guise of moralist for that of politician, that he becomes dangerous to the peace of others as well as to his own, and illustrates the wisdom of Dr. Johnson's observation, adopted and amplified by Mr. Buckle, that there is no greater social nuisance than your wrongheaded conscientious man. Such a man, if he comes into power, turns the affairs of his country—which previously were in a condition, if not of perfection, at least of order and decency—into the cauldron, and makes of them what Punch once represented Lord Palmerston as calling "a pretty kettle of fish."

No politician was ever probably more entirely free from the defect of ethical shortsight than the late leader of the Liberal party in the House of Commons. Thoroughly practical, perfectly well acquainted with the details of his art, and eminently skilled in the manipulation of these details; knowing, like a good painter, when to water his brush so as to keep the colour down, and when again to lay it on thick; ready and able, moreover, at any moment to stand off from his work and form a cool opinion of its general effect—he managed matters, if not always to the satisfaction of Beales, Bradlaugh, Finlen, and Co., if not always to the satisfaction of the philosophers and their protégés, of the young Oxford fanatics or of the emancipated ladies, at least in such a way as to make our progress sure, and save us from the dread of a violent reaction. Whatever may have been his defects, we cannot reckon among them this of ethical shortsight. He was possessed of a keen mental vision, which enabled him to master as well as to study particulars, and prevented his mistaking molehills for mountains. But his mantle of common sense does not seem to have fallen upon any hitherto acknowledged leader of the Liberal party. The party has gained a leader immensely superior to Lord Palmerston in volubility, in the profusion of profession, in self-assertion, in excitability, and in grim earnestness; and yet how is it that practical, moderate politicians, men who persist in clinging to a belief in the necessity of common sense, and think ethical shortsight highly dangerous in a leader, begin to turn to Mr. Bright with something like a sense of relief? It is said that a certain people, famous for their high-stepping horses, trained them to this lofty action by fixing magnifying glasses over their eyes, so that obstacles on the ground of very small diameter seemed to the poor animals to have a diameter of several inches, and thus caused them to acquire the habit of lifting their feet to a practically unnecessary height. When next the heaven-born leader of the Liberal party favours us with a chapter of his Autobiography, perhaps he will inform us whether it is from an analogous process in his early training, or from the natural defect of ethical shortsight, that he has acquired his celebrated high-stepping action.

In the province of morals, this defect of shortsight is far less dangerous to the peace of society than in that of politics; but it is productive of the greatest discomfort and torture to the person afflicted with it. The morally shortsighted person is one who, either never having studied, or being incapable of apprehending, the principles to which the particulars of right and wrong doing are ultimately referable, does not discriminate the relative importance of those particulars. When such a defect is combined with a vivid imagination and a sensitive conscience, the result is a morbid moral temperament which is most painful to the sufferer. It is much more common among women than among men, partly because within certain limits their imagination is more lively than that of men, and their conscience, owing to their domestic education, is more sensitive; but partly also because they are particularly liable to the defect of ethical shortsight. Not having been soundly trained in the logic of casuistry, or in any other ratiocinative science, they are of course entirely ignorant of the reasons or principles which determine the quality of particular moral actions, and give them their relative value, their tone, and proper harmony of colour. They have been taught to refer the value of every particular action directly to some immediate sanction, or absolute authority, such as the text of the Bible, or the verdict of the parish parson; and they are naturally unable to discriminate for themselves what are and what are not important instances among the legion of particulars. The more, however, that they dwell upon such particulars, the more contracted and enfeebled does their moral vision become; until at last they are forced in their despair to fly for rescue from the monstrous shapes and portentous consequences which surround them, to some spiritual guide who is probably as profoundly innocent of any acquaintance with the science of casuistry as themselves, but who, with true English pluck, is ever ready at a moment's notice to discharge the functions of a blind leader of the blind. So long as women, or those who in their ethical constitution so closely resemble women, retain in this country their present influence in determining what is and what is not sound and valuable theology, it may pay a judicious aspirant to the highest ecclesiastical honours to write a treatise upon "the sinfulness of little sins"; but the topic is not one which is likely much to engage any but feminine, or effeminate, minds. Meantime it is refreshing to recall the story of the little child who, when asked by its father, "What are all these complaints that I hear of you, my child? What naughty things have you been doing now?" answered, "O papa, nothing that you would think much of; only nursery naughtinesses!" That child, at any rate, was not afflicted with ethical short-sight.

CHARITY AND PAUPERISM.

THERE is something depressing about the numerous discussions which have recently taken place in regard to the growth of pauperism. They prove indeed—what is, so far, gratifying—that people are beginning to appreciate the magnitude of the problem before them; but they prove also how much remains to be done before we can expect to see the present chaos of charitable institutions reduced to anything like order. It seems that the whole discussion is destined to run through the course which has been that of so many similar debates. Some startling scandal excites public attention; we make a vigorous descent upon the apparently guilty person, sweep some obnoxious arrangement out of the way, and fancy that we have put the whole affair to rights. Presently the scandal breaks out afresh; it seems that we have only suppressed a particular symptom instead of curing the disease. One set of persons cries out for a raid or two more against the existing abuses; another set avers that all we have done has been useless, and that we had better go back to the old order of things; and a whole crowd of wise men and fools, of quacks and genuine physicians, starts up, each with his own pet nostrum, and we are fairly bewildered and deafened with the resulting controversy. Some such process is perhaps a necessary incident of human progress; mankind gets on, it is said, by stumbling first to the right and then to the left, and only discovers truth by a series of gross blunders. We could wish at least that the process may be shortened as much as possible, and we should like to be certain that each stumble lands us a little further in advance. It will be pleasant when from all the hubbub of Social Science Associations, and societies for the suppression of misery, vice, and disease, there arises some dim outline of a scheme which we may join in supporting with a tolerable certainty that we are doing more harm than good.

At present it would appear that this moderate demand is very imperfectly satisfied. Experienced people tell us with great confidence that the seven or more millions sterling which are annually spent in London create more poverty than they destroy. Nor is there anything surprising in the assertion; it is only what political economists have been preaching for years. Everybody has heard of the country parishes that have been hopelessly demoralized by the benefactions of amiable fools. To give a man money for doing nothing is to do an injury to his self-respect; and the desire of independence is that which is perhaps most strongly cherished by every one who calls himself a gentleman. This is nothing but the merest commonplace; and there is therefore nothing strange in the fact that seven millions of money, flung away for the most part at random, to be scrambled for by the most impudent and improvident, should encourage improvidence and impudence on a gigantic scale. A large part of the money is spent, unintentionally, but as directly as if the intention were fully formed, in providing premiums for idleness and cheating. And then, say the political economists, we wonder that paupers abound! This is very true; but it is not the less difficult to reconcile the general principle to our individual feelings. We really can't quite button up our pockets, invest our spare cash as prudently as may be, and say to the poor man, "Starve, for it serves you right." There are contrasts in the streets that are rather unpleasant to contemplate. For example, we see in a shop-window French pears at we know not how many guineas a dozen, and on the other side of the pavement is a living heap of rags, filth and dirt, representing so much explosive social material. Is it not as well to give him a superfluous copper or two, by way of a propitiatory offering, just to prove that if we are luxurious and he is starving, we have at any rate a certain amount of compassion? If a pauper cannot but envy us, it is desirable that he should hate us as little as possible. And then one has the constant argument to combat that, in any particular case, we may be doing more good than harm. It seems so horrible to allow one honest man to starve that we would avert the possibility, even if there are ten chances to one that we are paying tribute to an impostor. The stern political economist may say, it is better that a certain number of people should starve. Repeal the poor-laws and shut up all the fountains of charity; there would be intense misery for a time; the classes who would be proved unworthy to survive the struggle for existence would perish or mend their ways; and we should start fair with a well-to-do population. In short, Bishop Haddo's expedient for relieving his estates was right in spirit, though he perhaps deserved his fate at the teeth of the rats for carrying it out with superfluous energy. The reasons for not adopting this doctrine are tolerably obvious. In the first place, we have not the requisite strength of mind. In the next place, it would not necessarily or probably answer; if all kinds of charity, legal and voluntary, were stopped ever so completely there might still be an idle and improvident class, hanging on to the fringes of society, supporting themselves by plunder and occasional work, or some mysterious system of sponging upon their neighbours. Moreover, a total refusal of sympathy might make, of what is now a serious embarrassment, a great social danger. However desirable hardheartedness may be, we cannot afford just yet to adopt it as a cardinal virtue. Some better compromise must be found between the rigid teaching of economists and the gushing benevolence of popular teachers.

Our present compromise, indeed, seems to give little satisfaction. We say that nobody shall starve, in deference to the benevolent; and from our respect to political economists we agree that they shall come as near starving as possible. This often comes to saying, we will give help, but we will take care that it does no permanent good. We will keep the poor just above the brink of starvation, until they have lost their spirit of independence; and, that we may be sure not to be over liberal, we won't help them enough to put them beyond the need of help. As all assistance is to be reduced to a minimum, the vagabond will be content to live upon our support, and the man who wishes to be independent shall be reduced to the same level. And we thus increase the weight of distress which is constantly tending to drag down those who have hitherto kept their heads above water. A year or two ago we had an explosion of disgust at some of the results of the system, and insisted upon a more liberal expenditure, which should at least cause efficient help to be given to the sick poor. It seems that the result has been to cause a general rebellion of the London parishes. They protest against the heavy burden which is being imposed upon them by the Poor-law Board, and declare—not without some apparent sense—that its extravagance will be as pernicious as the cheese-paring policy of the local authorities. How are the differences to be reconciled, and the force of private and public charity to be turned to account, without, as at present, defeating its own object?

Some persons would apparently reply by looking for a remedy to emigration. However desirable this may be as a temporary measure, it would seem to be virtually giving up the problem as insoluble. It would amount to saying, as we cannot possibly manage the poor, let us get rid of them altogether. Pack every man, woman, and child of them off to Canada, or the United States, or Brazil, or Australia, and don't let us be bothered with them any more. This is all very well, but how long would the relief last? We have deported a good many Irishmen in the last twenty years; perhaps we should not wish to part with as many Englishmen. Yet we have not quite solved the Irish problem. Those who are left are doubtless better off on the whole, but they don't seem to be quite satisfied. The difficulty is, when we have produced the vacuum, and afforded the relief, to know how it will work. Will those who are left behind learn the virtues of prudence and industry; or will they proceed to fill up the void by increasing as fast as possible? It is said that the great increase of wealth during late years has been confined to the upper classes, and that the poor are as badly off as ever. Why is this, if it is so? Because, we must presume, the poor have taken advantage of increased wages by increasing their families instead of raising their standard of comfort; because, when more money has come to them, they have spent it in eating and drinking, or in marrying and giving in marriage, instead of spending it in the endeavour to be a little more beforehand with the world. The problem, it may be said, is dynamical instead of statical. We have not merely to remove a certain dead weight of poverty, but to make those who are left more capable of taking care of themselves. It becomes more evident, the more we look into the question of pauperism, that the task which lies before us really amounts to the civilization (whatever may be meant by that rather vague expression) of the lower classes of the population; and that any remedy which stops short of that is necessarily transitory and uncertain in its effects. If the class which now swells the ranks of pauperism could be made as intelligent and prudent as the class a few degrees higher, pauperism would disappear; if it is to remain what it is, we might give away twice as much as we do and only double the existing evils.

The machinery provided by the Poor-laws should be part of a harmonious system directed to raise the general tone of morality and intelligence of the pauperized classes. It should be a backbone, round which the various organizations of private charity might naturally group themselves. At present it is a distracted engine, working in the midst of a perfect chaos of discordant forces. Yet it surely should be possible to provide channels through which all the energy now running to waste might expend itself, without the danger of neutralizing its own action. The volunteers who assist the official army should have duties assigned to them in which they may act as useful allies, not as running counter to the whole plan of the campaign. Half the ladies in London who have nothing to do are laudably anxious to be indulged in what is pleasantly called "doing good," and which too often means distributing money and religious advice at random. They do indeed so much good as is implied in a fruitless exhibition of good feeling; and those who are sensible undoubtedly do more. But a very large proportion of the ladies and the clergy form an unconscious, though not the less effectual, association for the demoralization of the poor. To bring all this ill-regulated energy into order is doubtless a task of enormous difficulty—only less difficult, indeed, than that of bringing the energy into existence. But if a tolerable approximation could be made, the results would be worth any trouble. We might, to mention only a single case, find a satisfactory escape from that unpleasant dilemma of street charity. At present, if we meet a beggar, we are obliged to constitute ourselves into a committee of investigation and a relieving-officer, and to administer charity in the most objectionable form possible; or we escape this responsibility on the penalty of hardening our hearts, to say nothing of the bare possibility of neglecting genuine misery. If we give, we purchase a little relief to our conscience by an action of ambiguous merit; if we give nothing, we destroy to a certain extent our powers of sympathy. Now it is surely conceivable that there might be a sufficient number of relieving-officers to whom we might transfer our applicant with a reasonable confidence that his case would be properly investigated, and that he would be handed over to the workhouse, to some charitable institution, or to a house of correction, as the case might be. That even this dream should be realized, a certain co-operation between the different relieving bodies is obviously necessary, and we should need both that uniformity of principles which comes from central authority and that discrimination of individual cases which requires the more elastic regulation of private charity. At present a parish which takes a fit of virtue or economy simply drives the poor out of one district to pauperize the industrious classes in another; or a fixed rule is laid down by central authority which makes generosity impossible where it would be useful, and enforces relief only where it encourages idleness. Meanwhile, a whole crowd of institutions, animated by the best intentions, stimulated by the zeal of secretaries and the eloquence of the clergy, rush into the field and set to work without forethought or combination or common sense. We can only hope that, as the subject is being forced upon the attention of all intelligent men, order will be gradually evolved out of chaos.

THE CAMBRIDGE SCHEME OF EXAMINATION FOR WOMEN.

WE discussed a little time back a scheme for the Examination of Women put forth by the University of London. It was a scheme in whose favour, to put it mildly, we found very little to say. In fact, it would have been hardly possible to devise a scheme less suited to encourage real knowledge and intellectual exertion. That article, as our articles often do, has called forth a certain amount of hostile comment. A letter and a leading article in the Spectator have been hurled at us. Each of them is not a little amusing. The leading article begins by calling us and our remarks "rather foolish," "ignorant," "clever, but certainly also silly," "foolish" again, "curious," "unintelligent," and adds that we "indulge in very unmeaning and rather vulgar abuse." We congratulate the Spectator on the accurate care with which it weighs its adverbs; we only wish we had some means of judging of the force of its adjectives. For presently the writer changes his tone; our "drift" is said to be "sensible enough," and our "silliness" is now made to consist only "in the violence with which we assail the drift of a quite different conception." We suppose then, on the whole, that we must be something of the nature of an "Oxymoron," or perhaps that we should be entitled to rank among those students at some American Colleges who bear the title of "Sophomores." After this there is no particular abuse of us in the rest of the article. But it is perhaps worth notice that the Spectator pronounces "that ignorance of the simplest elements of science ought to be illiterateness in precisely the same sense in which bad grammar and interpolated h's are illiterate." We do not exactly know what "illiterateness" means, or how the Spectator proposes to make a thing illiterateness which is not illiterateness already. But certainly, if there be such a thing as illiterateness, its ideal seems to be pretty well realized by a writer whose notions of nouns of multitude allow him to say that "the London University have set out with a totally different idea."

We are bound however to say that the leading article, after the abuse of us at the beginning, goes on to discuss quietly enough the scheme of the London University, and to compare it with the scheme for the same object which has been since put forth by the University of Cambridge. This scheme the Spectator naturally supposes will be much more to our liking than the London one. As for the correspondent on whose letter the Spectator grounds its leading article—he signs himself "O." and dates from Lincoln's Inn—he seems to belong to the class of whom Sydney Smith said that they needed a surgical operation to get a joke into them. "O." is so absolutely incapable of fun that he does not see that such names as "cryptogam," "hypogynous," and "diandrous" are in their own nature subject to the tribute of a laugh, and he gravely talks about "the supposed indelicacy of teaching botany to girls." He talks elsewhere about our "ignoring the existence of elementary knowledge," whereas we specially insisted on the requirement of general elementary knowledge before going on to special.* What we did object to was making every girl, whether she has any turn for natural science or not, get up "the composition and resolution of statical forces." It still seems to us quite as unreasonable to do so as it would be to require every girl to know the details of the Julian legislation, or the exact relation between the Slavonic and Lithuanian languages. But we are not greatly afflicted by "O's." criticisms, seeing that he is "far from denying the cogency of the observations made" by us as to the utter impossibility of finding any place in the London scheme for an intelligent knowledge of either language or history. And in truth we cannot very greatly value either the good or the bad opinion of a writer who ends his letter with a sneer at "the new-born conception of an architectonic [what may that be?] 'science of language.'"

We now go on to examine the Cambridge scheme. And, as our censors in the Spectator suppose, we look on the scheme of the elder University as being in every way an improvement on the scheme put forth by the younger one. The Cambridge scheme is no doubt itself capable of improvement in several important respects. But the difference between it and the London scheme is simply infinite. The difference between the two schemes amounts in short to this, that we can conceive a girl of real thought and knowledge going in for the Cambridge Examination, an event which we cannot conceive happening in the case of the London scheme.

As we shall have to examine the Cambridge scheme pretty freely in detail, let us first put on record the two points in which it seems to us that its great superiority to the London scheme chiefly consists. First of all, the Cambridge scheme admits far more largely of alternative subjects. It does not compel every candidate to get up the incongruous mass of subjects which is forced upon her by the London scheme. Secondly, though the recognition of comparative and historical philology in the Cambridge scheme is somewhat hesitating and imperfect, it still is recognised, and some room is given for the display of proficiency in it. In the London scheme Comparative Philology was shut out altogether; no knowledge of languages was recognised but such as is purely empirical. These two points of difference seem to us just to make all the difference. The Cambridge scheme seems to us very faulty in some points of detail, but it is founded on a right principle. The London scheme was founded on a wrong principle—or rather on no principle at all.

The Cambridge scheme consists of six groups, A, B, C, D, E, F. Each candidate must pass in at least two, namely in A as a matter of necessity, and in one other—we suppose, in more than one other, if she chooses—selected according to her taste, from among the four, B, C, D, E. Group A thus occupies something like the position of the Literæ Humaniores at Oxford in relation to the other three schools. It is therefore of a more general and miscellaneous kind, while the other five are more special. B is a school of Language; C of Mathematics; D of Political Economy and Logic—perhaps designed specially for grateful admirers of Mr. Mill; E of Natural Science. Besides these, there is F, Music and Drawing, the position of which we do not quite understand, as "proficiency in these subjects will not entitle the candidate to a certificate of honour." This sounds, perhaps appropriately, something like the position of a Doctor of Music as compared with a Doctor of Divinity, Law, or Medicine.

The greater freedom of choice thus given is a vast improvement on the London scheme, which compelled every unfortunate candidate to take up, besides English and the other selected languages, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, and Botany. The Cambridge scheme allows a girl who has a real turn for one subject only to give her main attention to that subject, and not to be distracted from it by a forced study of other subjects, in which she is almost certain to break down. A certain amount of general knowledge (Group A) being presupposed, the candidate has a fairly wide choice among the special subjects in the other groups. Each of these contains several subjects, ranging in number from two to seven, of which one or two are required for a pass, and a larger number for a certificate of honour. This is evidently the right principle. But with some of the details we are by no means satisfied. We are not quite sure about the position and constitution of Group A. It includes "Religious Knowledge" (which is rendered optional by a sort of conscience clause), Arithmetic, English History (with Geography), English Language and Literature, and English Composition. The objection which we take to this arrangement is the isolation from all other history and all other languages to which it condemns the history and language of our own people. Now we feel, in all times and in all places, a craving for the company of our Dutch brethren, and indeed of our Aryan kinsfolk in general; and this craving the Cambridge scheme, no less than the London scheme, cruelly refuses to gratify. The mistake seems to us to consist in this, that the highest proficiency which the scheme recognises in English matters of any kind—"English in all its branches," as governesses say in their advertisements—is jumbled up with Arithmetic and "Religious Knowledge." We would rather, instead of Group A, have a very elementary examination, answering rather to a matriculation examination than to a degree examination of any kind. In such an examination we should require an elementary knowledge of many things, English and arithmetic among them, but the higher knowledge of English history and the English language we should keep for its natural place in close connexion with the history and the language of other countries. Here the scheme breaks down. Group B contains five languages, Latin, Greek, French, German, Italian. A knowledge of any one will gain the pass, while two are needed for honours. Now in this group the connexion between Latin and the Romance languages is most properly insisted on, and in the examinations in French and Italian papers are to be set illustrating the connexion between those languages and Latin. This is perhaps the best thing in the whole scheme; but we are greedy, and want something more of the same kind. We see no means for doing the same good turn to our own tongue and to the tongues of our nearest kinsfolk which is here done to the tongues of our Southern cousins. The means afforded for comparing English with Latin, Greek, German, and French, are very imperfect, because English is not admitted into the same group with Latin, Greek, German, and French. To be sure the writings of Professor Max Müller are recommended to group A as well as to group B, but we really do not see that they can be of much use to those who take up English all by itself and not in connexion with any of the cognate languages. It is a marked feature in the Cambridge, as distinguished from the London scheme, that Cambridge will give its pass, and even its honour certificate, to a candidate who knows no language but her own. With our notions of female education, and of the wide choice of subjects desirable, we do not so much complain of this. But we do complain that those who take up language as their special subject should have a needless hindrance thrown in their way by this strange cutting off of the English tongue from its natural position alongside of other tongues.

Another very strange thing is that the scheme seems to give no place at all to history of any kind, save only the history of England. Its only chance is in the Language group, where the candidates are to be examined in the matter of the Greek, Latin, German, French, and Italian books which they take up. If then they take up historical books, they will, in a certain indirect way, be examined in history. But surely history is deserving of a higher place in any rational scheme of examination than to be smuggled in, in this way, by a side-wind—a side-wind too which is most unlikely to blow anybody any good. For the choice of books recommended is decidedly against the introduction of any historical book whatever. Among the Greek, Latin, French, and Italian books which are recommended there is not a single history; among the German books we have indeed Schiller's Thirty Years' War; but that is literally all. In none of the three modern languages is the least scope given for mediæval study of any kind. One would have thought that one main object of learning Italian was to read Dante; but, strange to say, Dante is not among the books recommended. The French choice too does not go further back than Corneille. Yet, in a scheme where the connexion between Latin and French is distinctly recognised, one would have thought that an historical study of the language was suggested. We venture to think that, as exercises for the mind, and therefore as subjects for examination, Wace and Benoît, Villehardouin and Joinville, Froissart and Philip of Comines, are a good deal more to the purpose than Corneille, Molière, Châteaubriand, and Scribe.

The truth is that, except in a very faint way in the English school, mediæval subjects have been wholly kept out of sight. A girl who knows her Popes and Emperors and Republics has no chance of profiting by her knowledge. And, as a whole, the choice of books in the different groups is not a little wonderful. To be sure, we are told that the list of books recommended is not absolutely imperative; a candidate may, if she pleases, take up other books instead. But, if we know anything of human nature, the mass of the candidates will take up the books which are recommended. The recommendation has very much of the effect of a congé d'élire. And certainly the choice of books suggested is, to our taste, wonderfully narrow. As we asked in the London scheme for a wider choice of alternative subjects, so we ask in the Cambridge scheme for a wider choice of alternative books. In Latin there is positively nothing but six books of the Æneid and Cicero de Officiis. Why not some rather more solid food? Why is there nothing of Livy or Tacitus? why not Ovid's Fasti? why not some of the great historical speeches of Cicero? Indeed we should be inclined to say that, in a school which looks on Latin historically, in its relation to the Romance languages, some opening should be given for the mediæval, as well as for the classical speech. The Greek choice is a little wider. It takes in the Prometheus of Æschylus, the Alcestis of Euripides, Plato's Apologia, and Xenophon's Memorabilia. Here again is not a word of the historians or the orators. Now, if a girl learns Greek at all, why is she to be shut out from the matchless narrative of Herodotus and from the eternal treasures of wisdom preserved in the history of Thucydides and in the Politics of Aristotle? Why is she to be debarred from the Orations of Demosthenes and the pamphlets of Isocrates; nay, why should some silly notion about "good" and "bad" Greek cut her off from the charming biographies of Plutarch? Surely any of these books may be fairly taken as alternatives, and there is one book which should surely be imperative in every case. What, we would ask, is the year without its spring, and what is the Greek tongue without its Homer?

The group which includes English suffers especially, as far as English history is concerned, from the strange isolation to which everything English is doomed. Group A, the one necessary group, goes on the assumption that the candidates may possibly take up no language besides English. Any real study of English history down to the fifteenth century is thus shut out. There is no scope for any use of original authorities. For the original authorities are all in Latin, save only the Chronicles themselves, and the chances are against the authors of the scheme acknowledging the Chronicles as English. Of course it will be said that very few women read Florence of Worcester or Matthew Paris. This is perfectly true; but so do very few men. But some men and some women do read them, and we ask for a fair field for those of either sex who are not content to take everything at secondhand. Nay, even a translation—if anybody can find a decent translation — of an original writer, though a very poor substitute for the real article, is decidedly better than nothing. It is perfectly amazing to see the sort of scheme of English history which the Cambridge Syndicate proposes. The girls are sent to Palgrave—not to his last and unfinished work, great amid all its failings, but to his hasty little book of nearly forty years back on "the Anglo-Saxon period." This is bad enough, but worse is in store. From the ingenious crotchets of Sir Francis Palgrave, the candidate is promoted to the oracular blunders of Mr. C. H. Pearson, to learn to dream of Roman municipalities in England and to confuse the geography of Southern Gaul. Then comes Clifford's "Greatest of the Plantagenets," a work which is, in a certain sense, most creditable to its author, but which is as ill suited for a text-book as any book can be. One comfort alone there is. Cambridge at least abstains from recommending the writings of its own Regius Professor of Modern History. Later English history fares almost as oddly. Along with Massingberd's "History of the Reformation," a modern work with which we cannot boast of any acquaintance, are joined two original authorities which are oddly quoted as Clarendon's "History of his Own Time" and Burnet's "Memoirs." Do the Syndicate really think that Clarendon and Mr. Massingberd, a living clergyman, if we mistake not, to say nothing of the merits or defects of either, are writers of the same class?

On the whole, we say, as we said at starting, that the Cambridge scheme, though going on a far better principle than the London scheme, is still exceedingly faulty in detail. We wait to see whether Oxford will try her hand also, and, if so, what she will make of it.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONERSHIP OF POLICE.

THE hesitation which defers the appointment of the First Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police is regarded by the public with a feeling which is the reverse of disapprobation. The delay bears testimony both to the difficulty and to the necessity of making a good appointment; and the public will be contented to wait if the result is only proportioned to the expectations which have been formed. During the interval of suspense several names have been mentioned as those of likely and acceptable candidates. It would be invidious to quote them, especially as we consider a very small proportion of them to be unexceptionable. We may add, too, that it has struck us as very curious that many persons, while adducing the names of their favourite candidates, have overlooked disqualifications of the most striking kind. Indeed, very few seem to bear in mind the qualifications which are indispensably necessary for the execution of the office. On these it may be useful to dwell at some length while the Minister's choice is still undecided, and an appointment which must ultimately affect the well-being of the whole metropolis hovers in suspense.

The first and most essential conditions are those of health and strength. To place at the head of 8,000 men one who is not in the full possession of mental and bodily strength would be an absurdity and an insult. An invalid, or a valetudinarian picking up fragments of available strength at odd intervals, would be an intolerable imposition on public patience. The man who directs the Police of London should be capable, not only of going down regularly to Scotland Yard, reading the daily reports, and issuing daily orders, but of riding once or twice a week about the metropolitan area, and of remaining five or six hours at a stretch on horseback. He should be able to do this without fatigue or inconvenience; without injury either to his constitution or to his temper. Let it never be forgotten that Sir R. Mayne remained on horseback, confronting the "roughs" of London, in Hyde Park, from five in the afternoon till twelve o'clock of a summer night, when he was over seventy years of age. Health and strength are indispensable; but they are not the only characteristics of a Chief Commissioner. He should be active, without being fussy; patient, but not dilatory; slow in judgment, but prompt in resources; firm, but not obstinate; above all, no gabbler; silent, quiet, and reserved, but able by his moderation and his wisdom to win the confidence and inspire the devotion of his men; neither irritable, nor fretful, nor irascible. Such a man must possess a more unusual combination of qualities than is required in some Ministers of State; for the reason that he must oftener act on his own responsibility than any Minister except the Prime Minister and the Chancellor. And he acts on as wide and as distinguished a theatre, and before as critical a public, as any Minister. It is impossible to overstate the embarrassments which, in England, a Chief of Police may entail on himself, and what unpopularity he may excite against his force, by indiscretions of word or action; by unseasonable exhibitions of temper, or equally unseasonable exhibitions of zeal. And no higher eulogy can be passed on Sir R. Mayne than the recital of the very embarrassing occasions on which he acquitted himself with coolness, firmness, and decision, and with as little unpopularity as the very difficult circumstances in which he was placed would admit.

When the difficulty of his duties is considered, the difficulty is increased of solving the question, Where is the new Commissioner to be found? What department of the public service is capable of furnishing a man endowed with qualities so remarkable in themselves, and more remarkable in their combination? Nor should it be forgotten that the man who succeeds Sir R. Mayne should possess some attributes which did not fall to the lot of Sir R. Mayne. For, before the late chief died, the public had begun to note the shortcomings of the London Police; and it will expect from his successor reforms which he failed to carry out. Whence is such a public officer to come? From the body of stipendiary Magistrates? From the Bar? From the Army? There is something to be said for each of these professions; and, under favourable circumstances, perhaps each of them might supply the man who is required. As to the London magistrates, it may be said in their favour, that they know the men with whom they will have most to deal—the police and the rogues. This knowledge is certainly useful, and will go a certain way. But it does not go the whole of the required way. They have seen a good deal of the London life with which the police have a good deal to do. But then they have seen it from a magisterial point of view only. Many of the London magistrates are notoriously "viewy," if not absolutely crotchety. Some of them have well-known prejudices as regards the police, which would make their administration suspected by the very men whose confidence they ought to command. And then they are all more or less hampered by their regard for the technicalities of criminal law, which would unduly tie the hands of their subordinates in their endeavours to prevent the perpetration of crime. The criminals know well the weak points of the English law already, and play with them accordingly. Put a London magistrate at the head of the police, and every felon in London would know that he had got "a fair start" in prosecuting his professional studies. In other words, every thief in London would know that the chances of escaping apprehension were three to one in his favour. Then, again, we suspect that the sedentary habits of the magistrates have disqualified some of its best members from taking an office which demands from its occupant occasional outdoor exertion of a very vigorous quality. Then what shall we say to the Bar? Nearly the same objections which apply to a stipendiary magistrate would apply to a barrister in good criminal practice; and a barrister in good civil practice is quite out of the question. A barrister getting into the first ranks of Sessions practice would have stuffed his head too full of quirks and quips to take a sound administrative view of policemen's duties. Besides, many of them entertain strong and known prejudices against the police. On the other hand, it must be remembered that practice is the exceptional attribute of barristers; and that the Inns of Court contain a vast body of educated gentlemen who are endowed with high talent, which they have had few or no opportunities of exhibiting on the professional arena. These gentlemen are for the most part familiar with London life; have had many opportunities of observing the characters who figure in police courts; have received their early training in the universities and great public schools; and, at any rate, have a respectable, if not a profound, knowledge of the criminal law. They have, moreover, another claim to notice as candidates for the command of policemen. Many of them are members, and some of them very zealous, active, and intelligent officers, of the Volunteer corps. They are accustomed to a semi-military training, to out-of-door exercise, to long marches, and exposure to weather. They are capable, therefore, of discharging well those duties of police which are performed outside the office walls. They have learned, too, the important lessons of command and obedience; of commanding without giving offence, and of obeying without feeling affront. And these are lessons which are of singular use in the discharge of the functions of which we speak. On the whole, we can well understand the language of those who say that the best head of police would be a barrister not yet in large practice, with a sound knowledge of the principles of law, and accustomed to the drill of a Volunteer or Militia corps.

Next come military officers. The example set by the City of London, by some large towns, and many counties, proves that this class supplies intelligent and efficient officers of police. There is a prejudice against them, a remnant of the old prejudice which denounced standing armies, and which still discourages the appearance of soldiers in the streets. But this prejudice is wearing away, and the grounds on which it once rested have long ago disappeared. The constitutional jealousy which people profess to feel of a military Chief Commissioner proceeds from the notion that he would ignore the law in dealing with civilians, and would exaggerate discipline in managing his own men. The former contingency is very unlikely. The experience which most official men have had of military officers tends to show that they are exceedingly afraid of responsibility. Few military men will face the responsibility which civil functionaries often brave. As to the discipline which some persons affect to dread, it is simply necessary for the control and cohesion of a large body of men. A constabulary equal in numbers to a division of infantry cannot be governed without discipline. The suggestion that, instead of one large constabulary, we should have detachments of parish constables, under the direction of parish vestries, may be reserved to be discussed as an alternative to the restoration of the old Charlies or the Saxon Heptarchy. We wish to entertain a profound respect for the grievances and the wisdom of the Marylebone memorialists. But we must confess that our faith is staggered by the perversity which sees in a number of minds—and those, too, Vestry minds—an organizing and directing power which one mind has failed to exercise; as our sympathy is deadened by the equivocation which represents the increase of the Police rate as due exclusively to the increase in the Police Force. Neither can we sympathize with that economical spirit which considers 8,000 men too many to protect nearly 4,000,000, and insists on every constable's abstinence from nocturnal rest. So long as we have a Metropolitan Police, it must be somewhat different from a metropolitan mob. It must have unity of action, identity of interests, and loyalty of feeling. This end will not be attained by splitting it up into parts, and by putting each fragment under district boards of the parochial overseer genus. There are folks who profess an inability to see of what use any drill can be to policemen, and who consider their knowledge of sword exercise a constitutional anomaly. Such folks should wait to see how effective a charge a score of well-drilled and disciplined policemen can make upon a phalanx of excited roughs ten times their own number; or with what skill and address half a dozen well-organized policemen will carry off a prisoner from the clutches of a score of struggling, hustling, and bullying ruffians. Englishmen who have been employed in organizing natives in our Indian and other Eastern dependencies can tell the wonderful degree of courage and self-reliance which is imparted to a body of commonplace louts by regular drill. The slipshod lazy Cinghalese or low-caste villager of the Peninsula is no longer the same man when dressed in his uniform, armed, and instructed in drill. Our own Volunteers can tell a similar tale of the effects of discipline upon bodies of our countrymen at home. Why the police should be without the means of catching that esprit de corps which is the cheapest substitute for numbers must be left for explanation to the transcendental logic of Vestry orators. If these gentlemen think that drill and knowledge of arms are indefensible on general principles, they may ask themselves how they expect London to be defended from the next Fenian conspiracy. If they are such simpletons as to question the necessity of being prepared for such a contingency, we have nothing more to say; for we must decline to argue with men who are ignorant of the current history of the day. With those who assert that a police capable of using side-arms might occasion damage to the riotous followers of Mr. Beales and the rascaldom of East London, we entirely agree; but we demur to the inferences which they would draw from this admission.

Each, then, of the three classes we have named may be cited as worthy of a favourable notice. Perhaps the judgment of thoughtful citizens will incline to one of the two last-named. A man conversant with adventure, familiar with camps, but not devoted to pipeclay, would combine some of the characteristics most required in a Chief of Police. But whoever the man eventually designated may be, he will have no easy or ordinary task before him. On all sides there is the call for more energy and exertion. London has fallen below every capital in Europe, except Athens and Madrid, in the security it provides for life, property, and order. There are upwards of seventy statutes affecting the peace, health, decency, comfort, and security of this vast area. The police is charged with enforcing these laws, but they are daily and hourly broken with impudent impunity. Nighthouses are kept open for the corruption and robbery of the young. Cabs either crawl or rush to the destruction of the old and infirm; idle mendicants expose their filthy sores to the annoyance of the timid and the disgust of all; young ruffians rush about, insulting respectable women; nuisances are tolerated which are pregnant with the seeds of dangerous epidemics. There is a force appointed and paid to keep down these evils, but it requires the vivida vis of guiding energy to galvanize it into action. Such will be the duty of the new Head of Police. Are we wrong in saying that his office is more important than that of many a Minister of State?

THE RITUALIST MEETING.

AMIDST a good deal of exaggeration, a good deal of inconsistency, and some sheer folly, the proceedings at Freemasons' Hall on Tuesday were marked by one unmistakeable characteristic. Those who took part in them were thoroughly in earnest. If they did not always speak very wisely, at least they meant what they said. Unless the evidence from language and demeanour goes for nothing, the speakers had one and all faced the possibility that they might have to leave the Established Church. The only question on which they differed was whether the recent judgment of the Judicial Committee had already brought them face to face with this necessity, or whether they might still wait in the hope that the catastrophe would be averted. Upon this part of the subject we shall have a word to say further on. What we wish to draw attention to at this moment is the extent to which the proceedings at the meeting justified what we have urged from time to time in dealing with the various stages of the Ritual controversy. The "I told you so" argument cannot often be brought forward with much profit, but inasmuch as there is still time to avert the most serious consequences of the policy which prompted the suit of Martin v. Mackonochie, we may be excused for using it on this occasion. It has again and again been pointed out in these columns that the so-called Ritualist innovations have all been prompted by one motive. The plea of the extreme innovators in effect was that the older Tractarian movement had failed to gain general influence because it was too exclusively an intellectual movement. The great sphere of its teaching was the pulpit and the study. The consequence has been, said the Ritualists, that all your high sacramental doctrine has gone in at the ear and come out at the ear. We are going to try a different plan, and to appeal to two senses at once. You have been satisfied with preaching a doctrine about the Eucharist not greatly differing from that of Rome. We shall do that too, but we intend to supplement it by a service not greatly differing from that of Rome. The result has shown that, from their own point of view, they were in the right. Whether the Ritualist converts are worth as much, man by man, as the Tractarian converts, may be doubted; what cannot be doubted is that they can be counted by hundreds, where the others could be counted by tens. In the early times of the movement, therefore, it was not unnatural that the opponents of Ritualism, seeing that what marked them off from the rest of the Church of England was their external ceremonial, should assume that, if that could be put a stop to, the movement itself would collapse. Against this view of the matter, however, there were two serious objections. One was that, before the Evangelical leaders had made up their minds what to do, the Ritualists had already carried out their plan to such an extent that they could in a measure afford to dispense with the means they had hitherto used. In most of their congregations their doctrine had already gained so deep a hold that it would no longer be uprooted by merely removing the props round which it had been twined. The second objection was that the Prayer-book, however strictly interpreted, allowed of a degree of ceremonial which, if it did not give the Ritualists all they desired, did yet give them wherewithal to carry on their services after a fashion which would be quite significant enough to eyes which had been already trained. Vestments might not have had much effect if they had been introduced by themselves. But when introduced in conjunction with incense and lighted candles, they might be trusted to read the same lesson even when their original accessories had been withdrawn. The consequence was that long before the proceedings in Martin v. Mackonochie were begun, it was obvious to all reasonable people that they would wholly fail of their effect, no matter how the judgment might go. Ritual had by this time become so firmly associated with a particular form of Eucharistic doctrine, that unless the latter could be suppressed it would be of no use whatever to pare away at the former. The speeches at Freemasons' Hall fully bear out this view. The majority of them were all in one key. The speakers would not resist the prohibition against lighting the altar candles, and kneeling in the middle of the Consecration prayer, because these prohibitions were not founded on doctrine, and did not directly involve doctrine. But supposing in any future suit the question of doctrine should be distinctly raised, and be decided adversely by the Court of final appeal, then their course would be clear. They would be forced to leave an Establishment which forbade them to teach an essential part of their faith. A more direct challenge to their opponents can hardly be conceived. Let it be proved, they say to the Evangelical leaders, that our belief is incompatible with the formularies of the Church of England as interpreted by the State Courts, and we pledge ourselves to abide by the consequences. We will forthwith resign our cures, or submit to be called dishonest men.

Now, putting aside all questions as to the wisdom or necessity of this challenge, let us see what is involved in the fact of its having been offered. A suit has already been talked of—we are not sure that it has not already been instituted—against Mr. Bennett of Frome which will directly raise the issue contemplated by the Ritualists. Even if it should break down through some formal irregularity, there will be no difficulty in bringing other suits of the same character, since one of the resolutions passed at the meeting binds those present to take every lawful means of proclaiming the doctrine alleged to be indirectly impugned by the recent judgment. Under these circumstances, it may possibly be in the power of the Church Association, and of that section of the Evangelical party which it represents, to bring things to a very speedy crisis. We say possibly, because of course it does not follow that the Privy Council would bear as hardly on the Ritualists, when the point to be decided is one of opinion, as it has done in a matter of ceremonial practice. The instances of the Gorham case and of the Essays and Reviews case certainly show a leaning of the Court towards laxity, of which there is no trace in its dealings with the St. Alban's case. Still it is unsafe to draw any positive conclusion from this fact, because the Courts might hold that the Anglican formularies are capable of a looseness of interpretation in the direction of Protestantism or Rationalism, of which they are not fairly susceptible in the direction of Roman Catholicism. It is well, at any rate, that this possibility should be considered, because the action of the Church Association and its supporters will naturally be determined by the light in which it is presented to them. We can perfectly understand that to the bulk of the Evangelical party it seems a great enormity that what, in their eyes at all events, is no better than transubstantiation should be openly preached in a good number of Anglican churches. Nor are they to be blamed for taking any legal means at their disposal for putting an end to what is to them so gross a scandal. But the most ardent of reformers may be asked to calculate consequences. This will be no simple matter of silencing one or two obnoxious clergymen. The triumph contemplated by the Church Association is nothing less than the expulsion from the Established Church of a large number of zealous and eloquent men, greatly beloved by their congregations, and having, as the records of the offertory at their churches show, the command of very considerable sums of money. The immediate result of the condemnation [illegible] the Judicial Committee of the doctrine of the Real Presence [illegible]d be the formation of a Free Church of England side by [illegible] with the Established Church. It would have no [illegible] in obtaining bishops from some quarter or other; and for a short time, at all events, it might present a very imposing front as against a Church so distracted by internal dissensions as the Established Church of England would even then be. Now we wish to ask the Council of the Church Association two questions. The first is, Have they ever seriously considered what would be the effect produced on the Established Church in England by such a spectacle as this? The second is, Are they prepared to go on with doctrinal prosecutions without regard to the effect so produced? If they answer that they have considered the effect, and that they do not believe the existence of the Established Church will be seriously imperilled by a schism of this kind, we can only wonder at their inability to discern the drift of public feeling on the question of religious establishments generally. If they answer that they have counted the cost, and do not think it too great in order to deliver the Church of England from the presence of its Ritualist members, of course there is nothing more to be said. For ourselves, we confess we shall be sorry to see so large a question raised in so unsatisfactory and piecemeal a manner. With all its faults, the Church of England deserves a better fate than to be shattered by the undesigned blows of a section of intolerant fanatics.

For the minority of the meeting on Tuesday, which followed the lead of Mr. Bennett, we cannot profess any respect. It preached resistance to the late decision on two grounds—one that it was virtually a decision against the doctrine of the Real Presence, the other that the Privy Council was a lay court and therefore had no claim on the obedience of Churchmen. Against the former theory we argued a fortnight since, and we do not know that there is anything to be added to what was then said. The second theory implies entire ignorance of the position of the Anglican Church as the Church established by law. If the State gives large privileges and powers to a particular religious association, it may surely claim the right of determining the conditions upon which these privileges shall be enjoyed. If it may not do this, where is the distinction between an Established Church and an absolute theocracy? If it does possess this right, it is hard to see how it can be less offensively exercised than by reserving to its own Courts the right of interpreting what is the legal meaning to be attached to the formularies of the Church. According to Mr. Bennett's theory the State would not establish a definite religious body, possessing definite doctrines and a definite ritual; it would merely establish a religious body which, for anything the State could know to the contrary, might come out with a fresh creed every successive year of its existence. An Act of Uniformity of some kind seems necessary to the very idea of an Established Church, and where there is an Act of Uniformity we do not see how Mr. Bennett proposes to keep questions of ritual out of the cognizance of the temporal Courts. It may be suspected that those of the clergy who impugn the constitution of the Judicial Committee are not very intimately acquainted with the constitution of the tribunal which it replaced. Parliament may have created the present Court, as Mr. Bennett says, without the consent of the Church. Would he have been any better pleased if the case of Martin v. Mackonochie had gone in the last resort to a body of laymen appointed pro hac vice by the Crown? Yet this is the course the proceedings would have taken, with the full concurrence of the Church, before the legislation which is so much denounced by High Churchmen. Even the Judicial Committee is a step upwards from the old Court of Delegates.

PUBLIC INDECENCIES.

THERE is not the slightest reason for impugning the state of the law which provides against open and flagrant violations of public decency and propriety. All that is wanted is its constant, persistent execution. As far as we can understand the English law on these matters, it seems framed with great propriety. It does not aim at making the individual chaste and sober and virtuous. These things are impossible to compel by legislation. The deadly sins deprecated in the Litany are not punishable by our Acts of Parliament. Private vices, unchastity and uncleanness and sensuality, are left to the safeguards of conscience, morality, and religion. It is only when these things become rampant, offend the public eye, and outrage external propriety, that the police are empowered to interfere. A more stringent law would defeat itself. We see this by the experience of Paris. There the police are armed with great powers of domiciliary interference. The result is not encouraging. Neither is the condition of London; but it is because the law is not carried out, and its provisions are not fulfilled. We have never yet been able even to guess at the cause of the present state of things. Nobody pretends that the law is too inquisitorial, or its penalties too severe. Not the slightest murmur is ever raised when the law is put into execution; not a pretence of wrong or injustice is urged when the police do act. The only complaint urged, and it is one which has some point in it, by those against whom it is enforced, is that its execution is intermittent, partial, vague, uncertain, and therefore unjust. And it is so. The general and natural impression about the state of the law is that it is very difficult of carrying into execution; that with its usual tenderness for rascality, the English law makes the proof of public indecency so difficult, and furnishes obscenity and indecency with so many opportunities of escape, that after all much may be urged in vindication of the apparent supineness of authority in these matters. But when it comes to matter of fact just the reverse takes place. About once a twelvemonth, or once in two years, a raid is made on Wych Street or Holywell Street, and with great triumph we are informed of the tons of books, stereotype plates, and photographs which are seized and burnt. The offenders are fined and imprisoned, with as much ease and certainty as a drunkard is fined five shillings. A few years ago we heard of the purification of the Haymarket and its purlieus. We were assured that in the midnight hours Coventry Street was as decorous as Great Ormond Street at noonday. Still later we were assured that the night houses in those pleasant shades were quite reformed and cleansed. And we believed that all this was quite true. The picture was engaging; the results Arcadian; and the character of the law—sufficiently strict, yet not Draconically austere—was admirably vindicated.

And then all of a sudden it comes out that we have been living in a fool's paradise. One of Thursday's newspapers, describing this the actual London of 1869, assures us that "the main thoroughfares round the Haymarket from midnight until two o'clock in the morning are rendered impassable by a dense mob of women of the town, thieves, and bullies. The police on duty view the scene, and take no steps to put an end to it;" and so the report goes on communicating the particulars, inexpressibly filthy and disgusting, which are correctly enough described as a disgrace to our civilization, and such as would be tolerated in no other capital. This, whether truly or not, is described as the condition of our finest streets in the very heart of our national life during this present week. From which it follows—and we are almost ashamed to come out with so bald a truism—that either there is great neglect now, or that the respectable citizens whom we now think proper to stigmatize as thieves, prostitutes, and bullies, of a few years ago were very hardly dealt with for their tastes in taking their midnight walks abroad. Either these abominations ought to be put down now, or it was a great violation of the liberty of the subject when some years ago we suppressed those little playful exhibitions of a venial immorality. So with another disgraceful matter. Last Monday Mr. Knox took evidence and fined a fellow named Brooks for permitting Poses Plastiques, Tableaux Vivans, or whatever they are called, and for presiding over or keeping what is called a Judge and Jury Club—that is, a mock trial, the staple of which is filthy language, or, as Mr. Knox calls it, "broad and disgusting bestiality." We shut our eyes and wonder where we are. Is it, or is it not, true that there was such a fellow as Chief Baron Nicholson? Was, or was not, his portrait as familiar to all London people as the lion on Northumberland House? Did he not go on for years unchecked in his dirty trade? Later still, have we not walked in Leicester Square? Have we not seen and read the announcements—pictorial and in print—of all those Corinthian and Lampsacene prettinesses? Is Finlen's name, and the connexion of that great politician with one of these Judge and Jury Societies, forgotten, or was it recorded long ago in connexion with the days of Hogarth and the Mohocks? Have we not been living for a quarter of a century at least in presence of Judge and Jury Clubs as an institution as much recognised as Exeter Hall itself? But all of a sudden it comes out that the house which harbours these edifying midnight conversations is disorderly; a grave offence has been committed; a fine is inflicted; much proper and extremely impressive language is used by the sitting magistrate; even the lawyer employed to defend Mr. Henry Brooks apologizes for his advocacy; and the Daily Telegraph writes an excellent leader on his conviction, the effect of which is, however, slightly counteracted, and its affecting defence of propriety and cleanness impaired, by the appearance of two advertisements of two vile books in the same impression of that proper and decorous journal. Again we ask, what does all this mean? If that huge Satyr, Baron Nicholson, was allowed to rot out in the odour—and a very nasty odour it was—of obscenity, unpunished, then Mr. Henry Brooks is rather hardly dealt with. It cannot be that the meshes of the law were not strong enough to retain that bloated carrion-fly of the days gone by while it has contrived to catch the small midge Brooks, for the law was the same, the offence was the same, the sort of house in which the offence was committed the same. In whatever sense Brook's den, called a refreshment house, was open to the police, Nicholson's public-house was equally amenable to the law. We permitted the one; we suppress the other, though for years we have practically encouraged it.

Take another instance of this spasmodic, and therefore we believe mischievous, administration of the law. Everybody knows the Tichborne Street Anatomical Museum. It is as familiar to us as the fountain and fernery shop-window in the Quadrant. More than that, everybody knows what the Museum means. Its touters openly parade its contents, and offer you catalogues of its nastinesses. The attempt to pass it off as a scientific institution only adds the vice of hypocrisy to the sin of obscenity. It is a loathsome den, in which not only the wares exhibited are abominable, but which is, in fact, an adjunct to the trade of the quack extortioners who live on the fictitious terrors which they inspire into the corrupted mind of youthful profligacy or ignorance. These Anatomical Museums ruin body, soul, and pocket alike, corrupt the constitutions and impoverish the means of their victims. Mental terrors and horrors of the soul, despondency and despair, madness and suicide are the consequences of studying under the so-called Dr. Kahn, and we believe that the nauseous shop which goes by this name is not the only one of these moral laystalls in London. It might be supposed that such places were very hard, exceptionally hard, nuts to crack; that their proprietors sailed so very close to the wind of the law that it was impossible to overhaul them; that the case was either a casus omissus of the Police Acts, or that it would turn out to be so hazardous to interfere that the risk was not worth running. We have heard that this was the sort of language used at the Home Office, when indignation, public or private, forced itself upon authority. But how stand the facts? Not many years ago—indeed, only three or four years ago—there was one of these Anatomical Museums in the Strand. The authorities of King's College—so we have always understood—complained; and the thing was shut up, suppressed, and disappeared without the slightest trouble or fuss. So that where there is a will there is a way, and that not a difficult one. The pretence that we cannot deal with this sort of thing is most summarily answered by the fact that we do deal with it, and deal with it effectually, when so disposed. Sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander; law for the Strand is law for Tichborne Street. We suppress one nuisance, we permit another—precisely the same, and at work under precisely the same conditions.

All these things are inexpressibly sickening and disgusting and humiliating. Night-houses, Haymarket promenades and fairs, anatomical museums, Judge and Jury clubs, Holywell Street wares, obscene and pseudo-medical advertisements, the Daily Telegraph's homilies and the Daily Telegraph's advertisements—it is a pollution to have to think about them, and to write about them. But there is just one thing perhaps worse, and that is that we know, and the present outbreak of indignation and congratulation proves that we know, that we might stop it all if we pleased any day in the week, and most completely—but we do not. Lord Campbell's Act is a very fine thing; it is not dead, nor impracticable to carry out—only it sleeps. Why the name of Dugdale, always fined and always at work again, is as familiar as that of Mr. Knox himself. And disgusting as the whole thing is, the one thing more disgusting is the occasional reports of "Raid on the Night Houses," "Raid on Holywell Street," "Raid on the Haymarket." We are almost forced to the conviction that the police had better not interfere at all than carry on this guerilla warfare. The conclusion—we believe a very unjust one—is that they only pounce upon offenders when hush-money is not forthcoming, and the only answer to this discreditable imputation will be found in a steady, persistent, and constant vindication of the law, every day, and all day, and all night, long.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN IN AGRICULTURE.

THE typical foreigner is probably unequal to the study of the British Blue-book, otherwise the national habit of self-examination must often startle him. There is no public analysis of their own social condition by Germans, Italians, or Frenchmen. Here and there an elaborate treatise on the state of a department or of a trade is produced by some famous publicist. But such works are the result of personal option and personal judgment. They do not emanate from official inspiration, and are clothed with no official authority. They lead to no public or legislative action, and excite no interest beyond the narrow circle of professed philanthropists and statisticians. Nobody in France, out of this circle, knows or cares to know aught about the habits, means, wages, or health of the peasantry of Normandy or Auvergne. And it will be long before even the Liberal section of the Prussian Parliament occupies itself with the condition of the people who till the ground and live on black bread and vegetables. We, on the contrary, love to turn our social body inside out, to inspect its irregularities or deformities, and to give the results of our contemplation to the world. Our soldiers, our sailors, our miners, our factory workers, our weavers and our spinners, have in turn been the subjects of Parliamentary discussion and of Royal Commissions. If foreigners only knew English, they would be able to diversify the ordinary tenor of their pleasant raillery at us by many a spicy extract from the national confessional of our Parliamentary blue-books.

One of the most important in the last series is the Report of the Commissioners who were sent to inquire into the condition of women, young persons, and children employed in agriculture. Ostensibly limited to the labour of females and children in the fields, the inquiry has diverged into the general condition of the agricultural poor of England. And this the Report makes out to be very far from satisfactory. Yet it may be questioned whether the standard which the Commissioners have applied is not too ideal for the usages and practices of our everyday working life. This seems to be the one dominant vice of all Commissioners' Reports. They are nothing if not virtuous. They set about their task with such a lofty canon of virtue in their own minds that everything they witness, or are told, shocks them as falling short of their ideal. This high moral tone detracts somewhat from the value of their opinions and suggestions. It indicates a feebleness of sentiment, and thus repels those robuster minds whose co-operation is necessary for the remedy of the evils complained of. Still, after fully admitting this drawback, there remains enough to excite commiseration, and to justify the demand for interference. The first subjects of the inquiry were the children. It appears that children are sent into the fields at the age of eight. They are too young and weak for really hard work. But there is a good deal of necessary labour which they perform. They "tent" the fields—that is, they watch them, and frighten away the birds. They naturally take part in the work which requires stooping, such as dibbling in peas, pulling up turnips, and weeding. For such work they may earn a shilling or two a week. It is contended—and this view is supported by the Commissioners—that, instead of working in the fields at this tender age, the children should be sent to school, and kept there till they are eleven or twelve years old. This is, of course, the view which the Commissioners and the clergy are sure to take, and it will be generally approved. One of the most zealous of the Assistant-Commissioners, Mr. Fraser, asks for the enactment of a law which shall require "regular uninterrupted attendance at school up to the age of 10; and for the two years beyond 10 and 12, while the child is at work, a certain amount of attendance as suggested by the Norfolk Chamber of Agriculture, either at day or night-school, during the greater part of the year." Of course it would be desirable if this could be done. But can it? The whole evidence collected by the Assistant-Commissioners shows that the ordinary life of the English agricultural peasant is inconsistent with these fine projects for his intellectual improvement. Children must, to him, be one of two things—an assistance or an incumbrance. They must divide with him the bread which he alone earns, or they must contribute to the household store. It is a hard thing for a father of a family earning his 13*s.* per week to keep five children between home and school, of whom one, if not more, might bring home a weekly contribution of 1*s.* 6*d.* In these humble abodes the difference between 13*s.* and 14*s.* 6*d.* a week is acutely felt. And it is this consideration that runs through the whole subject of agricultural labour. How can they who are waging a daily fight against indigence afford to pay for luxuries? In the eyes of the farm-labourer, education is a luxury. Its advantages are remote, impalpable, and, in his opinion, uncertain. But what is clear and certain is, that the boy who is working in the fields brings in more money than the boy who is learning at school. Of course, the peasant's view is a shortsighted one. But it is only just as shortsighted as that of others who are unable to gauge the comparative advantages of present outlay and present parsimony. It is not only agricultural peasants who refuse to see the good of giving time and money to their children's education. We have all much to learn from Scotland in this respect. And it is not unlikely that, for one case where the return for the sacrifice would be ample, there might be ten cases where it would be inappreciably slight. The labouring man, therefore, encourages the labour rather than the education of his sons. The same consideration bids him send out his wife and daughters to field-work. There are certain kinds of work which women can do as well as men, and which they do cheaper than men, and which, therefore, the farmers entrust to women more readily than to men. The earnings of a wife and daughter may add sensibly to the gains of a family. It is, therefore, hardly consistent with human nature that the labourer should not embrace the opportunity of increasing his store. His own earnings, at the best, are not high; in many cases, they are not regular. When there is a long frost, or when he has a bad rheumatism, he is off work, and, in many cases, off wages also. So that, on the whole, it is not to be wondered at if he wishes his wife and children to help him by their labour when they can.

But, it is said, this life is brutalizing and demoralizing. The boys grow up stupid, heavy, animal, not only without the power of reading and writing, but without the power of observing and reflecting; while the girls in the field-work lose all respect, not only for chastity, but for the semblance of decorum; and, if not ruined in their morals, become utterly unfitted for the duties of wives. We fear that there is too much truth in this. At the same time, the description of one class of people by an entirely different class is liable to exaggeration. With regard to the condition of the women and children in certain districts, it is simply abominable. But this is confined to certain districts, and is owing to causes which we shall notice later. What we wish now to remark is, that inspectors and clergymen are generally prone to exaggerate the evils which they witness. They forget that, at the best, the whole weft of agricultural life is almost necessarily coarse; and that it is unreasonable to expect from men who have toiled all their days in a farm the same decorous speech as they hear from smug tradesmen in a country town. There always will be a plainer and a homelier phraseology among country labourers than among city artisans or domestic servants. But there need not be that shameless immodesty and disregard of chastity which seems to characterize some of the female gangs. At the same time, some of the Assistant-Commissioners might have asked themselves the question, whether, bating the obscenity of the language, there was so very great a difference in the actual morality of the labouring class and that of a class very much above them. It is true that the young women are often unchaste, but the general testimony of the Northumberland witnesses shows that the same girls who are unchaste before marriage are often eminently chaste after marriage. There is no greater mistake than to suppose that grossness of language necessarily indicates immorality of conduct. The young ladies of the Tudor period indulged in much coarser phraseology than the young ladies of our period; but it would be a very incorrect inference that they were less virtuous than the young ladies of our period. The daughters of respectable farmers, sixty or seventy years ago, spoke much more broadly and plainly than the daughters of farmers of our day; yet we have no reason for thinking that they were a jot less virtuous. Mere working in the fields does not necessarily corrupt the morals of women. It hardens and roughens rather than depraves their characters. It gives a masculine tone to them, and impairs what is left of feminine softness. And if it were possible to have gangs of girls working only with the women, coarseness of language would be the result rather than immorality of conduct. Women work in the fields of agricultural France and Germany. Their work is heavier than that of men; their food and language quite as coarse as those of men. But—bating a kind of rough and indecorous phraseology—there is not so much systematic profligacy in the villages as in the cities of France and Germany. And there is with them, as with us, the virtue of undeniably hard and healthy work. It is not the solitary fact of adult female labour, or of juvenile female gangs, which causes female immorality. It is the concurrence of this with home training which precedes and accompanies the field-work, which, while it confirms the coarseness, saps the morality. It is the herding together of girls and boys, young men and young women, in the one room of the insufficient and crowded cottage. It is the enforced and unnatural suppression of the native instinct of modesty in the miserable hovels which the unwise and unholy parsimony of the landlord or the speculator has stinted in quantity and quality. It is the foul and incestuous life in the cottage which generates the open and flagrant immorality in the fields. In the parts of Northumberland were wages are good, and cottages well built and roomy, the conduct of the peasant women is substantially virtuous and correct. It may not satisfy the requirements of clerical inspectors or fastidious censors, but it will satisfy the expectations of most reasonable men. The women talk the language of their caste, which is not that of drawing-rooms. They expiate their precocious slips from virtue by irreproachable fidelity as wives and mothers. It is in the Eastern Counties, where there are "close" parishes, and where the house accommodation is poor and barbarous, that the women and girls act and speak like the harlot-caste of a savage race. The education that is required, we thus see, is the education of circumstances rather than of books; of good homes rather than of schools; unless indeed some means could be invented to dispense altogether with children's labour. It is the same home life which both hardens and depraves the men, not the occasional feasts and their rollicking incidents. Although the songs and "chaff" at the harvest-feasts are singularly gross and revolting to refined tastes, some of the Commissioners and Assistant-Commissioners may have heard something not extremely dissimilar at a Cambridge supper-party or even in the days of Temple pupilhood.

Let us not be supposed to say that this condition of things is one that does not loudly call for improvement. We only say that the grandly serious treatment of agricultural frolic and love-making, if extended to other circles, might give the world a picture of English society which we should not like to dwell upon. Although the Strephon and Daphne of the English counties make love rather openly and grossly, there is at bottom not much more immorality in their intercourse than in that of young De Boots and his Traviata. Of course there is a difference between the undisguised openness of the one and the conventional concealment of the other pair. But, if education is to improve morality, it must be extended above the denizens of the Eastern Counties peasants. And this is what the peasants themselves feel. The dullest and stupidest of them hates to be preached at. And we are not sure that he is wrong. It must be very aggravating to a poor man who has been toiling from 7 a.m. to 6 p.m. on a cold wet March day, and who comes home thrice soaked through to a not very strengthening supper, to be catechized by a well-fed and well-dressed gentleman respecting his earnings, his wife's earnings, and the duty of sending his boys and girls to school. If he could only find words in which to vent his indignation, he might ask his critics whether a man who was labouring hard the greater part of the year from morning to night for his family was not to be excused some breaches of manners and some outbreaks of gaiety. And, if he did send his children to work instead of school, was it not the normal discomfort in which he habitually lived that made every additional sixpence which they might earn a matter of importance to him and them? If, too, he were taunted with the temptations and corruption to which his daughters were exposed by field labour, might he not retort that the work of moral corruption had been begun by the insufficient and ill-constructed houses in which he and they were compelled to live? If he had a better house and better wages, he need not deprive his children of a good education or subject them to a moral taint. But is it possible to get these higher wages and better homes out of the existing fund of agricultural profits? Who will build cottages without regard to interest, or pay wages without reference to profits? On this point we must hereafter recur to the Report of the Commissioners. That the evils which they point out are grave nobody will gainsay. But no one can fail to see that they are evils which it is hopeless to correct by sudden and wholesale legislation; that their mitigation depends on changes affecting the whole agricultural class, and that their extirpation will only be effected when machinery does the work, not only of women and children, but also of men. That day will perhaps come, sooner or later, but it is far more likely to come later than sooner. It came early in America, because, in America, the supply of land was unlimited, while that of men was stinted. And it will not be till the agricultural population of England has been diminished, by some cause or other, that women and children in the rural districts will be relegated to the duties of home and the labours of school. Meanwhile, much may be effected by the existing Acts which limit the age of children employed in the fields, concurrently with the exertions of far-sighted landowners and the clergy, to whose zeal the agricultural poor owe all the moral advantages they possess. By these means an improvement may be made in the condition of the peasantry which, though slow, will be not less sure than that which has been made in the condition of the farmers since the beginning of the present century.

MARRIAGE SETTLEMENTS.

THE expediency of the existing law as to the property of married women may be considered either as regards what may be called the property-classes, or as regards the working-classes; and it will save confusion to consider these two aspects of the question separately. As regards owners of property, the advantages expected from a change of the law may, speaking generally, be obtained by help of a marriage settlement from the law as it stands, with the additional advantage that the preparing of marriage settlements furnishes employment for that useful class of men, the lawyers. There are certain solemnities required at the marriages of English people of condition, and we doubt whether a settlement, occupying many skins of parchment, is not as necessary to doing the thing handsomely as a costly breakfast and a paragraph in the Morning Post. Mere marriage might be contracted under the provisions of a general law; but when a noble and beautiful and accomplished lady is led to the hymeneal altar we all feel that the intervention of the family solicitor is one of the sumptuosities indispensable to the august occasion. It pleases pomposity to talk of "my solicitor," as of other appurtenances of wealth, and of course this luxury, like others, must be paid for. The example of those portions of the United States where marriage settlements were always rare, and have now become extinct, has been appealed to by legal innovators, but we put it aside as totally inapplicable. There may be a possibility of disestablishing the clergy, but we regard any proposal for disestablishing the solicitors as visionary.

The object of a marriage settlement is that certain property shall be secured so that the husband and wife may enjoy the income during their lives, and the children may receive the corpus after their parents' deaths and the attainment of their own majorities. This object is effected in England by the preparation, on the occasion of a marriage, of one or more cumbrous deeds. It is at least conceivable that this object might be effected by the operation of a general law which should apply to all marriages unless excluded by special stipulation. There is, however, an objection to such a law which we fear is insurmountable. The ladies of England may or may not consider it a compliment to be told that they are not sufficiently strongminded for the position in which their American sisters have been placed by recent legislation. There is a vulgar phrase that such a person is old enough and ugly enough to take care of himself. We beg to assure the ladies of England that, in our opinion, this phrase does not apply to them. The objection which we see to giving married women property is simply this, that they could not keep it. Of course we know that before alarmed barristers at Registration Courts, as well as in other places, there have appeared formidable personages, women with more than all the energy and sagacity of men, and fully capable of maintaining all their existing rights as well as of asserting new rights. A woman who demands the suffrage is not likely to allow herself to be wheedled out of what lawyers would call her separate estate. But let us look at English ladies as they are, and not as they will be when our social system has been thoroughly Americanized. Suppose we look round among our own acquaintance, and consider how many of them are so well capable of taking care of property as to make it prudent in their cases to dispense with the usual protection of a marriage settlement. We except, of course, the dragon variety of womankind, who might be trusted to hold on to their monies and securities like grim death. But one of the most usual weaknesses of the sex is an expectation that trustees will find investments for them at ten per cent. on unexceptionable security. They evince a decided preference for imported novelties in the shape of "bonds" and "obligations," and it may be safely asserted that, if English marriage settlements were abolished, the financial operations of various foreign Governments would be enormously facilitated. We should expect to hear of a proposal for a loan to the King of Timbuctoo, coupled with statements professedly authoritative that that potentate had recently expressed himself highly favourable to the progress of missionary enterprise in his dominions. That lucrative business, the getting-up of public companies, would immediately develop a new branch. It would become a special business to draw the capital of married women, who would be largely practised upon by sharpers, as well as constantly exposed to the persuasion or extortion of their own husbands and sons. The character is not uncommon of a man who is always going to make his fortune, and who will exhaust in rash speculation all the means that exist for maintaining his family, except the property which was settled upon his marriage. When we meet such a character, we cannot but confess that the solicitor's attendances to take instructions, and his drawing, fair-copying, and engrossing, are a clumsy but nevertheless useful method of protecting people against their own folly.

A comparison between our own system of marriage settlements and the working of the law which has superseded marriage settlements in the United States would be a necessary preliminary to any proposal for altering our law. Accordingly a Committee of the House of Commons, to whom a Bill for this purpose was referred, invited the attendance of several American gentlemen, of legal and other experience, who happened to be in London, and questioned them as to the law and practice of their various States. Mr. C. M. Fisher, who is a lawyer from Vermont, believes that, if a husband got into difficulties, the wife would be able to keep her property from going the same bad way as his. This may be true of Vermont, but we fear it is not true of England. Suppose, for example, that a husband is on the verge of bankruptcy. He believes, as speculative traders always do, that if he could only hold on for another week or month, the run of luck would change, and he would become solvent, or perhaps rich. To enable him to hold on he wants, say, 1,000*l.* If he has great confidence in his powers of persuasion, he goes to the trustees of his wife's settlement, and endeavours to induce them to advance the money. The trustees, knowing that this is in effect a proposal that they should put their hands into their own pockets, say, in a voice most decided though mild, that they will do nothing of the kind. But if the wife could sell out the 1,000*l.* from the Funds, would not the husband get it, assuming, of course, that its reinvestment within a month is as certain as that the Bank of England will pay the October dividends? We admire the firmness of the ladies of Vermont, and admire it all the more perhaps because distance lends enchantment to the view; but we like the weakness of the ladies of England, always provided that the family solicitor, with his parchments, has guarded against that weakness having any injurious effect. It has been suggested that the Court of Chancery would come to the assistance of married ladies, and would set aside gifts made by them of property to their husbands, as having been obtained by undue influence. But unfortunately the Court of Chancery, although its powers are extensive and the learning of its judges is profound, would be forced to confess its incompetency to perform a feat analogous to getting butter out of a dog's mouth. The Court might set aside the gift, but it could not bring back the money that had been given. So it seems that marriage settlements will continue to be made; and if they must be made, it is difficult, as regards what we have called the property classes, to see any adequate advantage in the proposed change in the law. We might indeed suggest, if we were disposed to abandon our minds to wild revolutionary ideas, that the effect of a marriage settlement might be produced without the intervention of a solicitor. It is admitted that the assistance of this valuable body of men cannot be had without paying for it, and where property is small the expense of a settlement almost prevents any being made; and, besides, there is the difficulty of finding proper persons willing to be trustees. There could be no insurmountable difficulty, at least as regards money invested in the national funds, in making the usual provisions of a marriage settlement by means of a public officer who should be a sort of general trustee. It can hardly be doubted that Mr. Gladstone is capable of proposing a plan for adding the making of marriage settlements to the business of the Post-office Savings' Banks; and it would not perhaps be considered by him a fatal objection to such a plan, that it tended to diminish the use of verbiage and the consumption of parchment, and to render the employment of solicitors unnecessary. It would not be difficult to show that such a plan might be made to yield profit to Government while affording great convenience to the public.

It is said, by persons who claim to be well-informed as to the habits of the labouring-classes, that the earnings of wives ought to be protected against the spending propensities of husbands. A woman cannot earn money for herself unless she can legally contract to do work, and therefore it is necessary to give to wives all the legal powers of entering into contracts, and acquiring and holding property, which are possessed by husbands. But here, again, we think that the machinery of savings' banks might be made applicable to satisfy the practical necessity of the case. The Rochdale Co-operative Society assumes, under the present law, to treat married women who are members of it as separate persons having distinct rights from their husbands. A wife puts money into the society, and if her husband asks for it, he is told that he cannot have it. The legal advisers of the society have persuaded themselves that there is some clause in some Act of Parliament which authorizes them to disregard the husband's claim to that which, according to general law, is clearly his—namely, the money deposited by his wife. Without discussing the soundness of this opinion, we may venture to say that there would be no harm in giving by Act of Parliament the necessary authority, if it does not exist. It might reasonably be provided that a married woman should be able to obtain protection for her earnings if she applied for it. But the advocates of a change in the law contend that she ought to have it without applying for it. The discussion of this question may remind one of the discussion about Irish tenant-right. It is assumed that a tenant ought to be compensated for unexhausted improvements of the land, but it is said that surely the landlord is not to be liable to pay for improvements without having notice that they are about to be made. The tenant answers, that if he tells the landlord what he is going to do he will be turned out. The proposal to give to wives the power to deposit money in savings' banks and elsewhere, so as to be secure against their husbands, is met in much the same way. It appears to be thought that, if the wife made known her intention of going to a savings' bank, the husband would expostulate; at least—to use another Irish illustration—he would expostulate if the poker did not happen to be bent.

The Americans are much too clever not to have discovered that their new law offers considerable facilities to fraud. A married woman can carry on business as if she were unmarried, and it is within the resources of science to arrange matters so that her husband shall take the profits, if there be any, while there shall be in effect nobody to bear the losses. It is not encouraging to be told that at least in one State it has been found necessary to establish a registry of married women carrying on business. In this country the combination of the proposed new law with the existing practice of marriage settlements would be happily adapted for the promotion of ingenious swindling. Mrs. Smith would go into business, and would obtain credit on the supposition that she possessed considerable property. There might, perhaps, be property that she was visibly enjoying. She might incur debts, but when her creditors attempted to obtain payment, it would probably appear that this property was only enjoyed by her under a restraint by settlement against anticipation. A proposal to register settlements is, as we know, visionary; but might it be possible to register Mrs. Smith, or to compel her in some way to indicate to the world that she was restrained from spending beyond her income? We would suggest "Mrs. Smith, Limited," as a convenient and respectful designation.

WHERE SHALL THE LAW COURTS BE?

THE accession of Mr. Layard—the first expert who has ever been placed there — to the Commissionership of Works has given renewed vitality to the Public Buildings of London question; and the removal of the new Law Courts to the Thames Embankment has again been advocated in the Times by Sir C. Trevelyan, with the support of the paper itself. Theoretically, there can be not the slightest doubt that a river quay—and a quay, too, bordering so broad a river as the Thames—fringed by magnificent public buildings, would be about the grandest combination of town landscape which opportunity, genius, and wealth could produce. Accordingly, we fully accept in theory the position that the Thames Quay must be the best position for these new Law Courts, which we have rightly resolved upon housing in a palace. But, having gone so far, we are compelled to pause. If corruptio optimi est pessima no less is abortio pulcherrimi teterrima, and so before we take our part in committing the nation to that which may either prove to be the grandest architectural success or the most woeful failure of the age, we desire to consider the circumstances likely to lead to one or the other result. For this purpose we will take the two sites now in competition for the Law Courts, and dissect their respective capabilities and disadvantages so far as architectural effect is concerned. To the lawyers, as eminently capable of taking care of themselves at any sacrifice of beauty, we leave the practical considerations. The Strand and Carey Street site—up to which the competitors designed—is an oblong block of that shelving ground on which the greater part of North London is built, with its lowest limit southward along the north line of the Strand, and its highest to the northward, along Carey Street. In this the chief architectural effects are all but exclusively sought in the lower portion—namely, in the façade lining the Strand, and in the western face, combining the angle views of these two sides as they group to the eye of the passenger moving eastward up the Strand. The competitors have also, generally speaking, sought for themselves a third class of effect, also in the southern part, by tendering a Gothic rebuilding of Temple Bar, and trusting to the Temple for rebuilding itself to match. These effects (except the last) are, it will be observed, those of a building on ground which gradually rises from the eye of the spectator, and therefore of the kind most easy to be produced. The northern line, so as to secure the maximum of grandeur, ought to be open to the wide area of Lincoln's Inn Fields, so that, whether any part of the building reaches so far or not, the Palace itself should be one of the components of that magnificent square. The only building of public value on its south side is the College of Surgeons, which might in that case be indemnified by a slice of the Thames Embankment. On the rebuilding of Lincoln's Inn, more or less, we do not enlarge, for it would be a self-evident necessity. But of course there is no money for so magnificent a work—London not being Paris—and so the stop is made at Carey Street; so there will, for practical purposes, be pretty well no northern façade at all. Even, however, if there had been one, except upon the condition of the Palace being advanced up to the present south line of the Fields, it would have been that of a building standing at a lower level than the eye of the spectator, and withal sufficiently near him to make it impossible for the architect to mask this disadvantage, or possibly convert it into a fresh element of picturesque beauty. To the eastward the pile will be absolutely non-existent, for if at any point a peep could be got, at that point will stand the physical obstruction of the new Record Office. So much for the near aspects. As to the general landscape of London, the height above the river is a plain advantage of which the architect would be beholden to make the best in his sky-line.

All these conditions would be reversed in the river-side Palace. No doubt, as in the Strand façade of the existing site, the south would be the principal front. But it would not be a front planting itself in the busy street and borrowing something of the irregular variety of the adjacent buildings, into whose bosom it had as it were swooped down, as a contributory element of its own picturesqueness. Isolated, unapproached and unapproachable by any subaltern structures, it must be self-reliant in its mass and its grouping, or it will be nothing. Its site will be a dead flat, and so it will exclusively depend upon itself for the impression which it will produce upon the passer on the quay. Its dignity, as judged by the passenger in boat or steamer, will also depend upon the character given to the river wall of the Embankment. Who that has looked down on the Palace of Westminster from Westminster Bridge, or brought his eye to the level of its ground floor from the deck of the Kew steamer, but has lamented that so grand a pile should have slipped down so low? We all know that the condition of the competition, that of reproducing the old Palace of Westminster and working in the Hall, left Sir Charles Barry no choice, and we can well afford to praise the ingenuity with which he dealt with his problem. Nevertheless, apart from historical association, the depressed level of the Westminster pile is a great drawback, and ought to be a standing warning to every architect who finds himself charged with putting anything bigger than a sentry-box on the new Embankment. Yet the Palace of Westminster is supported by the Abbey on the same low level, while the Palace of Justice would at any distance be dwarfed by the more loftily seated St. Paul's. But the responsibilities connected with level will not end here, in case the Law Courts are sent down to the river. We have pointed out at what a disadvantage they would be placed, if retained in their destined position, in regard to their being opened out from Lincoln's Inn Fields, owing to the slope of the ground to the southward. A far greater disadvantage would be found to exist in the much more abrupt fall from the Strand itself down to the Embankment level. London already contains a standing example of the ill effects of putting a big building at the bottom of a hill, to be looked down upon, and led down to by flanking arcades, in the Horticultural Garden. Nothing, we know, could have made the galleries lately sacred to national portraits beautiful in themselves; but at all events, if they had stood at the top of the garden and the conservatory at the bottom, the whole affair would at least have offered a pretence of composition, and its general aspect have been one shade less repulsive. On the other hand, the British Museum, in spite of the cold pedantry of its style, is somewhat grand in its general aspect from being always looked up to from Museum Street and its lateral feeders. On the other hand, University College fails in producing the effect to which it might abstractedly be entitled from the conformation of its site. Of course an easy way of getting out of the difficulty with the Law Courts might be found in leaving Essex and Norfolk Streets and their fascinating purlieus where they are, and so wiping out the northern face of the Palace. But we imagine that the British public, even in its most matter-of-fact and economical mood, would hardly stand such an absurdity. If the Palace of Justice is to be moved to the Embankment, this action must be understood as comprising and compelling the razzia of all buildings which may stand between, at all events, the central mass of its north façade and the Strand-line.

Here then is the dilemma. The removal of the Palace from the Carey Street site to the river bank is, practically speaking, recommended from æsthetic considerations, with which abstractedly we are disposed very cordially to agree. But here crops out a difficulty of which its advocates, so far as we have observed, have not yet taken account. A low and sprawling building would add no beauty to the river view. A building so much below the street-line would be condemned by all passers-by as mean and unworthy. If you take the river-side site, you must take it with its liabilities. The first and chief of them is that, whether by basement or intrinsic altitude, it must fight against the disadvantages of its depressed level. We know that we may be approaching ticklish ground. The number of steps which must be mounted within the building to be placed there is a chief argument against the Carey Street area. But facts are facts. It would be absurd to alter the site on the plea of beauty, and then ensure the new building not being beautiful. How the discordant claims are to be met is the affair of Mr. Street on one side, and of the lawyers on the other. But as a fragment of the general public who want to have as little to do with lawyers as possible, and who desire at last to behold a serious attempt to make London beautiful for ever, we protest against being juggled out of the Carey Street site, and of the building, such as it is, which can be placed there, merely to find the Law Courts lodged in a wide expanse of low rambling characterless barracks on the river bank. Altitude, sky-line, and pyramidal outline, always very important in a public building planted in a great city, will be tenfold more so in one of such vast area standing so low, with ground so much higher behind, and the claims of all the water space in front exacting something which shall fill the eye as the centre of London's most important prospect.

Sir Charles Trevelyan further urges, with much force, that Somerset House should be so manipulated as to enter into the group of river-side public buildings. We agree with him in the wish, but in doing so we cannot forget the difficulty inherent in the fact that the level from which that House rises is not that of the new quay, but of the old bank. It will not do to consider only the actual Somerset House as in itself complete from top to toe, and overlook the conditions on which it will find itself where it is. For all future purposes the base-line of the structure must be the ground-level of the Embankment itself, and the unlucky strip of unadorned wall between that and the actual building must be converted into, or else masked by, an architectural façade calculated to enhance the altitude of the pile above, and itself correspond with it beneath. The neglect of such a precaution would be even more detrimental to the buildings on the quay than to those upon the higher old level, by bringing into exaggerated prominence the fact of their low-lying. London as yet contains no specimen of one form of public building much relied upon in foreign cities for scenic effect—no doubt of a somewhat artificial description, but none the worse for that—namely, the fountain, which is not propelled upwards like a rocket, but which tumbles and gushes and spreads from out of an architectural composition like those of S. Michel at Paris, and of Trevi at Rome. Such a fountain at this point would be a novel and enjoyable spectacle, from the quay, the river, and Waterloo Bridge. The source from which the water is to come will not be far to seek, if only the low level sewer is ever completed, and Windsor, Staines, and Brentford can ever be coerced into diverting their garbage from the river bed. With the Thames water tolerably unpolluted, and a forcing engine, a cataract might, at a small cost, be produced such as would satisfy the most grandiose imagination. Yet one thing is indispensable. Whatever may be the merit of Chambers's elevation, the whole thing is spoilt from Waterloo Bridge—and would be spoilt from the Strand, if the gazer could get far enough back—by the squalor of the attics and the fantastic ugliness of the chimney tubes. If Somerset House is ever to be drafted into its place as one of a group of monumental structures, it must be capped with a headpiece very different from that with which it has been crowned by a series of wheezy housekeepers.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD.

WITHIN the present week we have had taken from us a remarkable man, whose reputation never can be equal to his deserts. The members of a few learned Societies in London, a few scholars in various parts of Europe, a few personal friends scattered here and there, had the opportunity of appreciating the great abilities, the perfectly marvellous acquirements, of the late Viscount Strangford, but we feel that to the greater part of the general public his name must be a mere sound. It is a grievous disappointment when a man is cut off, like Arnold, Macaulay, and Palgrave, while still engaged on his greatest undertaking, and when, instead of a perfect work, we get only a fragment. But in these cases, the man, though he has not accomplished his work, has at least given proof of his powers, and we perhaps rate the imperfect bequest all the more highly because it is imperfect. It is more grievous still when a man of unusual powers leaves the world without having even attempted anything worthy of his powers. Such a one, while living, we are tempted gently to blame; when he is gone, all other feelings are lost in simple regret. This is pre-eminently the case with Lord Strangford. A scholar, the like of whom we have but few, has not left behind him a single volume to preserve his name among men. A man versed, perhaps beyond all other men, in some of the great questions of the day, himself a member of one branch of the Legislature, has never publicly opened his mouth to enlighten the world on subjects which few knew so well as he. When we see such a man taken away in the prime of life, the regret is deep because the loss is irreparable. The profound and varied knowledge of Lord Strangford has emphatically died with him. All that we can do is to pay such slight tribute to his memory as friendship and admiration can pay.

The linguistic and philological attainments of Lord Strangford were something simply amazing. It was wonderful to talk to a man to whom all the languages of Europe and civilized Asia seemed equally familiar. It was wonderful to hear a man who could discuss the peculiarities of Basque, and Lithuanian, and the Romance of Dacia, and who could also address a native of Sogdiana in the peculiar forms of Turkish and Persian spoken in his native province. But this was not all. The power of speaking a vast number of languages and dialects has often existed in company with very little real philological knowledge, and with very little real intellectual capacity of any kind. It was not so with Lord Strangford. He was a scientific and historical philologer of a high order. There are few men who more emphatically know whence words come and whither they are going. He not only knew a vast number of languages, but he knew all about the languages which he knew. He knew their history, their several stages of growth, their exact relations to one another, and he knew all this in the most intelligent and philosophical way. He had too, beyond most men, his knowledge, as the phrase is, at his fingers' ends. And he was one who thoroughly realized the way in which cognate though not identical studies must be brought to bear upon one another. This is, we need hardly say, especially needful in the case of comparative philology and of history strictly so called. The comparative philologist will be sure to go astray without a pretty considerable knowledge of the political history of the nations with whose tongues he is dealing. And the political historian is equally sure to go astray unless he clearly grasps the relations between the languages of the different nations whose history he writes. Now Lord Strangford could perhaps hardly be called an historian in the strictest sense of the word, one with whom political history was in itself an object of primary study. But on the one hand he had always studied philology in its proper relations to history, and on the other hand he had mastered, as few men have, the political history and condition of those particular nations with which the events of his own life brought him into special contact. Lord Strangford was, in short, an ethnologist in the highest sense of the word. And he brought his ethnological knowledge to bear on times and countries the most remote from one another. His studies made him familiar alike with the past and with the present. He was at the same moment an authority on the present state of Eastern Europe who might rank side by side with Mr. Finlay, and an authority on the earliest state of England who might rank side by side with Dr. Guest. He was equally ready to discuss the relations of the Turk, the Greek, and the Bulgarian at the present moment, and to discuss the exact relations of the Briton, the Scot, and the Englishman in the days of Ceawlin. It seemed wonderful to have to go to one man for the details of the ecclesiastical movement now going on between the Danube and Mount Hæmus, and also for the exact details of the process by which the Welsh tongue retreated before the English, from the Axe to the Parret and from the Parret to the Tamar.

Our last remarks naturally lead us to Lord Strangford's relation to what, in the slang of diplomatists, is called the "Eastern Question." Every one who knew Lord Strangford at all must have known him as one who understood some aspects at least of the state of things in South-Eastern Europe better than any other man living. His official residence in the East gave him special opportunities of study, and his peculiar gifts and tastes enabled him to make use of those opportunities in a way in which few of our Eastern travellers and diplomatists either do or try to do. Lord Strangford's knowledge of the various races of South-Eastern Europe was not the knowledge of a mere diplomatist, or of a mere linguist. It was, as we before said, the knowledge of an ethnologist in the widest sense. With this sort of thorough knowledge, he could not unreservedly throw himself in with any party in Eastern disputes. He was certainly not what is generally understood by a philhellen. But he partook still less in the fashionable idolatry of the Turk. The pity was that, as he was not a philhellen, many people mistook him for a mere Turk. In fact, his Eastern creed, founded upon real knowledge, would be unintelligible to most of those who talk about those matters without understanding them. Not long before his death, he thus described himself. "I am an anti-φιλέλλην, but I am a pro-φιλορωμαῖος." Now such a distinction is most speaking to one who really understands the matter, and the position which Lord Strangford meant to take is simply the position which must be taken by any one who looks on the Christian nations of the East with an intelligent and impartial eye. But such a confession of faith would not do to be made in the hearing of the mass of people who babble about the Eastern question. To such people the distinction intended would seem a mere unintelligible subtlety. The "pro- ιλορωμαῖος" would convey no meaning to them; they would catch at the "anti-φιλέλλην," and would run away with the notion that the man who knew most about the matter was wholly committed to the Turk. Now Lord Strangford was most certainly not committed to the Turk. He took the liveliest interest in all the Christian races of South-Eastern Europe. But in his eyes the Greeks were only one among several races, and they were not the race which he looked on as really the most hopeful. It was among the Bulgarians, rather than among any of their coreligionists, that he saw the best hopes for the regeneration of the Byzantine peninsula. From insurrections and enterprises of conquest he expected little. He held that the future belonged wholly to the Christians, and not to the Mussulmans; but he held that the best policy for the Christians was that of quietness and confidence. He expected much more from the inevitable but gradual decay of the Turkish power and of the Turkish race than from any premature attempts at the realization of any "grand idea." The only objection to this teaching is that it calls for an amount of wisdom and endurance on the part of all the nations concerned which is not likely to be found among the mass of any nation, and among Greeks least of all.

It is really sad to think how small is likely to be the permanent fruit of powers which were so diligently exercised, and of a mind which was so richly stored. We know of no published writings of Lord Strangford's, save some contributions to our own columns and to those of other periodicals, and the chapters which he added to Lady Strangford's book on the Eastern Shores of the Adriatic. These last conveyed a great deal of knowledge and thought in a style very eccentric and very characteristic. But the mass of unpublished matter existing in Lord Strangford's handwriting must be very considerable. He was a letter-writer of a school which has nearly died out. We feel sure that no correspondent of Lord Strangford ever burned a letter of his. His letters ran over alike with wit and with information; there was some happy allusion, some apt sarcasm, in every line. Nor was this all. No one was ever more ready and generous in communicating knowledge. A question on any of his favourite subjects would be rewarded by a letter which was in fact a philological or political treatise composed in his own terse and amusing style. No one had a keener sense of humour; if there was a grotesque side to a thing, Lord Strangford was sure to find it out. And, like all really accurate men, like all men who really live in their work, he had the keenest appreciation of a blunder. It was curious indeed to listen to the half provoked, half amused, way in which he would speak of the grotesque mistakes with regard to his favourite studies which he was constantly coming across. In short, a letter of Lord Strangford's, written in one of his happiest veins, was a mixture of wit and learning which it was really a privilege to receive.

It is not for us to enlarge on, or even to guess at, the causes which hindered Lord Strangford from leaving behind him anything really worthy of his powers. We can only regret that so it is, and that a man who should have been one of the lights of his age in more than one deeply important subject will soon be remembered only by those who had the privilege of his personal friendship. Among them at least his name will never pass out of mind.

REVIEWS.

THE SPECTATOR.*

THE success which marked the bibliopolic marvel of the Globe Shakspeare has produced abundant fruit in the reproduction, in a similarly handy form, of a number of other standard authors, and on the whole the process has conferred distinct advantages on the reading public. But perhaps the present edition of the Spectator attempts to carry these advantages rather further than they can well bear, and gives us decidedly too much of a good thing. To be able to possess a complete work in a single volume, and at a ridiculously small cost, is an undoubted comfort, on certain conditions, which would seem sufficiently obvious if one did not see them violated in more cases than one. If, for example, the advantage of having an entire work in your hand at once is produced at the cost of such smallness of type as to make each page a misery and a burden to anybody with eyes of no more than the usual power, then clearly the comfort of the first condition is more than counterbalanced by the discomfort of the second. Another drawback of the smallness of type in which the text of the present edition is printed lies in the fact that the notes are printed in the same type, and this confuses and distracts the reader beyond even the pitch to which all foot-notes, as such, are likely to confuse and distract him. This is especially to be regretted in the present instance, because Mr. Henry Morley's notes are thoroughly good and useful. They are plentiful, they are accurate and full, and they are neat and pointed. We think the editor has done well also in making his reproduction perfect, in spelling, punctuation, and use of capital letters. The capitals, besides their interest as showing old usage, are especially useful in the present edition, where the type is so small, by breaking the monotony of the page to the eye.

Mr. Henry Morley's Introduction comprises a compound biography of Steele and Addison, in which we notice with much satisfaction the disposition, rapidly growing among critics, to give Steele the full credit of which he has been too long deprived for his great share in making these delightful papers what they were, and in contributing to them many of those elements which have brought to pass their republication a century and a half after they were written. Until within a comparatively recent time the Spectator was understood to mean Addison, and hardly anybody else but Addison. Mr. Morley represents the opposite and increasing tendency to attribute to Steele most of the characteristic excellences of the famous essays, as well as that influence which drew Addison away from the stiff academic walks in which he first trod, to the broader and more human spirit which has secured his fame and popularity. As we turn over the familiar pages once more, it is very easy to see by what a thin wall of partition Addison was divided from the realm of prigs and seventeenth-century criticism. Unlike Steele, he never marched right away from canons, and even in his gayest bits we are not unconscious of the overbred man's little apprehension lest he should give too loose a rein to nature and simplicity. There is nearly always a sediment as of stately condescension even in his purest humour, and we can perceive how small a thing might have turned him into the evil ways of criticism from which it was just beginning to be possible for a man of that era to escape. Though he relished Chevy Chase, for instance, nothing can be more stilted than the whole spirit and manner of his criticism upon it. The idea, which to us is one of the rudiments of critical knowledge, of the spontaneous growth of poetry in the mind, and of its spontaneous assumption of suitable forms, would to anybody prepared as Addison was seem foolishness and a stumbling-block of offence. "I shall only beg pardon for such a profusion of Latin quotations," he says, "which I should not have made use of, but that I feared my own Judgment would have looked too singular on such a Subject, had not I supported it by the practice and authority of Virgil." The same tone animates the famous criticism on Milton. It was immensely to Addison's credit that he should have admired Milton as he did, in such an age, but at the same time we may gather from the reasons on which he grounded his admiration that he was not radically removed in critical principle from those who detested or despised Milton. The critical method of that time was the supreme embodiment in art of that abstract or metaphysical way of looking at things of which we have seen so much, and from which we have suffered so much, in regions that are considered far more exalted than art—in philosophy, theology, morals, and physical science. The critic constructed an abstract ideal, partly out of his own head, and partly from the practice of certain great poets. But his observation of the details of the practice was incomplete, and if his attention was solicited to a detail which jarred with his ideal, so much the worse for the detail and the poet. Thus he built his ideal and drew his rules out of Homer and Virgil. Similes, for example, ought to be marked by dignity; therefore, when Virgil resorted to the simile of the whip-top, he was breaking a rule. Homer, too, broke many rules in the same way; in other words, both these poets violated canons which had no other sanction or authority than had been assumed from their own ordinary usage. This was the system to which Addison inclined, and which diffused a certain coldness over his least studied criticisms. That it did not penetrate deeper, and colour and stiffen his own creations, was probably due, as Mr. Henry Morley says, to the influence which his unaffected and genial friend exercised over him from school and college days. "It was Steele who caused the nice critical taste which Addison might have spent only in accordance with the fleeting fashions of his time to be inspired with all Addison's religious earnestness, and to be enlivened with the free play of that sportive humour, delicately whimsical and gaily wise, which made his conversation the delight of the few men with whom he sat at ease."

We are inclined to think, however, that, in the passage from which these words are taken, Mr. Morley has considerably overstated the consciousness and deliberateness with which he assumes Steele to have broken entirely loose from the artificialities of his time. "Steele's sympathies," he says, "were with all England; Defoe and he, with eyes upon the future, were the truest leaders of their time," and so on. Surely this is to attribute to the artist a consciousness of rule and aim which is as unreal as the consciousness that was attributed to him by the older critics in another way. From all that is known of Steele, we should much doubt whether he was at all the kind of man who would be likely to think about the future at all; and the saying that his sympathies were with all England can only mean that he had a nature vividly impressible for all forms and manners of life, that his blood flowed quick, and that he was generally lively, tender, sympathetic, and human. It was not because he thought about forms of literature, or the tendencies of art in his time, or the future generation, but simply because he wrote as he felt, and without any specific thinking about literature, that his work is what it is—natural, truthful, broad, and humorous. There is an immense amount of cant talked about truth in workmanship; but one may say that it was just its truth and reality which has made Steele's work endure; and it is because, as we hope, truth and reality are characteristics of modern art, and have been increasingly so for this century at any rate, that we find Steele's writing still delightful to us. It was the unconscious and spontaneous expression of life, and this is the sort of writing which goes on living. Besides, it is of little purport to call a man the leader of his time when he led nowhither. There was natural force and stuff about the Queen Anne essayists, but what of their successors in all kinds of production through the reigns of George I. and George II.? Even down to the end of the century Goldsmith is the one essayist who approaches to Steele's freshness, gaiety, and truthfulness. All the rest that we have in this order is as barren as it had ever been before. Johnson had much of Steele's genial tenderness, pity, and essential good-fellowship, but when he came to write, do not the pages of the Rambler, Rasselas, and we know not what else, reveal the lowest depths to which human ponderosity can go? The great lexicographer, as Boswell calls him, had a notion which a great many people have still, that life is one thing and literature another, and that it is not the business of the author to bring the two into one. There is more than one passage in Steele's papers which reminds us of the familiar anecdote of old Johnson carrying a wretched woman of the town home on his back, and Steele is dearest to us of all the Queen Anne men because, in the best of his pictures and reflections, he reproduced the Shakspearian kind of tenderness that prompted such an action as this. And this is connected with the fact that Steele is much less addicted than Addison to the sententiously didactic strain—as much less in fact than Addison, as Addison was less addicted to it than Johnson. He has always less of the air of the professional or professorial moralist about him. As compared with later writers, however, both of them are entitled to a measure of the same praise. Their pages are full of life and stir, of men and women, of the facts of the street and the tavern and the playhouse. The reader's fancy is fixed by living pictures, often at the very outset; and if not at the outset, then surely before he has had time to grow weary. The most general kind of meditation is tacked to some particular bit of actual circumstance. Who would suppose that he was beginning an Essay on Death, when the opening words tell him that "Upon taking my Seat in a Coffee-house, I often draw the Eyes of the whole Room upon me, when in the hottest Season of News, and at a time that perhaps the Dutch Mail is just come in, they hear me ask the Coffee-man for his last Week's Bill of Mortality; I find that I have been sometimes taken on this occasion for a Parish Sexton, sometimes for an Undertaker, and sometimes for a Doctor of Physick"? It cannot be denied that there is something exceedingly attractive in this lively and graphic way of opening a grave subject, while it is still in perfect keeping.

Perhaps nowhere else in literature is the mixture of grave and lively, of general and particular, of the anecdotic and the didactic, managed with such easy skill, such entire concealment of the art that produces these delightful results. The essay in which Addison complains of the ungracefulness of gesture which distinguishes our English orators—a complaint of which the reader might have been reminded as often as he chose during the last autumn—contains, though shortly, some good illustrations of the success with which, like a true humourist, he knew how to make one smile, without drawing too near the unseemly region of the grin. Nothing is more ridiculous, he decides, than the gestures of an English speaker:—"You see some of them running their Hands into their Pockets as far as ever they can thrust them, and others looking with great attention on a piece of Paper that has nothing written in it; you may see many a smart Rhetorician turning his Hat in his hand, moulding it into several different Cocks, examining sometimes the Lining of it, sometimes the Button, during the whole course of his Harangue; a deaf Man would think he was Cheap'ning a Beaver, when perhaps he is talking of the fate of the British Nation." All this is very happy and playful, and might perhaps have proved more effective than angrier remonstrances that have been showered on public speakers since Queen Anne's time, if only the member of Parliament, oratorical by wish rather than by capacity, were open to appeals of any kind.

Then the perfume of literature which rises in the midst of all their closeness to the town life of the hour in the papers both of Addison and of Steele, lends another charm to them. There is always a delicate bookish flavour about them; this is ensured by the Latin motto, if there is nothing else; but in most of them there is, besides the motto, a subtle undertone of bookishness that is particularly delightful, even to people who could not tell distinctly what it is that they find so attractive. Of all delightful characteristics in an essay, none is more excellent than this mixture, in which the writers of the Spectator were so happy, of active sympathy with life, and a scholarly relish for polite learning. Several senses at once seem to be gratified by the combination. Perhaps this, after all, is the most conspicuous feature of these essays—variety of tones, with the most exquisite moderation and balance in each; reality without grossness, sprightliness without flippancy, bookishness without pedantry. The result is like some culinary masterpiece, in which it is impossible to distinguish this or that crude element, whilst the omission or slightest excess of any one of them would spoil the whole effect. This consideration shows the absurdity of the conventional recommendation of the Spectator to young students as a complete model of style. The young student will be able to write like Steele and Addison when he knows as much about life as they did, when he feels as deeply about it, when his knowledge of books is as mellowed as theirs was, and when he has their kindliness of feeling; and by this time he will unquestionably have formed a style of his own which will be a great deal more becoming than any that he could have borrowed either from them or anybody else. Their style has one quality perhaps which their example may recommend, and in which our ardent times are defective; we mean a certain moderation, temperance, or reserve of statement and argument. And yet in politics the Queen Anne writers, Steele included, could be at least as virulent and angry as the warmest of our contemporaries.

MR. GRANT DUFF'S POLITICAL SURVEY.*

A BOOK like Mr. Grant Duff's Political Survey admits of but one kind of treatment at the hands of a reviewer. It cannot be abridged, for it is itself an abridgment of the history of the world beyond the British Empire for the year with which it deals. It cannot be quoted, at least to any great extent, for the object with which it is written leads the author to prefer the known to the unknown, and to content himself, for the most part, with recapitulating for the benefit of his constituents the most trustworthy information on foreign politics that has been published in 1868. What can be done is to give Mr. Grant Duff's incidental statements the critical attention which his character as a politician demands. Even this slender volume is not all narrative; there is an occasional admixture of theory with the facts which make the staple of its contents. From some of these theories we find ourselves obliged to dissent, and we now propose to give our reasons for doing so.

Mr. Grant Duff calls the opinion that "Germany will or can become aggressive as against France" a fallacy "not to be forgiven in a politician," and he quotes, in complimentary italics, M. Guizot's distinction that "Prussia is an ambitious Power, not a revolutionary Power." The two statements are not so irreconcileable as Mr. Grant Duff implies. If the degree of unity now enjoyed by Northern Germany had been attained by a peaceful process, or if the Government to whose vigour it is attributable were of a genuinely constitutional sort, the ambition of Prussia might have no dangers for her neighbours. But though, as Mr. Grant Duff truly says, this ambition "is an ambition bounded by the limits of Germany," it is not for that reason necessarily identical with the ambition of Germany. Prussia, that is to say, has designs of her own. The unity of Germany is an essential element in those designs, but it is so as a means, not as an end. Germany must be united, because without this Prussian ambition must stop short of its natural boundary. But for precisely the same reason Germany must not be suffered to achieve its unity on any other terms than those dictated by Prussia. If the arbitrary character of the Berlin administration were to excite, as it may easily do, serious dissatisfaction in the annexed provinces, or if the democratic and particularist party in the South should so increase in strength as to offer serious obstacles to the extension of the Prussian power beyond the Main, it might become essential to the success of Count Bismark's policy that the flagging enthusiasm of the German people should be roused by a foreign war. That Germany, left to her natural development, would never be an aggressive Power, is true; that Prussia would not be aggressive, in the sense of desiring to annex territory beyond the present limits of Germany, is perhaps true also. But that Prussia might adopt an aggressive policy abroad, as an instrument for carrying out her policy at home, is quite within the limits of possibility; and, being so, it does to some extent justify the anxiety—in many cases no doubt the exaggerated anxiety—which is generally expressed by French writers on the subject. Nor should it be forgotten that national greatness is in a measure relative; and if the French people see their country no longer the predominant Power in Europe, it is not unnatural that they should feel some annoyance at the change of position. In common minds patriotism is usually largely alloyed with vanity, and an entire absence of the fault might argue an equal absence of the correlative virtue. It would certainly be better if nations could view questions of foreign policy with absolute unselfishness, but we doubt whether any people has come near enough to this ideal to be warranted in throwing stones at its neighbours. At all events Mr. Grant Duff is still a long way from such a consummation, since he tells us that, "if we are to choose between the foreign policy "of M. Prévost-Paradol" and the foreign policy of the Imperial Government, we cannot have a moment's hesitation in thanking heaven that the grip of a power which has hitherto proved irresistible is at the throat of all those who sit at the feet of M. Thiers." As Mr. Grant Duff entertains this feeling, it is certainly well that he should give it a devotional expression. Less grateful spirits may be permitted to doubt whether the misfortunes of your neighbours are a legitimate subject for thanksgiving, and whether, supposing the French Liberals should ever get their throats out of the grip and be able to give effect to their policy, their good will towards us would be much promoted by such displays of pious emotion.

Mr. Grant Duff is evidently anxious to write with perfect fairness on the concerns of the United States. But he is apter at discerning the drift of political currents than the position of political landmarks. He is by no means disposed to think that whatever is is best, but it would be very hard to persuade him that whatever will be is not best. It is this faith in the future, perhaps, that leads him to underrate the case against the Republican party in America. He has no wish unduly to influence his readers, for he gives large extracts from the American Correspondent of the Spectator, who has of late been anything but inclined to worship the powers that be; but his own sympathies are obviously the other way. As a consequence of this, he misapprehends the position of the Republicans in American history. They "are," he says, "essentially the same political connexion which was headed by Washington, Alexander Hamilton, and Adams, and which was known originally as the Federalist party." This may be the true pedigree of the Republican party, but it is not the true pedigree of Republican principles. It does not do justice to the great statesmen of 1787. Alexander Hamilton would not have owned the offspring whom Mr. Grant Duff seeks to affiliate upon him. There is only a superficial resemblance between the policy which sought to strengthen the Government against anarchy and the policy which seeks to invest with absolute power a numerical majority of the nation. Hamilton's theories, if they could have been carried out, would have given additional force to the Executive, and surrounded the Constitution with additional safeguards. His putative descendants are ready to sacrifice Executive and Constitution alike at the arbitrary bidding of Congress. By a singular inversion the end at which Hamilton aimed, and against which Jefferson contended—the subjection of the popular will to constitutional checks—came to be set at nought by those who claim to hold Hamilton's principles, and to be carried out by those who claim to hold Jefferson's principles. The doctrine of State rights was in its origin a mere assertion of popular sovereignty against law; it grew at last to be an assertion of the sovereignty of the law against the popular will. Herein lies the difference between the Southern excesses which Mr. Grant Duff so justly condemns, and the Northern excesses which by comparison seem to him so pardonable. The "terrorism and brutality" which disgraced the Southern States last autumn, and contributed so materially to the defeat of the Democratic candidates, were outrages upon law. The reconstruction policy of the Republican party has been for the most part a perversion of law. The former may seem the worst at the time, but in the long run the latter is infinitely the most dangerous. Acts of murderous violence are bad enough while they last, but if the law has force enough at its back they can be put down sooner or later. But for reckless and impolitic legislation there is no cure save in that radical change in the popular mind of the unlikelihood of which the legislation in question is itself the most convincing sign. If the salt have lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted? We do not claim for the Democrats any higher praise than that of having accidentally got hold of a principle which they seem incompetent to apply, but even this is a more hopeful state than that avowed disregard of the doctrines that lie at the very root of American liberty which characterizes the policy of their opponents.

Mr. Grant Duff's recent appointment to an Under-Secretaryship of State for India gives additional interest to his views upon the position of Russia in Central Asia. For this reason we draw attention to them, although in this instance we have to express agreement instead of dissent. After giving an outline of the recent progress of Russia in the three khanates of Khiva, Bokhara, and Khokand, Mr. Grant Duff continues:—"From this advance of Russia three evils may accrue to us—1. She may actually make an attempt on India, with a serious view to conquest; 2. She may make an attack on India by way of feint, in order to distract our attention from her designs on Turkey; and lastly, she may, by her very presence, excite unrest and disturbance amongst our own Indian subjects and feudatories." The first of these possibilities Mr. Grant Duff dismisses as one with which the present generation is not concerned. For a good many years to come Russia has quite work enough upon her hands in consolidating and extending her Empire north of the Himalaya. And, we may add, if we cannot in the course of another generation make the benefits of our rule in India sufficiently felt to secure us against any foreign competitor in the affection of our native subjects, we shall ill deserve to retain the great position which has devolved upon us. The second danger seems perhaps more serious to Mr. Grant Duff now than it did when he wrote his lecture. The conquest of Central Asia is probably regarded at St. Petersburg far more from a European than from an Asiatic point of view. And if Russia should again entertain designs upon Turkey which England is forced to resist at any cost, it is difficult to exaggerate the aid she might derive from her position at the gate of India. In such an event as this the second and third dangers enumerated by Mr. Grant Duff would really be reduced to one. "Unrest and disturbance" among our own Indian subjects would serve the purpose of Russia quite as well as the most formidable "attack by way of feint." Her object would be to find occupation for British troops, and to induce us to consent to an ultimate loss of prestige in Europe rather than risk an immediate loss of power in India. We do not know that the practical conclusion from these premisses can be better stated than they are by Mr. Grant Duff. He would have us in the first place perfect to the utmost our military communications in India, so that in case of need we could concentrate our troops with the utmost possible rapidity. In the event of a war with Russia the problem to be solved will be how to hold India without unduly weakening our army in Europe, and a small army which can be easily moved from place to place is equal to a much larger one without that advantage. Secondly, he would have us conciliate our Indian subjects by promoting their interests in every possible way—in other words, by doing our duty towards them. And thirdly, he would have our Government kept constantly informed of everything that happens in Central Asia. In taking leave of Mr. Grant Duff we need only add that A Political Survey, like everything he writes on similar subjects, is full of information which could not be obtained elsewhere without considerable and sustained labour.

LEONORA CASALONI.*

MOST of us are unlucky enough to have a travelled friend who will insist on forcing on us his foreign experiences, in season and out of season. He really knows a good deal more of what he talks of than you do, and for a time interests you accordingly; but it never seems to strike him that one may have too much of a good thing. Moreover, sooner or later he takes to repeating himself, and then you come to regard him as a positive bore, and the irritating sense of boredom makes you slow to tolerate him, even when he handles his pet theme with some force and originality. This is much the case with Mr. Adolphus Trollope, and in Leonora Casaloni there is a marked falling off both in force and originality. For most people an occasional winter in Italy is enough, with perhaps a summer, once in a way, in the Piano di Sorrento, or at the Baths of Lucca. But Mr. Trollope insists on your staying there till the paradise becomes a prison. The most lovely scenery palls on one after a time, and the more heavenly the sky, the greater the monotony of beauty. You cannot transfer to the pages of a book the changing play of lights, the blazing sunsets, the limpid moonbeams that charm you in the body into a dolce far niente life, nor can the novel-reader in search of excitement live by scenery alone. Mr. Trollope has gathered a magnificent store of properties; he has wandered over Italy as few men have done, has informed himself on its climate, botany and geology, and the manners of its people, and is undeniably strong in its provincial geography. It is hard to have to throw away so much valuable material while it is nearly as good as new; and so he goes on, putting his characters on the stage with all the familiar accessories, hoping that the audience may fail to recognise their old acquaintances in new combinations. And perhaps his hope might not be disappointed, were there any range of individuality in those characters to fix attention on themselves, and distract it from their dresses. But the local colouring is strong everywhere except where you most care to find it. As for any delicate analysis of the Italian cast of mind that they exhibit, the personages of Leonora Casaloni might just as well be English or Esquimaux of the most every-day type. The stock passions of universal fiction run their common course with them, unless when influenced broadly by some conspicuous native institution—insurrection, brigandage, clerical celibacy, or the foundling hospitals. There is not an attempt at getting to the finer springs that may be supposed peculiar to the Italian species of the human family. Yet character is the only stratum where a novel-writer like Mr. Trollope, who confines his labours to the same narrow "claim," can look for nuggets. Mr. Trollope makes opportunities too, but only to neglect them, and, whether from incapacity or indolence—we do not pretend to say which—carefully avoids the most likely places. There is a churchman for instance, high in rank, and represented as ambitious. In obedience to family circumstances, and under the influence of a lady of birth with whom he has formed a liaison in his youth, he abandons the career on whose success he had staked his hopes, unfrocks himself, and returns to the world. Struggles of this sort between mundane and spiritual ambition—or, as in the lady's case, between virtue and love debarred from marriage—are like the works of Michael Angelo, to be studied at Rome with especial advantage, and they are just the studies in which an artist who makes Italy persistently his field may be held bound to show his strength. But the Monsignore and the lady are left as sketchy and colourless as the rest of the characters; and these, so far as they may be said to be worked out at all, are touched with the hesitating hand of an artist who is groping in a twilight of vague ideas. The book gives the impression of a story brought out in serial parts, produced as they were wanted; the original plan fading from the author's mind as he wrote on, while he had no means of bringing the bits of his work into harmony by a reference to his original conceptions. In the villain of the tale, the great feature is his habitual mysterious absences from his home, to which he only returns to treat its inmates with capricious brutality. He deals constantly in threats of shooting and stabbing, and if ever there was a ruffian predestined to romantic vengeance at the end of a novel, Sandro Vallardi is the man. It was within the prerogative of the novelist to prepare a surprise for us by bringing him to repentance through the agency of his gentle wife or bewitching daughter; yet the sole road to penitence in Italy is through confession, and we submit that Mr. Trollope tacitly bound himself to let us into the secret of Vallardi's delinquencies. But Vallardi is left to live rich and impenitent, to see his schemes crowned with complete success; so perhaps Mr. Trollope felt a certain compunction about marring the rascal's future by blowing his character among his neighbours. This is but one instance among many, and generally both characters and plot are as much out of keeping with the conventionalities of fiction as with the possibilities of real life.

The story is a comedy of errors, turning on the exchange of two children at nurse, and the effects of the Roman law in legitimating illegitimate offspring by subsequent marriage. It is the same with Leonora Casaloni as with Dream Numbers and others of Mr. Trollope's books. We rise from the perusal with the impression that Italian craft has been greatly overrated, and that in reality the Italians are anything but a shrewd people. Leonora Casaloni is sent out of the way, and put to nurse with Vallardi's wife. The woman finds she can only bring up one of the two children, and her husband, thinking that Leonora may one day prove valuable, keeps her at home, and sends his own daughter to the foundling hospital at Florence. Considering that one child was dark and the other fair, that there were plenty of neighbours living around the Vallardis, that in particular one gossiping woman and a mischievous lad attached to the house were in the secret of the exchange, it seemed unlikely that Vallardi could persuade people that it was really his own child he had kept. But, as if to make what was improbable impossible, he lets the child he does keep retain her name of Leonora, although the priest who performed the baptismal ceremony, to say nothing of the neighbours, must have known that the name of the child christened there was Stella. However, Mr. Trollope, having thus laid a solid foundation for his story, proceeds to build an appropriate superstructure. Leonora grows up very beautiful, and, so far as we can judge, rather stupid. Il Gufone, the knavish lad mentioned before, described as a monster in looks and an imp in mind, and who had already attained manhood while she was a baby, falls desperately in love with her. His feeling towards her "was the only form of worship that his mind had ever known; and doubtless he was, poor ungraced creature, infinitely the better even for that form of it." So it appears, indeed, in the sequel. But he finds a rival, and, as might be expected, a successful one. By an odd coincidence, Vallardi meets in a convent on the opposite coast of Italy the young Marchese Cesare Casaloni, cousin of Leonora, who is skulking from justice after having taken part in an unsuccessful rebellion. The youth, while his life is at stake, blurts out his whole story to an utter stranger of most unprepossessing manners. His instinctive confidence is not misplaced, and he becomes the inmate of Vallardi's house, which furnishes an additional guarantee for his safety, as being in the neighbourhood of his own villa, just where he was most likely to be recognised. He engages himself to Leonora. He goes to Rome, where the same confiding nature makes him accept for gospel, and without inquiry, all that a relative who has an interest in the family estate directly antagonistic to his own chooses to tell him. He renounces Leonora, and marries the daughter of this relative, the Marchese Casaloni, the ex-prelate, whom that nobleman has reclaimed from the foundling hospital. Of course the betrayer is betrayed, and the girl he has married turns out the daughter of Vallardi, greatly to the delight of that gentleman, who has palmed off his child on a husband he fancies so eligible. And as if these complications and coincidences were not enough, in two short volumes, to tax our memories and faith to the utmost, now Il Gufone comes forward in his true character, the veritable head of the Casalonis. It appears that his father had consented to salve with a marriage the conscience of a dying girl, the daughter of a sacristan, whom he had seduced; that the maternal grandfather of Il Gufone, although he knew all, had never told him anything; that his paternal grandfather had assented to the mésalliance of his son, and kept the proofs in his possession, neither producing nor destroying them; and that this old marquis had died in the very nick of time without confessing the secret, but bequeathing the manipulation of his family papers to a priest, who handed them over to the sacristan. What strikes one as much as the strange good fortune by which the numberless proofs necessary to the development of the story are preserved, is the facility with which they are received; and the way in which questionable looking evidence, flowing through tainted channels, is welcomed by those most interested in rejecting it as confirmation strong as proof of holy writ. However, the change in Il Gufone's worldly prospects is not more startling than that wrought in his moral nature. From a shock-headed ungainly Caliban, with a quality which he boasts as wit, but which strikes us rather as impudence, he passes into a high-bred gentleman of rare delicacy of feeling and a refinement of free-handed generosity unusual even in French vaudevilles or Oriental fables. This transformation of a gnome into an angel of light is none the less miraculous if we are to refer it to the chastening influence of his passion for Leonora; for, as we said, she is simply a good-looking peasant girl, easily caught by the shallow attractions of Cesare Casaloni. At any rate we have now everything arranged, by a series of somewhat forced expedients, for a catastrophe that shall reward virtue and punish selfishness and vice. Leonora, recognising the beauties of her handiwork in Il Gufone, and alive to the worthlessness of her first fancy, shall marry her cousin, the veritable Marquis of Casaloni, and the two shall live happily ever after. But the parentage of Il Gufone is not the last or the greatest of the startling surprises which Mr. Trollope has in store for us. Having collected, with a lavish expenditure of probabilities, the materials for an appropriate dénouement, he suddenly decides to dispense with them, perhaps with an eye to unity in his effects, and that he might keep his work consistently unnatural throughout. The false, cowardly Cesare has thrown over Leonora and married Stella, in the belief that the latter is the heiress. He has shown scarcely a sign of hesitation or remorse to enlist our sympathies in extenuation of his conduct. Vallardi has done his best to bring the marriage about, that he may have a rich son-in-law at his disposal. And now Il Gufone stands out as the rightful heir and avenging Providence. His education has been one of vice and rascality; if he has improved, it has been by the influence of a wild love and fidelity for Leonora, whose life Cesare and Vallardi have blighted; he is driven to despair, for Leonora refuses his love, and he knows Cesare to be the worthless cause of her refusal—for in mind and manners, as in birth and wealth, he is now an unimpeachable match. It was but the other day that he was vowing vengeance on Vallardi. Yet this Italian, an outcast trained in the worst possible school, not only renounces vengeance, forgiving his enemies and those of Leonora, but actually loads them with benefits. He resigns the family honours—we do not pretend to say how far Roman law would bear him out in this—and estates in favour of Cesare, and he and Leonora retire à la Roland and his love, to a couple of convents, perched on a couple of hills, where they live respected, and die in the odour of sanctity. As the shrewd and impulsive Gufone showed so self-sacrificing and forgiving a spirit, perhaps Mr. Trollope could do no less; it may be the force of his hero's example that induced him to leave Vallardi unmasked and Cesare in possession of the fortune which he deserved to lose twenty times over.

If the subordinate personages are somewhat more natural than their betters, we cannot say that they are much more amusing. There is a Dr. Profondi—a most lifelike representation, we are bound to say, of the prosing lawyer—who keeps us on thorns, and his unlucky client on tenterhooks, through the several chapters in which he slowly unfolds the wonderful story of Il Gufone. But that original waits the eventful disclosure with an imperturbable equanimity which we can only envy. Then Mr. Trollope is even more successful than usual in making the dialogue lose any Italian flavour as he strains it through English idiom, commonplace, and slang; while, had he been more successful in exciting our interest, the running commentary which explains the difference between Italian ways and ours would have been simply intolerable. By far the best parts of the book are the descriptions of the country, and those especially to whom the Tuscan Maremma is familiar may like to refresh their impressions of it. But if Mr. Trollope proposes to continue his handbooks of Italian life and scenery, we should suggest his seeking novelties in the days of Realmah and the Sheviri, or else precipitating himself forward into a Utopian future, when the Maremma and Pontine marshes will be model farms, and the Pontiffs hold their Court at Dublin or Quito. At least he could scarcely write anything more unreal than Leonora Casaloni.

STATISTICS OF CHURCH HISTORY.*

THE late Dean Milman has effectually wiped away the reproach brought some years ago by Dr. Newman against English literature, that our only Church historian was the infidel Gibbon. Yet, great as is the value, and still greater the charm, of Milman's Latin Christianity, it leaves the student of ecclesiastical history much to desire. We do not mean merely that it ends with the pontificate of Nicolas V., but that it does more to popularize and diffuse a knowledge of the mediæval Church than to increase or define it. And this is, of course, still truer of the graceful sketches—for they are little more—of certain periods and events contributed by Dean Stanley to the same department of literature. It would perhaps be difficult to find two writers equally picturesque and attractive among German Professors; but they at least are "men of facts, as Germans should be," and a careful and minute exhibition of all ascertainable facts is, above all things, necessary in dealing with a subject-matter where opinions are so diverse, and passions are apt to be so strong. It has often said that writers on Church history show a te[illegible] unbelievers or heretics from seeing how little the [illegible] to the ideal. We rather suspect the saying is a h[illegible] from Eusebius and Gibbon, but it is easy to understand what is meant. A thoroughgoing partisan, like Mosheim or Rohrbacker, finds it all plain sailing enough. The unbroken line of Pontiffs from Peter to Pius IX., or the intermittent but constantly reviving succession of condemned sectaries—Protestants before the Reformation—marks the one track of light and beauty that relieves the darkness of this world's midnight sea. Troublesome critics like Dr. Maitland have unearthed some ugly facts about the Waldenses, which no good Protestant ought ever to have allowed himself to speak of, even if he was so perverse as to believe them; and there are better authenticated stories than the silly fable of Pope Joan, which do not fit in quite comfortably with the Ultramontane annals of the Papacy. But an historian like those we have named does not stick at straws. To him all Popes are the infallible and impeccable representatives of truth and holiness, or all whom Popes have persecuted are suffering saints of whom the world was not worthy. Any little difficulties that may be started are met at once by the old retort that, after all, nothing is so misleading as facts and figures. It is De Maistre, if we remember rightly, who says that history is a grand conspiracy against truth. No doubt the reproach has often been justly incurred, and not least by writers of his own school; nor can we wonder if many have turned in weariness or disgust from what seemed to them an unprofitable study, under the conviction that history is a mere repertory of data for the support or establishment of preconceived theories. Even among secular historians the most attractive are often the least trustworthy, and few indeed have attained that standard of absolute indifference which experience seems to point to as an indispensable condition for the impartial treatment of the more delicate and exciting problems of Church history. Rationalist critics in Germany have done much to correct the onesidedness of both Catholic and Protestant annalists. But the example of Gibbon would be enough to prove that a rejection of Christianity is no sure guarantee for approaching without partiality or passion the history of the Christian Church.

For these reasons, among others, we hail with sincere satisfaction the completion of Mr. Leitch's translation of Wiltsch's Handbuch der kirchlichen Geographie und Statistik, the second volume of which has just appeared. Professor Maurice, at whose suggestion the translator undertook his task, observes, in a short preface, that "those who are most suspicious of German commentaries on the principles of Church history may be anxious to avail themselves of German industry in collecting information about its external details." Such information is indeed equally necessary for students of every school of thought, seeing that the Church is not merely the organ "of transcendent doctrines, but a Society which has a habitation on this earth of ours." We can quite conceive that to many the title of the book may sound repulsive, and perhaps hardly intelligible. Nor can it be denied that it would be a very dry book to read through consecutively. But then it is not meant for reading through, but for reference. It is a handbook, or manual, not a history; and for this purpose it will be found invaluable to the student, the more so as each volume is supplied with a copious alphabetical index. We may suggest, however, that the addition of a table of contents would be an improvement in future editions. To the question, which may have occurred to some of our readers, as to what is precisely meant by the "Geography and Statistics of the Church," the author shall reply for himself. After observing that "ecclesiastical geography and statistics embrace, in a general way, all that became remarkable in Church history," and especially the seats of patriarchs, bishops, convents, schools, places where councils were held, and the like, he proceeds to specify more particularly the subject-matter of the work:—

> The main objects which should be attained by ecclesiastical geography and statistics are:—
> (1.) To give a clear view of the diffusion of Christianity in relation to other religions, the Jewish, Pagan, and Mahometan. A survey of the first of these is the more necessary, as it must be considered as a preparation for Christianity in heathen lands; for it was essential that the doctrine of the one true God should be known to the heathens beforehand, in order that Christianity might find easier entrance among them. The dispersion of the Jews, therefore, throughout almost all countries of the earth then known, preceded Christianity in the wise dispensation of God. There the Jews were to the heathens what John the Baptist was to the Jews in their own country.
>
> (2.) A survey must be given of the relations of the larger divisions of the Christian Church to one another, consequently of the patriarchates and the ecclesiastical [illegible] situated therein; also, generally, of the diocesan constitution in these and the Christian districts, which were independent of great ecclesiastical head; the spread of different Christian sects, for example, the Nestorians, Jacobites, &c., must also be brought under view.
>
> (3.) All important places must be noticed according to their degree of hierarchical consideration, in order to ascertain which of them were seats of patriarchs, metropolitans, and bishops, and which were institutions for theological education, leading monasteries, places where councils were held, &c.
>
> (4.) The rise and disappearance of the different Christian institutions in each country must be stated in chronological order.
>
> Acts of councils, and especially the signatures which are found therein, papal letters, and ecclesiastical annals, must be mentioned as main sources.

of ecclesiastical geography and statistics. Available sources are also contained in old chronicles and monographies of particular countries and cities.

There are but few works on the subject extant, and these are almost entirely useless, with the exception of Metropolitanarum Urbium Historia Civilis et Ecclesiastica of Cantelius for the west, and Le Quien's Oriens Christianus.

The best source for the east is the Bibliotheca Orientalis of Assemanus.

The history is divided into four periods—the first reaching to Constantine; the second, to the time of Mahomet; the third, to the year 1073 (the accession of Hildebrand); the fourth, including "the palmiest days of the Roman Church," to 1216 (the death of Innocent III.); the fifth and last, to the beginning of the Reformation. The amount of information compressed into two moderate-sized volumes, containing together barely a thousand pages, is really enormous, and copious references and annotations are supplied throughout. In a dry record of facts there is of course little scope for graces of style or for the obtrusion of individual opinion. So far as we have observed, the author has conscientiously abstained from any attempt to go beyond his province as an accurate chronicler and statistician, and his language is clear and simple, and clearly translated by Mr. Leitch, who quite deserves the praise Mr. Maurice accords to him. We may observe, by the way, that "Roman," and not "Romish," is the proper rendering of the German Römischer, which is a purely local designation, while our word Romish has a quasi-theological, not to say controversial, sound. When it is said (p. 73) "that if such bishop appealed to the Romish bishop his cause should be renewed," we presume "renewed" is a misprint for reheard.

The rise and growth of the primacy of the Roman See is fairly and concisely stated, but we are surprised to find a German Professor at this time of day declining to pronounce any opinion as to "whether the grant of Constantine the Great is genuine or not." And we are still more surprised not to find any allusion to the Isidorian decretals which had so momentous an influence on the development of Papal power in the West, though forming one link only in a long chain of forgeries. There is scarcely a trace, again, of any reference to the great schism of East and West, unless we are to understand the following very perplexing passage in the second volume as referring to it:—"That the Pope possessed the primacy over the whole West, and that he also received it over the dioceses of Antioch and Jerusalem from the beginning of the twelfth century, and over the diocese of Constantinople from the beginning of the thirteenth century, is a thing so well known that I had some hesitation whether I should say a single word on the subject." What can be the meaning of this extraordinary statement? How and from whom did the Pope "receive" the primacy over the Patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem at the beginning of the twelfth century, and over the Patriarch of Constantinople at the beginning of the thirteenth? Dr. Wiltsch had told us, quite correctly, in his former volume that the primacy "was publicly confirmed to him by a synodal decree" at the (Eastern) Councils of Constantinople, in 381, and Chalcedon, in 451. If he means to say here that it was never acknowledged by the Eastern Patriarchs, the statement can only be accepted with considerable reservations. At all events, if they did not recognise it before the twelfth century, still less did they recognise it afterwards, when they had broken off all official relations with the Western Church. The only sense in which it can be said that the Pope received jurisdiction over Antioch and Jerusalem at the beginning of the twelfth century is that the Latin kingdom of Jerusalem was founded at that period by the Crusaders, and that a Latin empire and Latin patriarchate were established at Constantinople in 1204, after the city had been taken in the fourth crusade. For a graphic account of the circumstances attending their establishment, which were not very creditable to those concerned, we may refer our readers to the second volume of Mr. Ffoulkes's Christendom's Divisions, reviewed last year in our columns. The Empire only lasted half a century, but the Patriarch survives to our own day as a titular dignitary resident at Rome, where he contributes a picturesque variety to the great ceremonials of the Church. We presume, from the dates assigned, that this is what Dr. Wiltsch really means, but he has, to say the least, chosen a singularly odd way of expressing himself. And he should have added, that the line of Eastern Patriarchs in these "dioceses" has continued all along, in open defiance of the primacy of Rome.

We have another criticism, of a negative kind, to make. It is disappointing, in a work of reference for Church history, to find no syllable of information about Councils, either general or provincial, beyond a bare record of the dates and places of their assemblage. It would have added very little to the bulk of the work, and would surely not have been going beyond the province of ecclesiastical statistics, to have given us a brief summary of the more important acts of at least the General Councils, of which there are only twenty previous to the Council of Trent. And considering that more than half of them were almost exclusively occupied with matters of discipline and jurisdiction, the omission seems the more unaccountable in such a manual as the present. These blemishes, however, do not affect the general value of the book, and do not at all diminish our gratitude to the translator for his useful and unpretentious labour in bringing it before the notice of English readers. Translation is always a troublesome, and is too apt to be a thankless, task. It is, therefore, only due to Mr. Leitch to express our sincere agreement with Professor Maurice's opinion "that he is conferring a very great benefit upon schools, Universities, and private students by his enterprise." Though we could wish that the work was in some respects more complete, there is none, so far as we know, in the English language that would at all supply its place.

THE TRAVELS OF A HINDOO.*

THE chronic practices of Indian Viceroys have led us to invent the euphemistic term annexationist; our familiarity with Indian camps has enriched the English tongue with the convenient word loot; and our system of Indian education has produced Baboo Bholanauth Chunder. Not once or twice in these columns have we had occasion to expose notable cases of plagiarism and literary "conveying," but, notable as they may have been, we do not remember any precisely similar to this of the engaging Pengalee Baboo. When Samuel Johnson, in the wittiest and perhaps ablest of his fugitive pieces, was bestowing his memorable castigation on Soame Jenyns, he says:—

> I am told that this pamphlet is not the effort of hunger. What can it be, then, but the product of vanity? And yet how can vanity be gratified by plagiarism or transcription? When this speculatist finds himself prompted to another performance, let him consider whether he is about to disburden his mind, or employ his fingers; and, if I might venture to offer him a subject, I should wish that he would solve this question—Why he that has nothing to write should desire to be a writer?

This question, however, is not one from which Baboo Bholanauth Chunder has any occasion to shrink. He not only has the ambition to write, but has within him the stuff of which writers are made. When he is content to "disburden his mind" he is an entertaining and instructive companion, and we read with pleasure his animated and original observations on men and manners and places—often indeed described before, but never from the same point of view. But when a man so qualified, and with so vast a field before him, leaves off drawing from his own mental stores, and deliberately takes to employing his fingers, our first feeling is simply disappointment, which, however, rapidly turns into disgust when we find page after page of these borrowed goods passed off upon the reader as the result of his own observation and research.

We can find no space for more than a single specimen of Bholanauth Chunder's mode of proceeding, and we select his description of the most famous of the cities of India. He enters Delhi at p. 129 of his second volume, and informs us that, "the eternal Rome excepted, there is no other place which enjoys such a celebrity, and that there are two ways of seeing its sights—the topographical, which is to go through them as they fall in your way, jumbling antiquities, mediævalities, and modernesses into a salgamundi (sic), or the chronological, which is to go regularly from the house of Pandoo to that of the last Mogul. The latter had our preference." Now considering that the "sights," as he calls them, are scattered most unchronologically over an area of some fifty square miles, that his time was limited to three days, and that a Delhi day in November lasts only ten hours, he appears to deserve infinite credit for the power of observation which enabled him to accumulate the mass of knowledge which he has been so obliging as to communicate to the public in one hundred and forty-two closely printed pages of profound antiquarian research and tasteful artistic criticism. But how stands the case? In the course of these pages the name of one particular authority is occasionally mentioned, and there are frequent portions of paragraphs marked off with the single inverted commas which Mr. Carlyle has taught the world to regard as indicating an author's quoting from himself, but not the least hint is afforded that fully a hundred of the pages are either copied bodily from the learned and elaborate Reports of General Cunningham, the late Archæological Surveyor to the Government of India, or are slightly disguised transcripts from them. The following specimen is taken almost at random:—

General Cunningham.	Bholanauth Chunder.
According to universal tradition the Iron Pillar was erected by Anang Pal, the founder of the Tomara dynasty, who was assured by a learned Brahman, that the foot of the pillar had been driven so deep into the ground that it rested on the head of Vasuki, King of the Serpents.	The most widely prevalent tradition attributes the Iron Pillar. . . . The Brahmins in the Court of Anang Pal, the founder of the Tomara dynasty, had represented the pillar to be driven so deep into the ground, that piercing through the density of the earth, it was said to rest on the head of the great snake-god Schesnag or Vasuki.
But the Rajah, doubting the truth of the Brahman's statement, ordered the pillar to be dug up, when the foot of it was found wet, &c.	To test the truth of their statement the sceptic monarch ordered the pillar to be dug up, when blood bulged up.
According to Kharg Rai the Tomar Prince was provided by the sage Vyâs with a golden nail, or spike, twenty fingers in length, which he was told to drive into the ground. At a lucky moment, on the 13th day of the waning moon of Vaisâkh, in the Samoat year 792, or A.D. 736, when the moon was in the mansion Abhijit, the spike was driven into the ground by the Rajah. Then said Vyâs to the King:—	In the words of Kharg Rai the Tomar Prince had been furnished by the sage Vyâs with an iron spike twenty-five fingers long. This was formally sunk in the ground, at a lucky moment, on the 13th day of the waning moon of Boisakh, in the Samoat year 792, or A.D. 736. Then said Vyâs to the Rajah:—

"Ne'er will thy kingdom be besped, The spike hath pierced Vàsuki's head."	"Ne'er will thy kingdom b besped, The spike hath pierced Vasuki' head."
Vyâs had no sooner departed than the incredulous Raja boldly declared his disbelief in the sage's announcement, when immediately	But the sage had scarcely gon away before the incredulous Toma had the spike taken up.
"He saw the spike thrown on the ground, Blood dripping from the serpent's wound."	"He saw the spike thrown on the ground, Blood dripping from the serpent'i wound."
The sage was recalled by the horrified King, who was directed to drive the stake into the ground a second time. Again he struck, but the stake penetrated only nineteen fingers, and remained loose in the ground. Once more then the sage addressed the Rajah prophetically, "Like the spike (killi) which you have driven, your dynasty will be unstable (dilli), and after 'nineteen' generations it will be supplanted by the Chohans, and they by the Turkans."	The horrified monarch now repented of his folly, and, sending back for the sage, attempted to drive the stake a second time. But it did not penetrate beyond nineteen fingers, and remained loose in the ground. Thereupon Vyâs once more addressed the Rajah in a prophetic tone, "Like the (khili) spike which you have driven, your dynasty will be unstable (dhilli); and after nineteen generations it will be supplanted by the Choans, and they by the Turkans."
When the Muhammadan conqueror first took possession of Delhi he was informed that . . . which the verse of Byron has rendered famous:	When the Mahomedan conqueror first took possession of Delhi he was told that . . . .

So much for Delhi and General Cunningham, who, however, is not the only victim, for in his descriptions of other places Bishop Heber and Sir William Sleeman are made to stand and deliver after much the same fashion. Everywhere, even in what we will call the original parts, we come upon reflections and forms of expression which are as familiar to our ears as "God save the Queen." Of these, also, a single specimen must suffice:—

LORD MACAULAY.	BABOO BHOLANAUTH CHUNDER.
In perseverance, in self-command, in forethought, in all the virtues which conduce to success in life, the Scots have never been surpassed. History of England, Chap. 1.	In perseverance, in shrewdness, in self-denial, in most of the qualities which conduce to success in life, the Marwaree has seldom been surpassed.—I. 432.

But if the boldness of the Bengalee is astounding, what shall we say to the simplicity of the English gentleman who is his sponsor to the public, and who assures us in the preface that the Baboo has "derived no literary assistance whatever from any one, whether European or native," and that his travels are not the sketchy production of a European traveller, but a genuine bonâ fide work of a Hindoo wanderer, who has made his way from Calcutta to the Upper Provinces, and looked upon every scene with Hindoo eyes, and indulged in trains of thought and association which only find expression in native society, and are wholly foreign to European ideas!

As we have said before, there can be no doubt that this Baboo is quite qualified to write an excellent work from his own resources, and we had marked many passages which appeared worthy of extract, but are deterred from quoting them by the natural apprehension that when we fancied we were transcribing the words of Bholanauth Chunder, we might in reality be quoting Miss Braddon or an Early Father. Of one point, however, there can be no doubt, and that is that the Baboo has perfectly succeeded in freeing his mind from superstition and prejudice. Throughout his volumes we can only recall a single instance in which either of these influences becomes apparent. Bishop Heber had said:—

The monkeys are very troublesome, and admitted to be so by the Hindoos themselves, but so much respected that, a few years since, two young officers, who shot at one near Bindrabund, were driven into the Jumna, where they perished, by a mob of Brahmins and Devotees.

The Baboo, of course, more suo, annexes this anecdote; but, in order to shield the "Brahmins and Devotees," he substitutes the following ludicrous version of the story:—

Two officers had once shot at one of these creatures, and the whole quadrumanous tribe gathered in an army to chase them away, and pursuing them with the most boisterous screechings towards the Jumna, across which they had thought of making their escape, made them sink in that stream with the elephant on which they rode.

But this is quite a solitary instance of weakness. "A Brahmin now," he says, "is scoffed at as an empiric, a mountebank, and a wiseacre," and "to be a Pundit now is to rust in obscurity and pine in poverty." The deities of his ancestors and of his neighbours are uniformly spoken of in much the same way in which the venerable denizens of Olympus are treated by Mr. Frank Talfourd and Mr. Burnand; and he quotes with great gusto the description which the old English traveller Fitch gives of the idols he saw at Benares three hundred years ago, adding that "more than one idol under allusion can be identified in our day":—

Many of them are black, and have claws of brass with long nails, and some ride upon peacocks and other fowls which be evil-favoured with long hawks' bills, some with one thing and some with another, but none with a good grace. They be black and evil-favoured, their mouths monstrous, their ears gilded and full of jewels, their teeth and eyes of gold, silver, and glass.

And he is no less delighted with the same traveller's remarks on a devotee whom he encountered at Patna:—

The people were greatly imposed upon by idle persons assuming the appearance of sanctity. One of these sat asleep on horseback in the market-place, while the crowd came and reverentially touched his feet. They thought him a great man, but—sure he was a lazy lubber. I left him there sleeping.

One legend of his fathers is branded as "all bosh," and another is stigmatized—and here he is quite original—as an "ay-and-my-betty story." According to him the god Krishna passed his time "skying with milkmaids," and "owes his apotheosis more to his liaisons than his miracles." This deity is unrivalled in popularity among the common people of India, and the Baboo relates with considerable humour how he found "a middle-aged Bhyragee reading to two women—widows from Bengal—the story of Krishna's amours from the Bhagbut." He describes himself and the two friends with whom he travels as "young Bengals," and tells with great admiration how they appalled their chronological coachman at Delhi by the freedom of their proceedings. They ate oranges "off a plate used by the sahib logue—bread-and-butter were next served, and when brandy brought up the rear it was an outrage of which he could not remain to bear the sight." Bholanauth leaves us in no doubt as to what he does not believe, but what he does believe is not equally clear. He probably fancies himself a Deist, for he says, "The Moslem laughed at the Hindoo, the Christian now laughs at the Moslem, and the day shall come when the Deist shall laugh at us all." At present the only two objects which appear to command his veneration are the Railway and the Penal Code. In general he writes capital idiomatic English, but he occasionally misuses words in a very quaint fashion. He speaks of a party of ladies passing "in a tally-ho and four," of "a poultry" as if it were a poultry yard, of a "nonce" as a measure of space, of a pretty girl being "pox-marked," and of each of the mandibles of a bird's bill as a beak. "The wary Krishna stuck like an obstinate fish-bone at the throat of the bird, and kicking up a rumpus in his stomach, at last tore him asunder in two by his beaks." It seems odd to English ideas to say of a poet that "his honey-tongued muse got him the surname of the Parrot," and, speaking of a garden, that "the marigold was in season, and displayed an exuberance of floral beauty along the walks." He sometimes also represents himself as seeing what all other travellers have missed—e.g. the marble gates of Somnauth; and he speaks of "the remarkable bath of Shah Jehan, hollowed out of one single block of white marble, and measuring forty feet in diameter."

THE DIARY OF PRINCE SALM-SALM.*

THESE volumes possess unusual interest as an authentic record of the closing scenes of one of the most singular tragedies to be found in the pages of history. It is impossible not to feel a deep regret for a man who was anything but a vulgar adventurer, and who undertook a very dangerous and difficult task with nothing to rely upon except his own courage, and his faith in the ultimate triumph of the principles of modern civilization. After the event it is easy to call his enterprise Quixotic, and to ask why an Austrian Archduke should peril his reputation and his life in an attempt to establish a civilized Government in a semi-barbarous country. But all the evidence goes to show that, quite apart from the Imperial throne and such glories as might belong to it, Maximilian did, so far as he could, endeavour to give political life and civilization to a country and a race that did not appear, at least to him, to be hopelessly impracticable. It was in his eyes an experiment that might be fairly tried, and under more favourable conditions it possibly might have succeeded. But its failure, due to a variety of causes that were not by any means obvious from the first, does not diminish the credit of the Prince who steadfastly believed that there lay before him a great work to be done in the organization of a Mexican State, and who devoted his energies and his life to the duty which he had placed before himself. No doubt from the very first it was an arduous task, and difficulties seemed to increase every day, yet the Emperor persevered to the last with unfailing courage, and perhaps only perished from his unwillingness to desert his adherents even when further resistance was absolutely hopeless. The historian of his last days, Prince Salm-Salm, seems to have possessed deservedly the confidence of his Imperial master; and though he is not yet able to produce the documents which could go far, it is said, to justify Maximilian in his assumption of the Empire, he is at least able to describe the high qualities displayed by him in misfortune, as well as the affection which he knew so well how to win from those about him.

It was on the 5th of February that the French army, under the pressure of the Government of the United States, left the city of Mexico. That the inhabitants were glad of their departure there can be little doubt. Perhaps even the friends of Maximilian were not displeased to be rid of an army whose bravery in the battle-field is only equalled by its arrogance in a friendly country. Marshal Bazaine, whether deservedly or not, had the character of being overbearing and rapacious, and could not fail to be looked upon as the imperious lieutenant of Louis Napoleon, whose policy by this time had become odious, and was even deemed treacherous by the Imperialist party in Mexico, as it had been hateful to the Liberals. At the same time it cannot be doubted that Marshal Bazaine, acting on his instructions, did what he could to induce Maximilian to abdicate, and, it is even insinuated by Prince Salm, began intriguing with the Juarists and Porfirio Diaz in order to render the position of the Emperor, if possible, more untenable than it actually was. But, apart from any such additional difficulties, when the French evacuated Mexico there was little to encourage the most sanguine partisans of the Emperor. The Liberals in arms outnumbered the Imperialists, and besides had gained more than the advantages of a decisive victory in the retirement of the French army and the undisguised sympathy of the Government of the United States. It followed that the Emperor, if he remained, would have to encounter the certainty of a civil war, in which the balance of chances was, at the outset, unmistakeably on the side of his antagonists. He elected to stay, under the belief, as it would seem, that in the absence of the detested French the Mexican people would rally round him, and prefer his wise and gentle rule to the unscrupulous ferocity and avarice of the partisan leaders of the Liberals. There were not wanting advisers who assured him that such could not fail to be the result of his generous resolve. Swayed by these counsels he determined to prosecute his enterprise, perhaps not without a presentiment of what his own fate might be in the event of military disaster.

On the 13th of February he left Mexico, on his march to Querétaro, with all the Mexican troops he could collect. His object was to unite his forces with those of Miramon, Castillo, and Mendez, and then to prevent the enemy from marching on Mexico. On the road several engagements took place, and on the 19th the Emperor and his small force, after suffering some losses, entered Querétaro. The united armies amounted to 9,000 men with 39 guns, a force altogether inadequate for the defence of a large city in a narrow valley commanded by the hills on either side. On the 4th of March intelligence was received of the advance of the enemy, with an army of 18,000 men, under the command of General Escobedo. Ten days later a combined attack was made, and no doubt the garrison gained a signal victory, partly due to the superiority of their leaders, but perhaps also to the desperate courage of the foreign military adventurers in the Imperial ranks. Still the losses of the besieged had been very considerable, and the experience of the action was sufficient to show the arduous character of a protracted defence of so untenable a position. There were two courses open—either to follow up the victory by attacking the broken troops of Escobedo, and, in the event of success, marching on San Luis Potosi and the west, which at least offered a reasonable chance of escape, or to remain in Querétaro, and allow the enemy to reorganize his forces, and call additional troops to his assistance. The advice of Marquez decided the Emperor in this difficult juncture, and it was resolved to fortify the city as far as possible, and continue the defence. Yet even at this period, at a council of war held on the 20th of March several of the generals were of opinion that a retreat might be attempted with a reasonable chance of success. It was determined, however, to send Marquez and Vidaurri to Mexico—the former as Lieutenant-General of the Empire, and the latter as Secretary of War and Finance—to bring back with them all the troops and money that they could get together. These officers left on the 23rd, escorted by about eleven hundred horse. Meanwhile considerable bodies of troops had joined the Liberals, and supplies of ammunition had been received, whilst the force within the city was by this time no more than six thousand five hundred men, insufficiently provided with food and ammunition, who, notwithstanding such discouraging circumstances, again, on the 24th, successfully repulsed an attack made in force. Nevertheless, the Liberals gradually drew nearer the city, and the bombardment became more continuous and more effective. Yet no news was received from Marquez, and, in spite of a brilliant sortie on the 1st of April, affairs wore a very gloomy aspect. A council was summoned, and again the opinion of Miramon prevailed, to wait for the arrival of Marquez, and as soon as possible to attack the position of the Garita de Mexico, in order to be able to support Marquez if he came over the Cuesta China. Again the unavailing bravery of the garrison was put to the severe test of assailing an enemy of superior numbers in strong positions, and again the vigour which they displayed was so remarkable as to show how valuable had been the opportunities repeatedly thrown away by vacillation or by obstinate adherence to a mistaken view of the situation. But it was becoming evident that the defence of the city could not be protracted much longer. So it was determined to send Prince Salm to try to communicate with Marquez, and, if possible, concert arrangements for the relief of Querétaro. The attempt failed; symptoms of disaffection began to show themselves in the camp; it seemed to be the beginning of the end. Soon information was brought in that Marquez had been defeated by Porfirio Diaz, between Mexico and Puebla, that the latter stronghold had been taken by the Liberals, and that three Imperial generals and fifty officers had been shot by them. It was also stated that the Liberals had decided to make no more attacks on Querétaro, but to wait till their object should be gained by the starvation and exhaustion of its now enfeebled defenders.

This unfavourable news at last induced the Emperor to make preparations for his departure, which was to be effected by breaking through the enemy's lines on the morning of the 27th. And if the evidence of Prince Salm is to be credited, the attack was an eminently successful one; the Liberal army was completely routed, and, but for mistakes or delay in the hour of victory, the Imperial forces might have escaped in safety. Escobedo, however, made use of the opportunity afforded him, brought reinforcements, and chased the Imperial troops back into Querétaro. Still it was believed that escape was not impossible, and everything was prepared for attempting it on May 14. Mejia asked for an additional delay of twenty-four hours for his preparations, which was reluctantly conceded. That night Querétaro was taken, as it is alleged by Prince Salm, through the treachery of Colonel Lopez in surrendering an important post, which permitted the Liberals to surprise the garrison. It rarely, however, happens that such accusations admit of distinct proof, and the assertion of Colonel Lopez that the defenders of the post in question were surprised by a rapid and well-planned attack is not more improbable than that a Mexican colonel should be a profound scoundrel. Moreover, the besiegers were kept well informed of all that was passing within the city, and took their chance of anticipating a surprise directed against themselves.

Long and gallant as the defence had been, the Imperial army, if it still deserved the name, was worn out with hard work and scanty food. It seems indeed marvellous that the influence of those chiefs whom Prince Salm so constantly blames should have been able to retain so long under their command troops that could at any time have made their own terms. Prince Salm bestows his censures on Marquez and Miramon alternately, who, after all, seem to have been very much on a par with most of the Mexican generals, whilst the Emperor was rash in the extreme to repose such confidence in the sagacity or devotion of any of them. The fatal policy of remaining at Querétaro led to the capture of the Emperor, his imprisonment, trial, and execution, which followed in rapid succession by the orders of the ruthless Juarez. In the diaries of the Prince and Princess will be seen the efforts made by these devoted followers to contrive, by entreaty or promises of reward, the escape of Maximilian; but the Mexican President was inexorable, and money was not forthcoming to corrupt the gaolers of the Emperor. The trial was simply a brutal mockery, and the execution was an act of gratuitous barbarity. It may well be that the victorious Liberals desired his death. He was associated in their minds with the Church party, whom they detested; with foreign invasion, under which they had smarted; and with a form of government for which they entertained no affection. But surely, even in Mexico, had the chiefs so willed it, there might have been found means to induce a victorious army—and, as they said, a liberated nation—to forego the gratification of their vengeance, and to spare their country the infamy of his execution.

For the conduct of Juarez we do not see that there can be any palliation. The alleged guilt of the Emperor consisted in his having been taken in arms against the Republic, for which, by a law of 1862, the punishment of death was assigned, and it has been asserted that in his case the law was enforced in retaliation for the severity exercised by Marshal Bazaine and the French, in virtue of a law of similar harshness. There can be no question that the Emperor had to bear the odium excited by the acts of the French commander, but when the struggle was concluded the occasion for retaliation no longer existed. Reprisals may in some cases be used as a legitimate weapon, in order to obtain by terror what humanity refuses to concede; but when there is no longer an object to be gained by them, they are simply acts of unjustifiable cruelty. It must have been clear to the Mexican President that, if the Emperor were released, he would quit Mexico for ever; and it must have been no less evident, after the successful action of the Government of the United States, that no foreign prince, supported by European soldiers, would ever again attempt to found a dynasty in Mexico. However, though Juarez and his party are solely responsible for the death of Maximilian, it must not be forgotten that two of the most powerful Governments in the world had in great measure contributed to bring about the state of things in Mexico which led to the final catastrophe. It was the doing mainly of Louis Napoleon that Maximilian went to Mexico at all, under the belief that he would have the support of a powerful party in the country, and of a considerable French force which was to remain till the authority of the new Government should be established. The French Emperor, however, had miscalculated his power, and under the menaces of the United States was compelled to withdraw his troops, and abandon his ally in a position from which the latter could scarcely hope to extricate himself by success, and which he felt he could not abandon without dishonour. Again, the American Government, when interfering with the affairs of Mexico, ought to have contemplated the effects of their policy, and might no doubt have compelled those whom they protected to abstain from acts of vengeance. Stripped of its cant, the policy of the American Government was purely selfish, and not influenced by any feelings of humanity. It was not until it was too late that Mr. Seward was willing to intercede for the luckless Prince.

No doubt there are further disclosures to be made that will throw more light on this dark chapter of Mexican history. In the meantime, this latest contribution of the Prince and Princess Salm-Salm, though not possessed of much literary merit, will be read with interest. The Prince seems to be a favourable specimen of the military adventurer—a class for which we do not entertain much sympathy. Of his bravery and loyalty there can be no question, and they are virtues which, however unsuccessful, must always command respect.

BRAZIL.*

IN these two thick volumes we have the results of a journey made by Captain Burton during the latter half of 1867, from Rio de Janeiro to the Brazilian highlands, and thence down the great river S. Francisco to its mouth. The journey is of a far less adventurous character than those by which Captain Burton became known as an explorer, but in his former narratives he has always shown so much power of amusing some of his readers and shocking others, that we looked forward to the perusal of the present work with considerable pleasure. At any rate we thought we should be free from the insipid prosiness of the cockney tourist; the book would be spiced with little insinuations against Christianity, the negro, and other objects of Captain Burton's contempt, not to say that so acute and original an observer must have something new to tell us. Our curiosity was most artistically heightened by a preface added by Mrs. Burton, who, in the absence of her husband, has seen the book through the press. After an acknowledgement of the general advantage of Captain Burton's observations, she proceeds as follows:—"Although I proudly accept of the trust confided to me, and pledge myself not to avail myself of my discretionary powers to alter one word of the original text, I protest vehemently against his (Captain Burton's) religious and moral sentiments, which belie a good and chivalrous life. I point the finger of indignation particularly at what misrepresents our Holy Roman Catholic Church, and at what upholds that unnatural and repulsive law, Polygamy, which the author is careful not to practise himself, but from a high moral pedestal he preaches to the ignorant as a means of population in young countries." Mrs. Burton proceeds to explain that these differences of opinion—tolerably profound, it must be admitted—give rise to no domestic jars; and the simplicity with which her protest is uttered makes us anticipate some great offence to call forth such a decided protest from an admiring wife. In other words, we concluded that Captain Burton had been more than usually irritating to British respectability, and had used a rather more pungent sauce than heretofore. In this expectation we have been considerably disappointed. Every now and then Captain Burton finds an opportunity for obtruding on the reader his serene indifference to all forms of creed, and his conviction that many modern theological opinions are to a reasonable man as ridiculous as those of fetish-worshipping negroes. Occasionally he gets a chance for sneering at Exeter Hall and philanthropists generally, and assuring them that their petted negro will speedily die out under the influence of freedom, to the great advantage of the world at large. Once, and only once, so far as we have observed, he throws in a word for polygamy. For the most part his narrative is as solid and statistical as the most humdrum of travellers could desire. Indeed, to say the truth, the general reader will be apt to find it distinctly dull. Like every one else who adopts the same plan, Captain Burton has decided to give us much of the book in diary form, not by any means in order to save himself trouble, but with the view of giving "the simplest and the most natural picture of travels." Captain Burton floated over 300 leagues down a single river, and he enables us to realize the monotony of the process, by inflicting on us a mental repetition of it. In spite of many interesting remarks, the reader's interest cannot but flag, and we must console ourselves with the reflection that, if it is rather a dreary book of travels, it is to all appearance a very useful handbook. Captain Burton evidently had his notebook handy, and set down every step of his journey with praiseworthy care. It will be a very good thing for his successors; but surely the ordinary British public can hardly be expected to read 800 or 900 pages, of which a great part is filled with a succession of sentences like this:—"We had to battle with the winds and the wavelets, which rose as by magic; and off the 'Angical' Fazenda, the enemy had the best of the affair, and kept us at halt for three hours. This is a large breeding estate on the right bank, which is sandy, and produces fine coconuts, Carnahubas, and Quixabeiras. From a point a little below this, canoes during the floods make a short cut across country to the Ypoeira of Chique-Chique," and so on. How many people are there in London who care whether or not the "Angical" Fazenda produces Quixabeiras, or who wish to know of a short cut to the Ypoeira of Chique-Chique? And does even the heroic reader who plods through pages of such lively information obtain thereby a more simple and natural picture of travel than Captain Burton could give us in his livelier style in half a dozen paragraphs? It is a fact, much to be impressed upon all travellers, that there is a difference between books, properly so called, and those compendiums of useful information which, on the spot, may be as convenient as Bradshaw's Guide. An attempt to mix the two spoils a couple of very excellent things; and if Captain Burton had compressed the pith of his travels into a quarter of the space, and put together the bare topographical information for those who wished to consult it, he would have composed a far more agreeable work. As it is, we may perhaps venture on the moderate commendation that the book is perhaps as readable as its faulty design allows.

The narrative consists properly of two distinct parts. The first volume is devoted to an account of the Mexican highlands, the site of the gold mines which have absorbed so much English capital to so little result. The second part describes the descent of the great river S. Francisco—the Mississippi of South America, as it is not very appropriately called—down which Captain Burton floated for many weeks in a ramshackle compromise between a raft and a canoe. The first district is one of the many lands of promise which are held out to the poor of Europe. It is doubted, indeed, by sceptics, whether it is possible for the Northern populations to thrive in a country so near the Equator. Yet, if Captain Burton's views are sound, it is admirably adapted in many ways for the superabundant masses of population who are filling our workhouses, and striking fear into philanthropists. Given sufficient means of communication—the one great want of the land—and there is no reason why we should not pour into it a stream of emigration to turn to account its resources, and to enjoy an exceptionally healthy climate. There are virgin forests to be cleared, rich lands to be cultivated, and untold wealth of gold, diamonds, and iron to be extracted. The English miner in the great mine of Morro Velho flourishes under strict discipline, and though it seems that even in this healthy district he cannot do more than from two-thirds to three-fourths of his normal task in Europe, he can earn high wages, and enjoy luxuries unknown to him at home. "Nowhere," says Captain Burton, "can an honest hardworking-man get on so well with such a minimum of money and ability" as in the interior of Brazil. It is true that at Morro Velho he has the exceptional advantage of getting next to nothing to drink in the way of spirits, except a certain Cachaça, which is so singularly nasty as to repel even the robust appetite for liquids of the English labourer. This, indeed, does not seem to be a common advantage of the country. As a rule, the lower orders appear to be hard drinkers. Formerly "a drunken Englishman" was held to be a pleonasm; now it would seem that the natives have taken up the habit, and the epithet is equally unnecessary when applied to any part of the population. Along the coast sobriety is more common, for the simple reason that drunkards are killed off by the climate. Setting aside this unpleasant peculiarity, Captain Burton has little to tell us that is not on the whole creditable to the Brazilian of the interior. It is curious to remark that a change has taken place in the Portuguese population similar to that which distinguishes the modern American from his English cousin. In Captain Burton's opinion, they have in both cases approximated to the type of the original red man. At any rate, they show the predominance of the nervous temperament; they are tall, lean, gaunt figures, peculiarities which here cannot be explained by hot-air pipes and tobacco chewing; they seldom grow fat after the fashion of John Bull or the primitive Portuguese; they have the serious expression frequently remarked in the Anglo-American, and, like them, are marked by hatchet faces, thin lips, and aquiline features, whilst their women show the fragile and delicate beauty of the ladies in the Northern cities. Captain Burton attributes these changes to some influence of the climate. We know not if it is due to the same cause, or to some occult working of that useful explanation of all political phenomena, democracy, that the Brazilians still preserve the habit, which is dying out of the United States, of wearing black dress clothes in the morning. They are more given to the use of the knife—producing what they facetiously call "morde-zinhas," or "little deaths"—than is quite pleasant; and in religion, if not fanatical, they are superstitious; but they are beginning to put on more civilized ways; they are awake to the importance of education; they are free from the curse of pauperism; and they have the virtue, whose importance may be pardonably exaggerated by strangers, of unlimited hospitality.

When Captain Burton descended from the Highlands the change does not seem to have been for the better. Although he does not sum up his opinions, we get a general impression of a lazy and useless population. Every now and then he incidentally mentions that some one whom he was anxious to see had really not the energy to get up and speak to him. People are liable to that terrible complaint which frequently overwhelms Europeans transported to the tropics—a total loss of energy. They suffer from a languor which, if they give way to it, makes all exertion impossible. They sink into the lotus-eating stage, and lead a life comparable to that of the much-reviled Quashee among his pumpkins. The only resource that remains is singing and drinking through the night, which, if we may judge from frequent entries, appears to have been almost the regular practice of Captain Burton's boatmen. They lounge through the morning, sleep through the hot hours, and loaf in the evening. At rare intervals they talk languidly about making a canal, or removing some obstructions in the river; but, on the whole, they are of opinion that these matters are the study of the Central Government. In short, we should say that, in spite of the magnificent resources of the country, and the rapidity with which improvements in communication have been followed by the growth of population and wealth, Captain Burton's account is not very favourable to the prospect of raising an energetic race so near the Equator. The first condition is doubtless the opening, by some means, of the natural avenues of commerce, and to this Captain Burton devotes a great deal of attention. The noble S. Francisco is interrupted by the great rapids of Paulo Affonso in its lower portion, which, according to him, are even superior in picturesque effect to Niagara. Above these navigation, though possible for small boats, is constantly interrupted by rapids and other difficulties called generically "Cachoeiras." These might in many cases be removed at moderate expense; canals might be formed round some, and part of the route might be shortened by laying down cheap railways. Engineers have prepared plans to which the main objection seems to be that they cost a great deal more money than there is the slightest chance of raising for years to come; and it is a great object of Captain Burton's book, who gives several calculations on the subject, to prove that more economical methods might be applied. Meanwhile railways have been constructed with so little forethought, and at so great an expenditure, as to damp to a considerable extent future enterprise in the same direction. Whenever Government or individual energy breaks down these obstacles, there is a magnificent territory in which to try the experiment of a great tropical empire. Mr. Bates holds, as Captain Burton reminds us, that "it is under the Equator alone that the perfect race of the future will attain to complete fruition of man's beautiful heritage, the earth." Whilst waiting for the perfect race, Captain Burton seems to see the chief hope for the present in European immigration, and more especially in the intrusion of certain energetic Southerners since the war, who, in his opinion, are admirably adapted to deal with prolétaires of all descriptions, and especially to put a satisfactory conclusion to the great negro difficulty.

We must add, in conclusion, that the gallant reader who works steadily through these volumes will find a great deal of rather scattered information about the geology of the country, many interesting accounts of the present mines, leading to some frequent hints for intending investors of capital, and occasionally some good, though rather diffuse, descriptions of scenery. Scattered remarks about the curiously mixed population, their ways and thoughts, are also deserving of notice; and though we cannot conscientiously praise the book as light reading, unless on the hypothesis of liberal skipping, it may be safely recommended to all who mean to follow in the writer's steps.

A FRENCH VIEW OF ENGLISH SCHOOLS.*

THE Report of the French Commissioners sent to inquire into the middle and upper schools of England is a singular contrast to the Parliamentary blue-book as we know it. It is a handsome volume, printed in a very pretty type upon large and fine paper. It is readable throughout; the style is easy and graceful; the arrangement of topics skilful; the statistical tables, with which English official documents are commonly overloaded, are reduced to the least possible dimensions, and only introduced when really needed to prove or illustrate some proposition of importance. Nor is the substance of the Report unworthy of its form. MM. Demogeot and Montucci are not only acute observers; they are evidently men who have thought for themselves on educational questions, and they have therefore been able to examine and describe with singular fairness a system unlike that to which they were accustomed at home—neither hastily condemning what seems strangest to a French eye, nor, on the other hand, becoming so much enamoured of certain excellences of English schools as to forget that these excellences may be purchased too dear. Their criticisms are usually discriminating, and always temperate; and if they seem to see our public schools in somewhat too rosy a light, this is perhaps due not so much to misapprehensions on their part, as to a courtesy which gladly praises when it finds anything praiseworthy, and is careful to express disapprobation in guarded though weighty terms. We have been more than once surprised, in going through the treatise, to notice how small is the number of errors into which its authors fall, and how few of the salient features of English upper-class schools which they fail to catch and depict.

With these merits, however, the Report is far enough from being what it professes to be—an account of "Secondary Instruction" in England. It contains a lively description of what are called the great public schools—Eton, Harrow, Westminster, and the like—with a fair, although much less complete, account of such schools of recent foundation as Marlborough and Cheltenham, and some remarks on the Mechanics' Institutes of Lancashire and Yorkshire. But of the schools at which the great bulk of the middle-class receives its education—the endowed grammar-schools throughout the country, the private day and boarding "academies"—it contains scarcely any mention. Some few facts are stated respecting the grammar-schools of Leeds, York, and Durham, taken from a school prospectus, or communicated by the masters; but neither these, nor any other schools of the same rank (except two in Liverpool), seem to have been made the subjects of any serious personal inquiry. It is true, of course, that the largest and most flourishing of these institutions have very much the same arrangements, at least in matters of instruction, as the great public schools; and it is no less true, that from a study of the system and methods of the private academies, there is, according to the Reports of the Schools' Inquiry Commissioners, little or nothing of profit to be learnt. In describing Eton and Harrow, therefore, MM. Demogeot and Montucci are no doubt describing that form of English education which is most characteristic of our country, and from which the greatest number of suggestions for the benefit of French schools may be drawn. Any Englishman reading with attention would see in a moment that the praises and censures given here to English schools generally apply really to a comparatively small class among them. But a Frenchman could hardly gather from the Report that this is so; and we greatly doubt whether its authors themselves were fully aware how small was that part of the field of English education over which their inquiries conducted them.

* De l'Enseignement secondaire en Angleterre et en Écosse; Rapport à son Exc. M. le Ministre de l'Instruction publique. Par MM. J. Demogeot et H. Montucci. Paris: Imprimerie Impériale. 1868.

Taking the application of their remarks as thus restricted, the remarks themselves are almost uniformly sensible, often put in an entertaining way, and occasionally such as may be of practical service to an English teacher. With the discipline and social life of our schools the Commissioners express themselves well satisfied. Fagging and flogging, as might be expected, they cannot away with; but the self-governing organization of a public school, the monitorial system, the absence of surveillance, the general freedom allowed to the boys, excite their admiration almost as much as their surprise. The praise bestowed on the "family life," as they call it, which the system of masters' houses provides at schools of the Eton and Harrow type, will seem extravagant to those who know how little even the active master of a large house can, in practice, see of each of his boys, and how many evils, constantly springing up among them, he is almost powerless to check. Serious, however, as these evils are, they are no doubt far less serious than those engendered by the dismal barrack-like life of the French internats (boarding lycées); and the French observer who has seen only those may well prefer what he finds here. The fact that the Commissioners repeatedly express their pleasure at finding that English boys are not constantly in a state of suppressed revolt against the authorities of the school, is the most significant censure that could be passed upon the system of their own country.

When they come to speak of the instruction given in English schools, their tone undergoes a sensible change. They had, unfortunately, no means of ascertaining by an examination the results actually attained among us, so as to compare the mental condition of an average English with that of an average French schoolboy of the same age. But by studying the programmes of work done and the examination-papers set, by personally questioning the teachers, and by being present on one or two occasions when lessons were in progress in the class-room, they succeeded in reaching conclusions whose substantial accuracy there is no reason to doubt, and which agree in the main with those reached by the majority of educational reformers among ourselves. Nothing—not even the use of the birch—appears to have struck them with so much surprise as the despotism of Latin and Greek in all the greatest English schools, both old and new. Fully admitting both the value of classical studies, and the success with which they are pursued by the more industrious boys in our schools, they evidently think that we spend too much time on them, that we allot an undue share of prizes to excellence in them, and that they are allowed to usurp a pre-eminence in dignity for which no good reason can be shown, and which tends to the dishonour and injury of other important subjects. The result of this attitude is most notably seen in the neglect of scientific, and especially of mathematical, studies—a neglect which the Commissioners describe in a strain of suppressed irony which is more effective than any denunciation could have been. Taking Eton as furnishing the most conspicuous instance of this neglect, though other schools are little better, they relate how, up to 1836, there was no teacher of mathematics there; how it was not till 1851 that this subject was admitted into the regular curriculum; and how even then it was proposed not to allow the mathematical masters to wear a gown, like their classical colleagues. A story which they add deserves to be quoted:—

> Un professeur distingué a raconté qu'il avait autrefois pour élève particulier, à Oxford, un jeune homme d'une intelligence fort remarquable, ayant suivi avec succès le cours entier des études d'Eton. Non seulement cet étudiant ne savait pas la table de multiplication, mais il en ignorait même l'existence. Il en fut informé à propos de l'achat de quelques paires de bas, qu'il faisait dans un magasin, et dont il ne pouvait trouver le prix que par une longue série d'additions. Averti qu'il y avait un moyen d'abréger ce travail, l'aspirant aux honneurs d'Oxford trouva la chose fort ingénieuse, et apprit la table en peu de jours.

Our devotion to classics has not, in the opinion of the Commissioners, justified itself by the excellence of the methods whereby classics are taught. We make the reading of Latin and Greek books, they say, a mere exercise in grammar and philology, not using them either to cultivate the style of the pupil or to inform his mind. Hence, though he acquires a thorough and sound knowledge of Latin and Greek as languages, he does not catch the spirit of the classical authors; his imagination is not touched; he shows little interest, and receives but a feeble intellectual stimulus. Something of the same kind may be observed in the methods of teaching mathematics, although here the fault, in the opinion of the Commissioners, is of an even graver kind. Geometry and algebra are in England, they declare, little but an exercise of memory. The staple of the work done consists in learning off and repeating propositions as they stand in Euclid—often without understanding their meaning—and in plodding through manuals of algebra, like Colenso's, in which "l'on trouve de six à huit exemples pour chaque petite variation de forme qui se présente dans un calcul de même nature, dans les radicaux, par exemple; variations qu'en France l'élève apprend de bonne heure à rapporter à une seule règle générale, qui, bien comprise, est la clef de tous ses calculs." Thus comparatively little is done to make mathematics a means of cultivating the reasoning faculties—of imparting clearness, precision, and dexterity; and thus too it happens that to the great majority of English boys this study is a repulsive one, pursued languidly and unwillingly, and dropped at the earliest possible moment. MM. Demogeot and Montucci incline to ascribe these defects to what they call the exaggerated practicality of the English:—

> Les études mathématiques des écoles anglaises présentent donc le même défaut que leurs études littéraires. Elles s'adressent plus à la mémoire

qu'aux facultés élevées de l'esprit. Les lettres négligent l'histoire, la philosophie, l'esthétique, c'est à dire, la pensée; les sciences tiennent trop peu compte de la raison et donnent le procédé plutôt que l'intelligence du principe. Il y a donc, dans ces établissements, discordance entre le but et les moyens. Les maîtres répètent sans cesse que la fin de l'éducation, à leurs yeux, c'est de former l'homme; leur enseignement ne tend trop souvent qu'à former des hellénistes ou des calculateurs.

There is some force in these remarks; but we doubt whether a mere dogged adherence to tradition and routine has not more to answer for, as a cause of the unphilosophical character of English education, than the excessive anxiety to be practical which our French critics think they discover. Certainly it is from no over-practicality that we lay so little stress upon history, geography, and the study of modern languages—a fact which, it need hardly be said, the authors of this Report comment upon. The result of the neglect of historical teaching, and of the exclusively grammatical character of the literary teaching, is, they think, to be seen in the barrenness which the themes and essays of English boys betray. While much has been done to train the mind, nothing has been done to feed it; hence the want of interest which the average schoolboy displays towards anything for which he is not directly rewarded or punished, and the want of ideas which is seen as soon as he is required to write upon any subject.

These general remarks are followed by a description of the system and arrangements of some of the most important among the public schools—Eton, Harrow, Rugby, Charterhouse, Westminster, and others—in which the characteristics of each are hit off in a lively and generally accurate way. But when they pass from the great schools of ancient foundation to the other educational establishments of England, the Commissioners, being thenceforward obliged to trust more to what they have picked up second hand than to what they have themselves seen, become much less valuable witnesses. Their account of the grammar schools, as has been said already, is extremely meagre; they seem to know little or nothing respecting those private schools in which the bulk of our middle class is educated; and from the praise they bestow upon the various examinations for the civil and military services which have been instituted during the last few years, it may be gathered that they are not aware of the elaborate system of cramming which those examinations have called into existence. Where the subject of inquiry is so vast, inquirers, and especially foreign inquirers, cannot possibly investigate everything for themselves, and must often be at the mercy of their informants. One such informant seems, after giving them a highly-coloured picture of the services rendered, or rather to be rendered, to education by the College of Preceptors, to have told them that its examinations were too severe—a statement which will be, to say the least of it, a somewhat startling one to those who remember the account given of those examinations by Mr. Fitch in his very able Report upon the schools of Yorkshire. However, this is a small matter; the wonder is, not that our French friends should sometimes have been told odd things, but that they should have in general received with so much caution what was told them.

Of the many other topics which the Commissioners discuss so judiciously—of the English system of promotion, which they praise; of the games and athletic sports, which they think carried to an absurd excess; of the bifurcative system of Marlborough and Cheltenham—we have no space left to speak. Two points, however, must not pass unmentioned. One is the opinion they express respecting the masters in our public schools: the other is their general conclusion upon the condition of the English schoolboy at eighteen years of age, compared with that of the French lycéen. Repeatedly acknowledging the ability, the energy, and the high moral tone both of the head and the assistant masters in the great schools of England, they feel sure that the work imposed on these masters is far too heavy, and they express their surprise that nothing is done to give them a systematic preparation for the profession of teaching. In the following passage their view is clearly and concisely put:—

Le professorat des écoles anglaises nous semble en somme inférieur à celui de nos lycées, non par le talent et la capacité des hommes, mais par le vice de l'organisation. L'enseignement en Angleterre n'est pas une carrière qui ait son apprentissage, son noviciat, son avancement, ses distinctions, son éméritat. L'absence d'une école normale supérieure reduit le jeune maitre à son expérience d'élève et à ses tâtonnements personnels. L'absence d'une administration centrale, juge éclairé du mérite et des succès de l'enseignement, livre le choix fait par les corps gouvernants à l'impulsion un peu vague des ouï-dire et des relations individuelles. Les avantages du ministère ecclésiastique enlèvent dès leur jeunesse une partie de ses meilleurs sujets. Le travail considérable que les écoles imposent à leurs professeurs ne leur laisse aucun loisir pour continuer par des études personnelles l'œuvre de leur propre instruction. Lauréats d'élite de l'université, leur croissance s'arrête trop souvent au moment où ils montent dans leurs chaires, et leur ambition se borne à sortir promptement de leur professorat ou à s'y enrichir. Quelques-uns trouvent dans leur énergie morale le moyen de suppléer aux loisirs qui leur manquent, et composent de remarquables ouvrages; mais il faut reconnaître que c'est le très-petit nombre.

Regarding the general efficiency of our public schools as compared with the French lycées, the Commissioners are too cautious to express any definite opinion. As they did not examine the scholars in English schools, and were but rarely present during the hours of teaching, it was, indeed, impossible for them to form one. Nevertheless, it is tolerably clear, from various parts of their Report, that while they believe the best Harrow or Rugby boy to be equal to the picked scholars of their own schools, they are persuaded that the average Harrow or Rugby boy—one, for example, who goes from the fifth form to be a pollman at Cambridge or an officer in the army—knows less, and has received less intellectual training and intellectual stimulus, than a French boy of the same age. This is no more than what we knew already; but it is a fact so important that it cannot be pressed too often upon the attention of Englishmen. The reproach of our English schools, as compared with those of almost every other civilized country, is that while we do a great deal for, and make a great deal of, our clever and industrious boys, we are content to let the lazy and careless ones slip unimproved through both school and University, not only ignorant of many necessary things—bad arithmeticians, bad spellers, unable to write clear and grammatical English—but also, in the highest sense of the word, uneducated. Life at school and college forms their manners, provides them with acquaintances, makes them cricketers or oarsmen, and gives them some knowledge of the world. It inspires them with no love of knowledge, develops no power of using wisely what knowledge they possess, cultivates no tastes, whether literary or scientific, which may raise them above mere material enjoyments. These evils are not mainly due, as an active party among educational reformers maintains, to the exclusion of what are called modern subjects—French, natural science, English literature—from the ordinary curriculum of schools and universities. Doubtless it is desirable that there should be more variety and flexibility in the course of studies, and that masters should be encouraged to take every pains to ascertain a boy's natural bent, and rouse his intellectual interest by chemistry or geology, if it cannot be roused by Latin. But the mischief, although social causes have a good deal to do with it, finds after all its chief source in the dull and unintelligent way in which instruction is given, especially to young boys, in the absurd methods which custom compels teachers to follow, and in the want of perception, on the part of many teachers, of the importance of appealing on every occasion to the understanding rather than the memory of the learner. These are obvious truths, which Englishmen have preached many times already: it is well to have them preached to us by Frenchmen also.

ARBORICULTURE.*

(Second Notice.)

"TELL me how do the trees which I planted thrive? Is there shade under the three oaks for a comfortable summer-seat? Do the poplars grow at the walk, and does the wall of the terrace stand firm?" So wrote Lord Collingwood from his more familiar element, the sea, to his wife ashore, in one of those letters so justly praised for the intense home love which they breathe. And the fact that the forms and shapes of trees or groups of trees root themselves in the memory of all who have any soul whatever for the picturesque or the poetic, is as demonstrable as that the trees themselves are actually rooted in the soil. Who would envy the unobservant eye which fails to note for after-remembrance the clump or single specimen of Scotch pine which Wordsworth preferred to all trees but the oak "for its beauty in winter, by moonlight, and at evening"; or the "goodly masts" of the silver fir; or, if he has ever seen it, the mixed avenue of larch and spruce at Paradise in Aberdeenshire, full of giants of either kind, tapering heavenward, with 80 feet each of measurable timber? What impression the Deodaras or Wellingtonias leave upon such as view them at home, on the Himalayas or in the Sierra Nevada, it is for travellers to tell; but without quitting the range of naturalized coniferæ, one may see cedars of Lebanon even in this country which, with breathing-space amid the uplands of some large park, and at a sufficient height above the rise of water, though not too far to allow "the roots to reach the aqueduct," realize the same boldness of outline and permanence of aspect which rendered them "the glory of Lebanon and the boast of Palestine." Nor do deciduous trees fail to exert a like spell. Not to resort to commonplaces about the British oak, the very name of "Burnham Beeches" will recall a charming study of tree beauty; or we may appeal to the effect upon a rural landscape of three or four spires of the Lombardy poplar, and, where these are not, of a diversifying trio of sister elms, side by side like graces; or we may linger in fancy beneath the lime alley on a summer's day, with the hum of the honey-bee amidst the myriad flowers overhead. It has been remarked that we are apt to associate places with the shrub or tree that is their genius loci, as it were—the jasmine on the trellis, the clean-clipt yews, the holly hedge; or, on a larger scale, the elms of an avenue, the clump of beech or Spanish chestnuts, the spreading plane, and any other tree-glory of a place or neighbourhood. And though in such books as Mr. Grigor's, or that of Mr. Brown, the editor of the Forester, one does not expect "sentiment," because it is somewhat alien to their calling and clime, it is curious to see how the subject tempts each author now and then into a little subdued rapture; indeed, the latter in one place has a digression about the aspen which lifts his prose almost into poetry, while it illustrates the hold of particular trees upon the memory. "With the aspen," he writes, "there are associated scenes of early life; and at the present moment, though the evening is so still that the sound of the Spey a full mile off is easily heard, the leaves cannot remain quiet; and now and again as the air rises into the most gentle breeze, and almost brings with it the sound of the very minnow's flip upon the surface of the water in the far-off pool, the leaves of the aspen vibrate to the sound, and their rustling falls sweeter on the ear than any music" (Forester, p. 199). It is true that there is an apology offered for this outburst, and Mr. Grigor very rarely ventures upon any so poetical flight; yet experience, we suspect, would establish the impossibility of treating the subject of arboriculture without some spice or leaven of the painter and the poet. We might say also, of the antiquary, for, as Mr. Grigor informs us in his always interesting data respecting the curiosities of "arboriculture," there are trees in the world that laugh to scorn the longevity of our oldest old men. To say nothing of those lusty old giants, the Winfarthing Oak and the King's Oak in Windsor Forest, said to have passed for old in the Conqueror's day; or the Cowthorp Oak in the West Riding, which measures 78 feet in circumference close to the ground, and will hold 84 persons within its hollow; or of the coeval beech in Windsor Forest, and Spanish chestnut at Tortworth—there is matter for comparison of vegetable with animal life, to the disadvantage of the latter, in the account of the cypress at Somna in Lombardy, spared by Napoleon in making his road over the Simplon, because of its accredited existence in Julius Cæsar's day (p. 245). Cypress timber has produced doors, those of the earlier St. Peter's at Rome, which lasted perfectly sound above 1,100 years. One of the oldest chestnut trees in the world stands on Mount Ætna, with a hollow interior in which a whole flock of sheep might be folded (p. 289). But the palm of longevity would be awarded without controversy to the plane-tree "which would overshadow a regiment," in the meadow of Buyukdere, on the Bosphorus. "Its circumference at the base is 141 feet, and its branches extend over a space of 130 feet in diameter, which, if it can be considered a single tree, is probably the largest in the world, and it possesses additional interest from the circumstance that, as De Candolle conjectures, it must be upwards of two thousand years old."

* Arboriculture; or, a Practical Treatise on Raising and [illegible] Forest Trees, &c. By John Grigor, The Nurseries, Forres, N.B. [illegible] Edmonston & Douglas. 1868

In Mr. Grigor's account of our various forest trees, indigenous and introduced, there seems to us the just proportion of anecdote and biography, so to speak, of particular trees and species of trees, to the more practical matter of growth and culture. He is less full of gossip than Selby, though more so than Mr. Brown, and least of all inclined to merge the question of profit and utility in the more showy and attractive one of ornament and embellishment. While not neglecting the charm of trunk, limbs, and foliage for the casual eye, he is studious to set before his readers the questions how, when, where, and what to plant, in such wise that the results may bear scrutiny by eyes accustomed to debtor and creditor balances, and to questions of interest, profit, and loss. Following his guidance, we should expect to find his constant readers devoting their energies and woodland acres to the plantation of larch and Highland pine among conifers, and of ash and poplar among deciduous trees. These afford the best prospect of an early interest on the outlay, and indeed of a revenue in an average lifetime. Mr. Brown quotes a forester's proverb, "that a larch will buy a horse before an oak will buy a saddle"; and though we suspect that this is a piracy from Fuller, who, writing about the Salix Alba, or Huntingdon willow, notices the local byword "that the profit by willows will buy the owner a horse before that by other trees will pay for his saddle," there can be no difficulty in understanding and justifying the transference of the saying to "larch," as contrasted with "oak." The goat-willow, indeed, has proved, in seaside plantations in Norfolk and Morayshire, so capable of becoming a great tree, and its timber is gradually acquiring so much more value since its application, because of its slowness to ignite, to the construction of railway brakes, as well as of railway carriages, that it would be unquestionably prudent to cultivate it much more generally in the soil it likes best, "a rich deep soil in the vicinity of water." But the larch is, with proper care and culture, adapted for greater varieties of soil, and for more widely extended uses as timber. Its thinnings come in for paling, hop-poles, and coal-props; and the mature tree serves not only for sleepers, mill-axles, and ship-timbers, but also for household furniture, of a beautiful clean yellow colour, which takes a fine polish, and darkens with age into a rich brownish yellow.

Not that we suppose Mr. Grigor would deem any timber that is grown superior to the Scotch pine in profit or usefulness, provided always that it is true Highland-bred. The result of his observations leads him to reject Don's theory of two varieties of this tree—one distinguishable by the tapering elongated cone, and the other by that which is thicker and not so pointed, the latter characterizing the old native firwoods, and the former the modern plantations which have so often failed. Mr. Grigor suspects that what Don attributes to a bad variety may be due rather to degeneracy, arising from the cultivation of the tree in the third and fourth generations far from its native soil and climate; and he adduces many proofs that in the case of good plants grown from seeds, or young plants direct from the native forests, be the soil bad or good, the issue will be timber equal to the best Riga deal. The true Highland pine is more robust, redder, and harder, and outlives many generations of the common cultivated fir. The banks of the Spey have supplied timber of this kind from one forest—Glenmore—sufficient to build 47 ships; and the Rothiemurchus forests produced for many years an annual revenue of more than 18,000*l.* It is not indeed so serviceable as oak for building ships of war, because a cannon ball would splinter the former, while it would drill the latter; but for unwarlike purposes it equals the best foreign pine from the Baltic, and the causes which have led to a contrary opinion are the premature falling of pine timber at 30 or 40 years old in Britain, and the error of letting the tree lie in its bark undried and uncut for weeks after falling. The foreign process is quite different, as a pine is not cut down in Norway or Silesia till it has reached at least 100 years. The premature cutting of Scotch pine necessitates a great quantity of sapwood, but even this is good if properly prepared and dried; and Mr. Selby suggests that it may be effectually hardened by steeping in lime-water, or by the more costly process of "kyanizing." The Highlanders adopt a similar process to make the wood of the alder serve for cabinets and tables, steeping it in bog-pits, which are often impregnated with lime. The hint which Mr. Grigor gives as to the dangers of the pine-seed while germinating, from the ravages of larks, linnets, pigeons, and partridges, will probably suggest to amateur planters that it may be better to buy young plants from a nursery; but he gives a lively picture of an even deadlier devastator of the larch seed-crop, when following a crop of Italian rye-grass. The larch crop had appeared above ground towards the end of May, and was promising well; but late one evening, after a heavy shower, Mr. Grigor perceived that in five or six beds on one side of the lot the plants had disappeared, and that in a similar space they were about half gone. The enemy was the grub-worm. He collected all his hands, and ordered them to dibble holes all over half an acre between the full crop and the blank land, as well as in every blank space between the beds and alleys. The object of this was only a temporary trap, but the device more than answered his expectations. An army of crows descended upon the ground, and, finding the grubs ready trapped, proceeded to exterminate them, and so to obviate the need of further precautions and preventives. The risks, indeed, to which the larch is subject, when of older growth, from the "coccus laricis" (p. 226), from atmospheric blight, from rot, blister, and other causes, are sufficiently formidable; but in spite of them all it is the most profitable of trees, with the most moderate amount of care, and provided always that the best home-grown seed is selected. The hardiest sort of larch in our climate is that which has a red blossom or female catkin. That which has a white blossom is the Tyrolese "Laricio Europæa flore albo," which, though more vigorous while young, is really far more tender, and should be avoided as much as possible (p. 212). The anecdote of the attempt of Lockhart of Lee to introduce larch plants into Scotland after the restoration of Charles II., which failed so long as he kept them potted in a hothouse, and was only successful when in desperation he thrust the remnant of them into the open air, is an indication of the adaptation of this valuable tree to a hardy climate, and of its fondness for ample breathing space. Of the introduced pines, firs, spruces, &c., it is doubtful whether any will come in this country to match the Scotch pine or the larch, though Mr. Grigor ventures a qualified prophecy in favour of the Californian "Lawson's Cypress," introduced so recently as 1854. The Pinus Lambertiana and the Abies Douglasii promise well, as hardy and bulky timber trees, and there are various importations noticeable for grace and ornamental character; but the average value of the timber of the best of the introduced conifers is not, as we gather from Mr. Grigor, at best more than that of the common or Lowland pine timber

We have left ourselves little space for noticing our author's accounts of deciduous trees. In the dispute respecting the relative excellence of the Quercus Pedunculata and Quercus Sessiliflora, he contents himself with affirming the superiority of the former as a timber tree, noticing, however, the freer growth of the latter while young, even in inferior soils. The author of the Forester is so convinced of the inferiority of the Sessiliflora, that he stedfastly rejects it in planting. The resemblance between the timber of this variety of oak and that of the Spanish chestnut, noticed in p. 263, does away, as Mr. Selby has pointed out, with any argument for the chestnut's indigenous origin on that score; and Mr. Grigor holds that it is fatal to any such claims that it suffers more from unfavourable seasons than any indigenous tree. His account of the sub-evergreen and evergreen sorts of oak, and particularly of the process of disbarking the cork tree at intervals of ten years, for the "cork of commerce," without hurt, nay rather with benefit to the growth and life of the tree, is curious and interesting; and we are glad to see that he does full justice to the poplar and the ash—trees which, in some quarters and among country woodmen, it is the fashion to depreciate. Not only is the former not, in any of its varieties, what Cobbett called it, "a great ugly tree," but it furnishes exceedingly useful timber for the purposes of the wheelwright and house carpenter. As to Cobbett's fallibility on such matters, we recommend our readers to the account given in p. 398 of his extravagant laudation of the Robinia or locust tree—a tree no longer planted, in spite of his prophecy—for its timber's sake. The ash, too, one of our thoroughly native trees, has met in Mr. Grigor's pages with discriminating favour. It comes into leaf too late and goes out too early to be ornamental in foliage, but its elegant, easy, graceful outline, as it sways to and fro with the storm, instead of fretting and fluttering like the oak, is a characteristic of it which others will have remarked who are not so conversant with tree life as our author. No thinnings pay better than ash; it is an excellent coppice wood; and, in spite of gainsayers, there is scarcely a tree which it would pay better to plant in suitable and congenial soils, with access to moisture.

Among the casual hints which we have gleaned from Mr. Grigor's pages, one is to the effect that constant removal of walnut trees not only makes them bear sooner, but also improves the quality of the fruit. Another is that the finest veined walnut timber is that nearest the root, and another, à propos of the beautiful-leaved umbrageous "sycamore," that it is the tree to plant on the south side of a dairy. There are many more facts worth knowing to be gleaned out of it both by amateurs and professionals: and the book carries on its face the evidence of thorough and long experience, as also of no small facility in the art of attracting the interest of every class of readers. We know no book on the subject of planting so exhaustive in proportion to its size.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

VARNHAGEN VON ENSE'S Diary * continues to drag its slow but not tedious length along. The tenth volume contains the history of 1853 and part of 1854, years of stagnation in the internal affairs of Prussia, and in which her weight in the councils of Europe was at its lowest. The contrast of this state of things with the present is amusing and, in the main, highly satisfactory, both as regards the progress achieved by the only great Power, after England, from which the cause of constitutional liberty has much to expect, and the destruction of that preponderance which the Emperor of Russia's reputation as the great maintainor of "order" enabled him to exercise over the Continent. Subserviency to Russia was one main cause of the low estate of Prussia when Varnhagen wrote, and his memoirs seasonably remind us how great and necessary a work was accomplished by the Crimean war, the statesmanship of which we have of late heard so flippantly disparaged. There is less of patriotic indignation and sarcastic comment than usual in this volume of the Diary; partly, no doubt, from the dulness of domestic politics, and partly also from the growth of a milder mood in the writer himself, whose temper, highly to his credit, was rather softened than soured by the advance of age. Many passages, especially those in which reference is made to Rahel, can only be adequately characterized by a German adjective, weich. Some of the notices of men of letters are highly interesting, especially one of an interview with Tieck shortly before his death. Tieck on this occasion said that in composition everything depended upon the first lines, which irrevocably determined the course, the tone, and the general character of the whole. In another place we find Varnhagen complaining of the extreme difficulty of attaining classic elegance in German. In any other language he would, he says, have been a far more voluminous author. Grote's History of Greece is enthusiastically praised as a work full of warmth and freshness, without a superfluous or careless word, a single dry passage, or any empty ostentation of learning. A saying respecting the brothers Humboldt is quoted, to the effect that they wanted no requisite of greatness, and nevertheless were not great. There is much truth in this, so far at least as Alexander von Humboldt is concerned.

Droysen, the latest historian of Gustavus Adolphus †, remarks in his preface that the biographies of this great king are already very numerous, and that his undertaking could hardly be justified if he did not propose to consider his subject in a new point of view. Hitherto, he thinks, Gustavus has been too much regarded in the light of a religious hero—a character which it is now pretty broadly implied he did not altogether deserve. Without disputing the immense services he rendered to Protestantism, Droysen rather sees in him the consummate statesman, whose actions were mainly determined by political considerations. Whatever truth there may be in this view of the career of Gustavus, at any rate it imparts novelty to an almost exhausted subject. He no longer appears as the epic hero who engrosses the action, but only as one of the personages of an exceedingly complicated drama; or, as Droysen expresses it, he is regarded with reference to his place in universal history. The springs of English, French, Dutch, and Spanish policy are all minutely investigated, and Gustavus occasionally retires for a while into the background. Neither does this volume refer to his principal exploits, as it only comprises the incidents that prepared the way for his expedition to Germany. It is, however, extremely interesting, and displays all Droysen's well-known lucidity and method. The author has consulted many valuable and hitherto unused documents in the Saxon and Bavarian archives. The policy of James I. of England receives especial consideration.

"Studies of Baltic and Russian Culture," by Julius Eckardt ‡, is an attractive volume, containing a series of entertaining essays on various matters of interest relating to the Baltic provinces of Russia. Much prospective importance attaches to these regions as an inevitable bone of contention between Russia and Germany. The attempts of the ruling State to extirpate the German element are at present judiciously ignored by Prussia, but when the day arrives when the Muscovite alliance is no longer indispensable, they may possibly form the occasion of a war of races on a colossal scale. Herr Eckardt's work abounds with testimonies of the silent but deadly antagonism between the two nations. In one of the most interesting of his essays he undertakes, with no inconsiderable success, the defence of the German "colony" against those Germans who tax it with rusticity and intellectual inferiority. Judging from the number of eminent men it has produced, this charge would certainly seem to be groundless. In another paper the works of the distinguished Russian novelist Tourguenef are reviewed, with the evident object of exhibiting his hostility to the democratic movement in his country. The national or anti-Western current of Russian political thought finds no more quarter in another paper on the socialistic system of the Russian peasant communities. The article concludes with the memorable observation of Cavour to a Russian, "The equal right of your peasants to the soil is more dangerous to us Westerns than all your armies." The Church and sects of Russia are the subjects of an elaborate essay. According to the writer, revolutionary principles have made great progress among the regular clergy; while the political exiles have omitted no opportunity of working upon the persecuted dissidents, and transforming religious discontent into political disloyalty. Essays of less extensive scope, but more interesting to the general reader, relate to various episodes of the history and biography of the Baltic provinces.

The "Twelve Articles of 1525" summed up the demands of the peasants who rose in revolt throughout South Germany in that year. Their history and origin are investigated by Dr. Alfred Stern *, who arrives at the conclusion that they were drawn up by a leader of the insurgents named Hubmaier, in the southern region of the Black Forest.

A history of the wars of Sout hern Germany for one hundred and fifty years † is a melancholy record of human folly. With the exception of the Hussite contest, whic h was a war of principle on both sides, and illustrious for the heroism of the weaker party, there is not one of them in which posterity now feels the slightest interest, or which can be said to have been undertaken for any adequate reason. Captain Würdinger's professional interest in them is intelligible, but few civilians will see anything in them but a dreary and deplorable chaos of useless carnage.

Herr Baxman n's concise biography of Schleiermacher ‡ is an excellent little book, admirably adapted for the extensive popular circulation for which it is designed. The Life of Stier §, by his sons, is completed in a somewhat more free and genial fashion than that in which it was commenced. Stier, the merely professional divine, presents an instructive contrast to Schleiermacher, a divine too, but also a patriot, a philosopher, and a man of letters.

Dr. Weiss's Manual of New Testament Theology ‖ is a learned and comprehensive work, drawn up secundum artem, in a number of paragraphs, in which the conclusions of the author are expressed, sprinkled like islands throughout an ocean of proofs and illustrations in small type. Dr. Weiss writes in the dry methodical spirit of a man of business, and does not seem to belong to any particular school of theology.

The epistles bearing the name of the philosopher Heraclitus ¶ are no doubt a forgery, but, having been composed while his works were still extant, have probably been the means of transmitting to us something of the spirit of his teaching. They are therefore not undeserving of the labour bestowed upon them by Herr Jacob Bernays, who has edited them with notes and an elegant translation.

Professor Arnold's treatise on Roman Law  is equally serviceable either as an introduction to the subject for professional, or a summary of it for non-professional, readers. It is mainly divided into two great sections—one treating of the law of property in its relation to individual rights; the other, of the constitution of the family, and testamentary law. A preliminary study, which will perhaps be read with more general interest, traces the decline of the Roman empire to its social and economic causes, and endeavours to account for the curious fact of jurisprudence having formed an exception to the general decay. It is possible that Professor Arnold may place this decadence too early. So late as the time of Septimius Severus, an emperor could accumulate vast treasures by economical administration, without incurring the reproach of oppressiveness. Those complaints of systematic financial oppression which indicate that the resources of the State are seriously strained do not become audible until the age of Constantine.

It is a subject for regret that our information respecting the reigns of the best Roman Emperors should be so scanty. J. Dierauer seems to have collected all that can be known about Trajan, and has not only bestowed a world of pains on the investigation of chronological and other difficulties, but has produced a very agreeable narrative. The work †† of which it is a portion is a collection of prize essays and other publications connected with the University of Zurich, relating to the history of the Roman Empire. We trust that it may be continued, for it is a most convenient receptacle for dissertations that might otherwise be lost. The still more obscure reign of Antoninus Pius is examined in another essay. The most elaborate of any relates to Diocletian, to whose career unusual attention has been directed of late. An essay on Commodus is the medium for a comparison between the respective merits of Dio Cassius and Herodian, much to the advantage of the former, whose excellence will appear still more conspicuous when we consider that we only possess the most important portion of his history, comprising the occurrences of which he was himself a witness, in the abridgment of a Byzantine Greek.

A Life of Bentley * cannot be expected to present much novelty, but should be welcome to Englishmen for the enthusiastic admiration bestowed by the author upon the genius of our great classical philologist. Herr Maehly is less favourable to Bentley's character as a man, but his discussion of Bentley's critical achievements is conducted con amore, and animated by the sympathy which can only be derived from a community of taste and feeling. His information respecting the details of Bentley's literary controversies is very exact, though he has hardly bestowed sufficient attention on the character and position of his opponents. An appendix contains Bentley's notes on the first two books of the Iliad, from his MS. in the Library of Trinity College. The notes on the other books are still unpublished, though Bentley was Master of the College, and his MSS. have reposed in the library for a hundred and twenty-six years. They manage these things differently in Germany.

Dr. Fritsch † deserves an honorable place among the German travellers who have recently done so much to extend our knowledge of the earth. If the scope of his researches has been less extensive than in the case of Barth and Bastian, and if the subject of his investigations lacks novelty in comparison with theirs, he has the merit of equal diligence, and the recommendation of a much less ponderous method of treatment, and a more attractive style. The present work, indeed, but imperfectly represents the extent of his inquiries, as he has had the discretion to withhold the mass of scientific detail which could only confuse the general reader. His ethnographical observations will form the subject of a separate work, and the details of medicine and zoology have already made their appearance in various scientific journals. The volume as we have it is a circumstantial but agreeable narrative of various expeditions, in the course of which the author traversed the greater part of the Cape Colony, the Dutch Free States, and Natal. The last named colony is his favourite, and he seems to presage a brilliant future for it. It is one of those few fortunate regions which are equally favourable to European constitutions and to tropical products. Want of labour is the great obstacle to its prosperity at present, and the consequent introduction of Indian coolies promises to lead to a singular mixture of races. The Cape Colony finds less favour with the traveller, who seems to think it within the bounds of possibility that the country may be gradually becoming a desert. At all events, the great uncertainty and unequal distribution of rain are most serious obstacles to agriculture, and the probable destiny of the country is to be an enormous sheepwalk. Dr. Fritsch speaks very favourably of the English settlers, and declares that the colony would have merely vegetated without them. The retreat of the Dutch Boers into the independent republics which they have established in the interior he regards as occasioned by no oppression, but simply by their inability to exist alongside of the more enterprising race. The abolition of slavery by the English, and their humane regulations for the protection of the natives, were highly offensive to the Boers. The work is beautifully and profusely illustrated with coloured plates after sketches and woodcuts taken from photographs, both of which give a lively idea of the very characteristic scenery of South Africa.

There are Alps in Austria as well as in Switzerland, and an Alpine club, which duly publishes its annals.‡ This publication has already reached its fourth volume. It is a handsome and substantial volume, full of information. The most interesting paper is one on the Austrian mountain lakes, which are very numerous, and apparently for the most part very picturesque. A table, digested with true German thoroughness, gives their respective length, breadth, circumference, depth, elevation, geology, the colour of their waters, and a number of interesting remarks. Anglers, as well as tourists, may derive much information from this valuable essay, which also contains many interesting particulars respecting the inhabitants of the wild and simple regions to which it refers.

Dr. Bleek § investigates the origin of language by the help of the Darwinian theory. Like most writers of his school, he seems insufficiently alive to the distinction between plausible hypotheses and ascertained facts.

"Grammatical Studies" * and "Mineralogical Studies" † are intended to form a series of essays in these sciences, published occasionally as opportunity may serve. The former commences with a disquisition on an abstruse point of Latin philology; the latter with a catalogue of minerals arranged according to their specific weights.

A treatise on Political Economy, by Professor von Mangoldt ‡, is posthumous, and only comprises half the author's task as he had proposed it to himself. It treats of the acquisition, conservation, and distribution of wealth, and has been prepared for publication by an anonymous friend. It is learned, exhaustive, and dry. The author does not seem to have belonged to any school of political economy in particular, or to have concerned himself much with the more exciting aspects of politico-economical problems.

The German Shakspeare Society §, to which we are indebted for so many valuable illustrations of the poet, has lost its able president, Friedrich Bodenstedt, whose place, however, is well filled by his successor, Karl Elze, and the third annual volume exhibits no perceptible falling off. One of the contributions to it, indeed—the essay on Richard III., by W. Oechelhäuser—is perhaps the most remarkable ever published by the Society. The character of Richard is analysed with rare discrimination, and many points raised by commentators are satisfactorily met and disposed of. It is a crying sin of critics to attribute to Shakspeare all kinds of political and philosophical tendencies, from which he was entirely exempt. Fortunately for himself, he wrote for a simple public, for which the mere representation of action as it had been, or might have been, was sufficient. Except for the sake of paying an occasional compliment to the sovereign, he had no temptation to introduce allusions to political matters. Political faction hardly existed in his day, and, as the Puritans kept aloof from the theatre, he was as little compelled as inclined to trouble himself with religious controversies. One thing, indeed, was expected from him, the glorification of his native country, and there his own feelings fully corresponded to those of his audience. Beyond this, scarcely any trace of political sentiment can be found in his plays, except a good-humoured contempt for the inconstancy of the populace, and this was not derived from speculation, but from observation. He drew men as he found them. Dr. Ulrici writes on a subject usually avoided by Shakspearian critics—the defects of the poet. He does not seem to have discovered anything very new, or very terrible, but his paper is of service as showing that the Society is not run away with by a blind admiration. Other valuable essays are those on Troilus and Cressida, and Antony and Cleopatra, and the very interesting account of the representation of Shakspeare's plays at Meiningen under the management of Bodenstedt.

Another essay on Richard III., by Kuno Fischer ‖, is distinguished by precision, thoroughness, and an absence of all fancifulness, but hardly equally so by novelty. Dr. Tschischwitz's ¶ essays in Shakspearian criticism, most of which we have already noticed, have been collected into an elegant series of little volumes. The Doctor is sometimes a trifle too ingenious, but his remarks are always well worth attention, except when he tries his hand at emending Shakspeare's text. The knack of felicitous emendation is a gift which may be developed by study, but cannot be created by it.

It would be curious to investigate the effect of the introduction of reading for railways on the style of German popular literature. Moritz Hartmann, at all events, seems to have recognised and accommodated himself to the requisite of this new order of composition. The structure of his sentences is concise, the sequence of incident rapid, and he avoids obscurity. The consequence is that his novel is free from the besetting sins of German fiction, and although in no way a high-class work, is a success in its line. Herr Simons' Roman stories are†† like so many chapters from the Last Days of Pompeii, greatly impaired in vigour and splendour of colouring, and even more palpably an artificial product of modern feeling. "Papers of a Jewish Family" ‡‡ is a story which shows from the first the strongest inclination to transform itself into a treatise on theology from a Jewish point of view, and ends by becoming one in good earnest.

THE ARMIES OF THE CONTINENT.

A LETTER from a Correspondent which has appeared in the Times within the past week gives a very useful and lucid account of the present position of the chief armies of the Continent. It suggests many reflections as to the political prospects of the immediate future, and mainly of a cheering character. It would be an incalculable advantage to the happiness of Europe if the huge armaments of the great Powers could be reduced; but we may take for granted that for the present they will not be reduced, and the next best thing to knowing that they will be reduced is knowing that they are not likely to be used. Various causes may produce a war. There may be a sudden crisis somewhere, and Europe may be dragged into a war against the wishes of all the combatants; or there may be, what the Correspondent of the Times chiefly dreads, a general upheaval of the peoples. This, however, is a remote danger, and one about which it is in vain to speculate. From the very form in which it is presented to us it escapes criticism, for it presupposes one of those movements of the minds of masses of human beings which are almost involuntary, and which come in a manner and at an hour that cannot be foreseen. We must be content to set against those elements of restlessness and those permeations of new wishes and new ideas which made such an upheaval likely, those indisputable tendencies to gain material results, and to seek satisfaction in the development of natural resources and of trade, which make such an upheaval improbable. But, looking only at the present position of the armies of the Continent, we may say that they are not such as to induce us to think a great war imminent. The general result may be said to be briefly this. Of the Great Powers, Austria and Russia are unprepared for war; France and Prussia are ready for war, but neither has such a superiority as to tempt it into a struggle. None of the secondary Powers have any means of making war, or anything to gain by war, and therefore Europe is safe for the moment from those movements of small, well-prepared, adventurous States which, like Piedmont, are in critical times not only eager, but in a large measure able, to force on a war between more powerful neighbours. Prussia, although prepared for war, is certain, both for political reasons and on account of the nature of her army, to stand on the defensive as long as possible. The single question therefore is, whether France will so act as to make war inevitable. Into the question whether the EMPEROR may be driven to make war, rather than face domestic difficulties, it is beside our present purpose to enter. But no one can doubt that he himself now wishes for peace, that the vast majority of Frenchmen of all classes and callings wish for peace, that capitalists and traders only talk as if they wished for war because they like to disguise from themselves and others that the stagnation of which they complain is mainly due to reckless speculation, and that no one really desires war in France except a portion of the higher officers of the army and a few fanatics who hope that, somehow or other, the EMPEROR may be ruined and his Government overthrown if a war takes place. The EMPEROR has just said that he considers he has worked up the French army to the exact point which gives the surest pledge of peace. So long as the French nation thought that the Prussians had an army in any respect superior to their own, they were restless and dissatisfied, and watched everything that Prussia did with jealousy and suspicion. But now they will be tranquillized by the assurance that they have an army in every way worthy of France, and quite able to make the influence of France felt and her wishes respected. The EMPEROR may not think what he says, but this is what he says in language which, for him, is singularly plain. And the statistics given by the Correspondent of the Times support his version of the facts. They show that France may at any moment meet Prussia certainly as an equal, and possibly as something a little beyond an equal; but they do not show that France has any superiority which, if she challenged Prussia, would warrant her in expecting an easy victory.

France has on paper an army of 1,350,000 men, and could, it is said, put into the field, at a very short notice, a fighting army of half a million of soldiers. The infantry are armed with breech-loaders which, if not altogether satisfactory to a military critic, are pronounced to be better than the needle-guns of the Prussians. The armies of the first line are supported by an equally strong army of reserve. The French troops are not only well drilled and handled, in spite of some obstacles thrown by old officers in the way of improvements desired by the EMPEROR, but they are in many respects better drilled and handled than Prussian soldiers. The field artillery is neither very good nor very bad, and the French have a new engine of war in the mitrailleur, which the military critic thinks not likely to be of much practical use, but which may act as a bogy, and frighten an enemy by its novelty. The French army is also supported by a fleet with which Prussia has nothing at all to compare. The Prussians could easily bring into the field an army of half a million men, and their reserves would perhaps be found not very inferior to those of France. The force on paper of the North German Confederation slightly exceeds a million of men, but then South Germany has a paper force of 200,000, and in all probability the national feeling would be strong enough to make all Germany go together. The Prussian artillery, strong in number of pieces, has not brought out of the war with Austria the reputation of being well managed, and much the same may be said of the Prussian cavalry. But Prussia is as strong in fortresses as France is, and either Power would find it difficult to penetrate into the territory of the other. Altogether, what we read leaves the impression that the best judges consider that, army for army, France has a superiority, but that this superiority is a slight one; and if France is to be the attacking Power, the advantage of being on the defensive may restore an equality to Prussia. There is nothing in this to inspire the belief that France would go to war with Prussia in the hope of a short war, with a brilliant military success; and every Frenchman who takes the trouble to inform himself of the facts must feel that, although he may patriotically take it for granted that France would have the best of it in a war, yet a war with Prussia would be a very serious affair. Austria has every motive to keep quiet, and her political reasons for desiring a period of rest in which to consolidate and develop her strength must be largely fortified by the present position of her army. Her artillery and cavalry are both excellent, and she has a nominal force of a million of men; but her military strength in time of peace is limited to a quarter of a million, and although she has managed to get breech-loaders for 600,000 men, yet she does not spend a florin on war purposes which she can economize. Not only is there absolutely no work carried on by the Government in the arsenal of Vienna, but the arsenal has been let as a big workshop to a private manufacturer. Russia, again, is as little prepared for war as Austria. Her force on paper indeed exceeds that of France by more than a hundred thousand men, but only a small portion of her troops are armed with breech-loaders, and it is stated, or fabled, that when the CZAR not long ago moved about from station to station inspecting different bodies of troops, the same set of breech-loaders were always sent forward and used over and over again by the regiments inspected. Russia, too, has very few rifled cannon; and not only are her railways, by which the troops must be moved, if they are to act with celerity, not completed, but the soldiers are largely employed in making them. She, therefore, has certainly nothing in the present position of her army to make her desirous of war, and unless war is forced on her, she will much prefer the cheaper and quieter employment of trying to exhaust Turkey and Austria by perpetual petty intrigues.

The minor States are quite destitute of the means of making war. Italy has a respectable force on paper, but few of her troops would be of use against the forces of a great Power. She has no money or credit, she has to keep a considerable portion of her population down by main force, and above all, she has a vast French encampment in her very centre, fully equipped and garrisoned, in compliment to the spiritual head of Latin Christianity. The fact is that, as many Italians are beginning to see, the Italian army is too large; for while it does not enable Italy to enjoy much political consideration in Europe, it cripples the resources of the country. As to Spain nothing need be said. Her armies will have quite enough to do in putting down the Cubans, and in making or unmaking revolutionary chieftains. She could supply France with a small contingent, for which she might exact some tiny political advantage; but in doing so she would place herself at the disposal and under the dominion of the Emperor NAPOLEON; and the fear of being driven into a situation so embarrassing will make her do her utmost, not only to avoid a war for herself, but to prevent a war breaking out. She has already had the honour, according to Count BISMARK, of preventing, last autumn, a great war from breaking out, although she did this unconsciously, and merely had one of her revolutions exactly at the right time. If a Spanish revolution is the real secret for preventing European wars, we think that we may rely on Spain always contributing her kind assistance. Turkey, as has just been proved, will not and cannot go to war unless she is permitted and as to her state of preparation, the military critic describes her as perpetually engaged in first buying Armstrong guns, and then selling or losing the ammunition. The Turks would, perhaps, be fully equal to crushing the Greeks, but they will keep out of a great war as long as they can. Of the armies of small peaceful States like Sweden, Denmark, or Portugal it is quite unnecessary to take any account. They would doubtless, if attacked, defend themselves with tenacity and bravery, such as the Danes displayed against Prussia; but the general course of European politics could not be affected by their exertions. The general consideration of the position of European armies inspires, therefore, the hope that war is not very likely, unless there is an upheaval or something about which no one can measure probabilities. It also suggests that the view that if a war broke out, it might be a short, sharp, decisive one, is very probably mistaken, and is founded on false analogies drawn from Solferino and Sadowa. Prussia is very strong as a defensive Power, very much stronger than Austria was in Italy or in Bohemia, and her frontier is so effectually guarded that there is no reason for supposing that everything would be at an end in a few weeks. No one supposes that France would be beaten and own herself defeated in a few weeks; and what ground is there for supposing that Prussia would, at the end of a single campaign, own herself defeated? The speculation so frequently entered into in trading and mercantile circles on the Continent, that war would be better than the present state of armed peace, is based on the notion, which is probably quite delusive, that the differences between France and Prussia would be settled in a single very big battle, after which they would shake hands, be very good friends, and give an opening for enterprising people to invest their money at a profit. Why these persons, whose business it is in life to calculate all contingencies and be guided by all kinds of experience, should forget all the long wars, and remember only the short wars of recent times, can only be explained by supposing that they think whatever they wish for is sure to happen.

THE CONFERENCE.

THE Protocol to which the Paris Conference has agreed is feeble enough to explain the facility with which it was composed and adopted. As might have been expected, the Conference continued its deliberations in the absence of the Greek Minister, who had, indeed, never been invited to take an effective part in the debates. Two or three sittings sufficed for the production of a formula which probably contained the only propositions in which the Powers could concur. As it had been previously understood that the decision of the Conference would not bind its members to any course of action, it was perhaps as well that the Protocol should be confined to empty commonplaces. It may still serve the purpose of preventing war, if Russia, France, and Austria are sincere in their professed desire of maintaining peace for the present. It is not yet certain whether the different Governments are pledged to be neutral in the conflict which would follow on the rejection of the implied advice to Greece. There are some quarrels in which bystanders most effectually preserve the peace by declining to restrain the pugnacity of an eager combatant. Once thoroughly convinced that the contest with Turkey will not be interrupted, Greece will perhaps be inclined to defer even to an insinuated censure on her recent policy. No body of Plenipotentiaries ever devised so odd a method of either forming or communicating an opinion. The Conference, not being prepared to assert that the Greek Government has inflicted wrong on Turkey, gravely propounds the doctrine that one State is not permitted by international law to organize expeditions during peace into the territory of another. It is added that it is also forbidden to equip privateers to break a lawful blockade; and the document is finally transmitted to Athens for the dispassionate consideration of the Government. The Greeks are of course at liberty to reply that the cruisers which took men and stores to Greece were not privateers, as they were certainly not provided with letters of marque; nor will they hesitate on occasion to repeat the statements which have often been made in their despatches, that the volunteer bands were organized by private enterprise, without the knowledge of the Government. They might fairly add that it was an eccentric course to forward to them a string of general propositions, when the Conference shrank from charging them with any violation of public law. There is, however, some reason to hope that they may accept the hint offered by the Conference, although it may have been anomalously conveyed. The Greek Minister at Paris has lately, in spite of his eloquent protest, shown a conciliatory disposition by attributing the want of instructions from his Government to an opportune breach of the telegraph wires. His remaining scruples will perhaps have been removed by the decision of the Conference that the Protocol should be communicated to the Porte as well as to the Government of Athens. The Turkish Plenipotentiary not unnaturally objected that, as he was a party to the document, he might be supposed to have already informed his Government of its contents; but the members of the Conference were apparently the more ostentatious in their impartiality, because they had in the first instance made a distinction between the two principals in the quarrel.

The assemblage of the Conference, if it has served no other purpose, has at least had the advantage of delaying for three weeks the actual commencement of hostilities. In the meantime, although the Greeks had offered additional provocation by almost openly avowing the complicity of their Government with the enterprises of the volunteers and blockade-runners, the capture of the main body of Greek auxiliaries in Crete practically abolished the principal cause of war. As the Cretan insurrection seems to be at an end, the ill-will of Greece will for the present be innocuous to Turkey; and it is always easy for the stronger of two belligerents to make peace after obtaining a marked success. It may be supposed that the Greeks have also discovered that the time is not propitious to a desperate venture. The interval allowed by the Paris negotiations has been employed at Athens, not so much in serious preparations for war, as in domestic measures which would perhaps have been thought too scandalous except in the time of a great national emergency. The Chamber, summoned to provide means for the war, voted a large gratuity to each of its own members, and authorised the Government to raise money at its discretion, or, in other words, by the issue of irredeemable paper money, by forced loans, and by various other methods which might have been borrowed from the practice of Mexico. It is stated that among other measures of financial policy, the Government has seized the funds of the Bank of Athens, notwithstanding the natural protest of the directors. Even a Greek Minister would scarcely annihilate public credit on the eve of a war; but it is not improbable that he might encourage the belief in an immediate rupture as a pretext for confiscation. A hope that the kingdom of Greece may expand into a Hellenic empire would be legitimate and laudable if it were combined with an attempt to deserve the proposed aggrandizement. A well-governed kingdom of Greece would long since have attracted the sympathy of Europe and the confidence of the Christian population of Turkey. It was not by anarchy and lawlessness that the two great States which have arisen within ten years earned their rapid extension. Piedmont was the most frugal, the most orderly, and the most military portion of Italy before it united the whole Peninsula under its ancient dynasty. Prussia was, even in civilized Germany, the best representative of culture, of discipline, and of vigorous government. The would-be centre of Greek nationality has none of the magnetic power which might have been supplied by administrative energy and political prudence. But for the complications which might ensue, a thorough defeat by the superior force of Turkey might perhaps be ultimately beneficial to Greece. Habitual confidence of security from retaliation is a strong temptation to an ambitious State, and the discovery that impunity has its limits would tend to check a barren and mischievous turbulence. The coercion which was exercised over Greece by the Western Powers during the Russian war produced the wholesome reaction which eventually caused the fall of OTHO; and an unprosperous campaign against the Turks would probably bring Ministers into power who would understand that the regeneration of Greece, which is the first condition of aggrandizement, must begin at home. The considerable territory which was added to the kingdom by the English cession of the Ionian protectorate has assuredly not been benefited by the transfer of its allegiance. A comparison with Turkish administration would probably present a different result; but the chiefs of the Cretan insurrection unconsciously satirized the State of which they claimed to form a part, by alleging as one of their grievances the neglect of the Turkish Government to make roads in the island. A country without roads, without credit, and without security to life or property, ought to be far more powerful than Greece before it meditates a policy of conquest.

It is stated that the Turkish Government is prepared to withdraw the ultimatum, if the Greeks are willing to submit to the mild rebuke of the Conference. It is probable that the SULTAN and his Mahomedan subjects were profoundly irritated by a long succession of affronts and injuries; but sagacious Turkish statesmen must be well aware that the range of possible vengeance is artificially limited. The European Powers, which may perhaps remain neutral while a Greek detachment is defeated, or a cruiser sunk at sea, will not acquiesce in the conquest of any portion of Hellenic territory. The clamour against an encroachment on the frontiers of Christendom would be irresistible, even if it were not consistent with the policy of some or all of the protecting States. Another reason for caution is to be found in the complicated intrigues which are attributed to three out of the five Great Powers. Russian writers, speaking almost openly in the name of their Government, are loudly declaiming against England as the supposed diplomatic antagonist of France; and against Prussia, which is, with better reason, believed to be obnoxious to the Emperor NAPOLEON. It is certain that large offers are made by Russia for the co-operation of France in the East; and it is at least conceivable that the temptation of isolating Prussia might prove irresistible. The strangest anomaly in recent politics consists in the alleged encouragement of Greek pretensions by Austria. It is not difficult to understand that Baron BEUST may wish to embroil France and Prussia; but an alliance between Russia and France against Turkey would force Austria into an opposite policy. It is remarkable that in all overtures for an understanding with France, the Russian organs invariably express inveterate animosity to Austria. The confusion of rivalries may probably prevent a war; but the commencement of hostilities in any quarter might give the signal for a general conflict, and Turkey, which has nothing to gain, could scarcely fail in the end to be a principal sufferer. Recent experience is not encouraging to sanguine believers in the wisdom or morality of Governments and of nations.

THE TRIAL OF ELECTION PETITIONS.

TWO trials of election petitions have taken place this week which are extremely important, both on account of the principles of law they lay down, and on account of the impression they are likely to produce on the minds of future candidates and their supporters. At Norwich, Sir HENRY STRACEY has been unseated for bribery committed by one of his agents; and at Drogheda, Mr. WHITWORTH has been unseated for exercising, by himself and his agents, undue influence. Mr. Baron MARTIN conducted the trial at Norwich, and, after the evidence was over, proceeded to give his decision. He first laid down the doctrine that from the very moment when any agent of a candidate is guilty of bribery on his behalf, the candidate is ipso facto disqualified to sit in Parliament. He is a man for whom all votes are thrown away. He cannot by law be returned. The question then arose whether any agent of Sir HENRY STRACEY had been guilty of bribery. A man named HARDIMENT, who had absconded, had unquestionably been guilty of bribery. Even Sir HENRY STRACEY'S counsel could not contend against the overwhelming evidence by which this was established. HARDIMENT drew two hundred pounds out of a bank, went to a public-house shortly before the close of the poll, where a number of hesitating electors were waiting, and was seen giving these men a pound apiece. Nothing could be more simple or more clear; but then was HARDIMENT an agent of Sir HENRY STRACEY? It was shown that he was engaged and acted as a canvasser in one of the wards, to the knowledge of the principal agent of Sir HENRY STRACEY in that ward. This was enough, for according to the doctrine laid down at Windsor by Mr. Justice WILLES, every authorised canvasser is an agent, and in this particular case the canvasser happened to canvass in company with Sir HENRY STRACEY'S son. Mr. Baron MARTIN expressed his full belief in the entire veracity of Sir HENRY STRACEY, who deposed that he had not expended a farthing himself in bribery, and had given strict injunctions that no bribery should be practised on his side. But when an authorised canvasser bribes, even against the express wishes and instructions of the candidate, from the instant when the bribe is given the candidate becomes a person who cannot be returned. Mr. Baron MARTIN expressed a very natural wish to know where the money came from which HARDIMENT expended so lavishly and persuasively, and he said that he hoped to be able to discover this when the scrutiny applied for by the defeated candidate was taken. But he was disappointed. In order to win the seat, Mr. TILLETT, the defeated candidate, would have had to strike off 158 votes, and his counsel declared himself unable to carry his case so far. Consequently no further evidence was taken, and unless a Commission is issued to enquire into the election, the secrets of HARDIMENT will not be disclosed. It is for Mr. Baron MARTIN to determine whether he will report that bribery prevailed extensively at Norwich at the last election, on which Report a Commission would in due course be issued by the House of Commons. But the Judge intimated with tolerable clearness that he was prepared to make such a Report, and he observed that the extent to which bribery was carried at the last election at Norwich was not only very gross, but very easy of detection. Until half-past one on the polling-day Sir HENRY STRACEY was in a decided minority, but afterwards he began to gain, and between three and half-past three no less than 504 votes were recorded for him, chiefly by voters who came to the poll unmistakeably drunk. It was also proved that shortly before half-past three HARDIMENT spent his 200*l.* as above stated. The Commissioners would then, as Mr. Baron MARTIN remarked, only have to take the names of the last five hundred voters for Sir HENRY STRACEY, and they would know who had been bribed and where to turn for evidence. It is certainly very sad that a town like Norwich, with a body of 11,000 electors, should be punished for the fault of a few of their body. But everything showed that, with a considerable portion of the electors, the notion that an election was a time when they could and would get money was treated as a matter of course; and if the House does not mark in some signal manner its sense of the enormity of a state of things in which five hundred voters are bought at the last moment, and brought up drunk to the poll, the whole attempt to enforce purity of elections will be turned into a farce.

Mr. Justice KEOGH tried the Drogheda petition, and if we are glad that Mr. Baron MARTIN exposed with firmness and rebuked with severity the corruption practised at Norwich, we are also glad that the Irish Judge displayed equal firmness and severity in exposing and rebuking the intimidation exercised—especially by Romish priests—at Drogheda. Mr. Justice KEOGH also began by laying down a very important legal doctrine. He stated that if an organized system of bribery is proved to have existed, the election is invalid. An election may be invalidated although bribery cannot be traced home either to the candidate or his agents. In such a case it is not merely that the judge will strike off the votes of those bribed or bribing, but, without any scrutiny, the member may be unseated. The whole election is nullified, because it has been conducted in a tainted atmosphere. In the same way, if there has been general intimidation—if, as at Drogheda, a reign of terror prevails on the polling-day, and voters can only vote at considerable risk, or are deterred from voting by fear—then the whole election goes for nothing, although neither the sitting member nor any of his agents can be shown to have participated in or countenanced any acts of intimidation. It is not they who are punished for doing wrong, but the election is altogether vitiated because it was not held in such a manner as the law prescribes. Nor does it in any way remove the objection that the majority of the electors can be proved to have voted without fear, and that so the same result has been attained as would have been attained if there had been no intimidation practised. The majority can only return a member if the election itself is rightly held; and if there is general intimidation, the election is not rightly held. And there is this difference between general bribery or treating and general intimidation:—In cases of bribery and treating, it is possible to estimate roughly who and how many people are bribed and treated. But no one can say how many persons are intimidated. If—to use an example taken by Mr. Justice KEOGH—a priest says, as priests unhappily have said often at Irish elections, "You will be lost hereafter "if you vote for the man against whom I warn you," it is impossible to say how many members of the congregation are terrified. Whenever, therefore, there is any general spiritual and physical intimidation practised, a valid election cannot be held; and, in order to decide whether the intimidation is general, we are not to be guided solely by the number of persons who can be proved to have been intimidated. At Drogheda there was spiritual and physical intimidation of the most violent and gross kind. The priests were violent with the frantic violence of coarse, ignorant, fanatical peasants, puffed up with the pride of spiritual authority. One advised his misguided hearers to put down the Catholics who voted for the Orange candidate "at any "risk"; another recommended his spiritual slaves to "throw "their enemies into the Boyne"; another, in the spirit of the Quaker who said he hoped no one would think of pumping on a man whom a mob wished to punish, pointed out that a set of Orange assassins were coming to butcher the Catholics at Drogheda, and that his hearers might as well go out to meet them; but at the same time "he did not want the "people of Drogheda to treat these proceedings as they "deserved." As to the behaviour of the mob guided by these miserable fanatics, it was armed with sticks and bolts; it overawed the stipendiary magistrate; it was so violent and so powerful, that a small military force stationed there found itself unable to protect voters, and men who intended to vote were threatened with death if they dared to vote the wrong way. It so happened that two of Mr. WHITWORTH's agents were clearly shown to have encouraged the violence of the mob, and some of the most violent speeches of the priests were made from the windows of the hotel where Mr. WHITWORTH was staying. Participation in the exercise of undue influence was therefore brought home in this particular instance to the sitting member and his agents; but what is important to notice is, that Mr. WHITWORTH would equally have been unseated if this could not have been done. He connived at the bad practices which rendered the whole election void, but the election would have been void although he had not in any way connived at them.

It is impossible that these decisions should not produce a great and most salutary effect. Bribery is wrong, does great moral harm, corrupts a town for years, brutalizes the poor wretches who are persuaded by gold and beer to go to the poll, and degrades still more the bribers who supply the cash and the liquor. But, putting aside all considerations of this kind, what, as Mr. Baron MARTIN asked, is the use of bribery? It is not at all likely that the fact that bribery has been committed can be kept dark. Gangs of drunken men at various public-houses comparing notes after the close of the poll, and mad with jealousy at finding that some of them have got more than others, will not so far keep their feelings to themselves that no one on the other side will know of what is going on. Directly this knowledge is obtained, a petition is presented, and then the men who have taken a bribe to vote are bribed to reveal that they have been bribed. One lady at Guildford acknowledged, with charming frankness, that she had offered a voter bribed by the Liberals inducements to give evidence on the petition, because she was of such very strong Conservative principles. Anyhow, evidence is collected, and then, as Mr. Baron MARTIN observed, the petition is tried, not before a Committee of the House of Commons, composed of gentlemen unable to resist the specious arguments of counsel, but by persons who have made hundreds, and listened to thousands, of such speeches, and know exactly what they are worth. Mr. Justice KEOGH was able to go still further, for he could not only estimate the value of counsel's speeches, but, as he said, he had been in the House and sat on Committees, and knew from personal experience that these decisions were the decisions of persons who knew nothing of law, and, therefore, he could not feel bound to follow them. His doctrine of the effects of general bribery, treating, or intimidation, without the complicity of the candidate and his agents, was, he owned, not in accordance with the decisions of Parliamentary Committees; but this, he observed, did not at all alter the law which a judge was to lay down. If it is thoroughly good law that an election is altogether void which is attended by the exercise of spiritual tyranny on the part of the priests, or of physical violence on the part of the mob, a great many Irish elections must have been void which have been allowed to pass unquestioned. Henceforth the priests may find it worth their while to ask what will be the use of damning their flocks if they vote wrong. They will only be making the election void, even if they get in the man they favour with their patronage. It is difficult to imagine that any argument will prevail on Irishmen sufficiently to induce them to abstain from a good mob fight. The next best thing to the mind of an Irish peasant, after breaking some one else's head, is to get his own head broken, and an election is always looked on as an occasion when he has a right to expect either the one blessing or the other. But if anything could induce an Irish mob to keep what, in that country, would be thought reasonably quiet, it would be the conviction that if it gratified its natural longings, it would inevitably prevent its favourite candidate from being elected. That bribery and intimidation will henceforth be quite unknown is, of course, very unlikely; but we may say that the new system invented last Session, and the mode in which that system has been worked by the Judges, promises to be effectual against bribery and intimidation to a degree far beyond what the most sanguine supporters of the Bill could have foreseen.

THE OPENING OF THE FRENCH CHAMBERS.

THE Emperor NAPOLEON overrates the long-suffering of his Government when he describes it as "sufficiently "strong to bear even the excesses of liberty." It may, it is true, have great latent powers of endurance, but an ordinary observer would certainly be disposed to hold that its patience has been remarkably little tried in this respect. The EMPEROR, however, sees the events of the autumn and winter in a different light from that in which they appear to the public. The "excesses of liberty" are the publication of a subscription list in a newspaper and a visit to a tomb at Montmartre. To "bear" them means to be satisfied with prosecuting all concerned in the ordinary Courts, instead of shipping them off to Cayenne without trial. Virtue no doubt admits of degrees, and in comparison with the events of seventeen years ago, the present Imperial policy may be fairly characterized as lenient. But if the EMPEROR had not himself called attention to the demeanour of the Government in the presence of the recent manifestations, it is to be feared that this heroic composure would have altogether escaped notice. Happily, the self-command of the Sovereign has found its reward and its justification in the conduct of the French people. A factious agitation has, indeed, been created "in a certain quarter," and ideas and feelings "which were believed to be extinguished" have reappeared, but the nation itself "has not felt its faith "in the future shaken." In another part of the Speech, the causes of this steadfast attitude are set forth in more detail. "The popular masses are staunch in their faith, as in their "affections; and, if noble passions are able to rouse them, "sophism and calumny scarce ruffle the surface." In plain words, the EMPEROR has taken the measure of the situation, and sees no reason to modify the general lines on which his policy has been built. It is to the peasantry, and their susceptibility to "great passions," that he still looks for support. They will fight, that is—if need be—to keep the POPE at Rome, to readjust the Rhenish frontier, or even to put down revolution. But they are unaffected by well-planted allusions to the coup d'état, and are generally proof against epigrams. It is probable that NAPOLEON III. does not go beyond the mark in cherishing this modest confidence. Under the Empire the great towns are not France, and the real sentiments of the nation outside them are not easily divined by foreign observers. But such evidences as there are seem to point with reasonable uniformity in the direction mentioned in the Imperial Speech and indicated still more surely by the Imperial acts. However uncertain may be the future of France, there can be little question that, at this moment, the majority of the people is still on the side of the Government.

Nor does the Speech leave any doubt as to the EMPEROR's intention to go on governing by and for the masses to whom he gives this praise. He is "thoroughly resolved to persevere "in the course" which he has laid down. What the Empire has been that it shall be. Clever journalists may write smartly about the mischiefs of personal government, but they will not move the EMPEROR from his resolution. "The essential bases of the Constitution" are to be maintained without discussion. Such additional freedom as is compatible with this primary condition the EMPEROR may hereafter vouchsafe. He is willing "to adopt all real progress," and so long as he is unhampered with the substance of a Parliament, he has an affection for the more innocent of its forms. To some men the conscio

by the presence

that they could not prevent it even if they would. Napoleon III. is always acting under the eyes of a watchful Opposition, and his independence of his critics may be materially increased if they are no longer able to hint that his supineness in 1864 and 1866 has brought France into a difficulty from which he has not the ability to extricate her. A man of the Emperor's age and health can hardly be anxious to engage in a war in which neither he nor his heir could command in person, and which might possibly be the means of raising up a dangerous rival in the affections of the army or the people. If he does resolve to run the risk, it will probably be as the only chance of avoiding a still more formidable risk at home. To all appearance, therefore, the real wishes of the nation are more likely than usual to be taken into account in the matter; and it is even conceivable that the significant acknowledgment of the fickleness of fortune, and of his own liability to error, which is introduced for the first time into this Speech, may be intended as a hint that he is genuinely anxious to ascertain what those wishes are. Europe will certainly be the gainer if the Emperor can put off the character of an inscrutable and unerring Providence, and be content to be regarded for the future as a human and fallible Sovereign.

THE BALLOT.

THE late change in the Constitution, while it might seem to weaken the argument for the Ballot, increases the probability that it will be adopted. Mr. Bright has frequently recommended his followers to select the Ballot as the next object for agitation; and Mr. Milner Gibson, being for the moment out of Parliamentary work, has recently appeared as the champion of a cause in which he had not been known to take any special interest. Mr. Bruce informs the electors of Renfrewshire that he has been converted to the doctrine of secret voting by his recent experience at Merthyr Tydvil, where nevertheless the working people, against the wish of their employers, returned a stranger, who had formerly been a Dissenting preacher, at the head of the poll. Mr. Gladstone himself has more than once intimated that his opinion was wavering on the question, and it is therefore possible that within two or three Sessions he may become an enthusiastic supporter of the Ballot. Some of the Manchester Liberals have, with considerable ingenuity, determined to illustrate the proposed method of voting by a kind of working model; and it is possible that an appeal to the eye rather than to the ear may produce the same kind of effect with the sham election for the county of Clare which was arranged by O'Connell on the eve of Catholic Emancipation. The Manchester partisans of the Ballot, having imported machinery and rules from one of the Australian colonies, propose to hold a preliminary election among themselves for the purpose of deciding whether Mr. Milner Gibson or Mr. Ernest Jones shall be the Liberal nominee in the event of a vacancy. Mr. Gibson's zeal in the cause has perhaps been stimulated by the Manchester device, which is nevertheless calculated to cause divisions in the party. The strict discipline which in America compels the minority to abide by the choice of a nominating Convention has not yet been established in England; nor is it certain that a revolutionary candidate would succeed in a single-handed election for Manchester, even if he had previously been selected by a Liberal majority. The mechanical possibility of the Ballot will be easily demonstrated to any sceptical witness of the operation. Doubts as to the practicability of secret voting are generally suggested, like the feeble arguments of the imaginary unbeliever in a sermon, only for the purpose of being triumphantly confuted.

Supporters and opponents of the Ballot agree that, as far as concealment is practised, it will diminish the operation of external influence on the minds of the voters. Menaces of injury on one side and public opinion on the other will become comparatively ineffective. The preponderance of good and evil will be estimated differently according to the political theories and predilections of those who interest themselves in the controversy. It is generally admitted that gross intimidation is both culpable and mischievous; and many persons extend their dislike to all personal influences of love, of fear, or of self-interest; yet it is not certain that an entire disregard of social relations tends to a better exercise of the suffrage. It is indeed plausibly contended that all legitimate influence of respect or good-will would be unaffected by voluntary or compulsory secrecy; but it is difficult to distinguish the various elements of compound motives of action. Many men will act more justly when they know that they will receive credit from others at the same time that they satisfy their own consciences; and perhaps there are but few persons who may be most fully trusted when they are responsible to themselves alone. Where there is no intimidation, a vote is not necessarily given with less honesty because it may be intended to please a friend, a landlord, or an employer; and still less is there any reason for supposing that a vote under such circumstances will be given on the wrong side. In general it is found that public and private duties are best discharged in the face of the world; but it must be admitted that the public opinion which controls votes is always divided into two. The elector is in any case sure to find supporters and backers among his political allies. The opinion which he most values is that of his own class, or of his special trade; and, as a general rule, the poorer voters, who are alone supposed to require the protection of the ballot, will best secure the good-will of their friends and associates by taking the popular side. The assumption that they habitually cherish profound convictions of their own is a more or less consecrated fiction.

Notwithstanding the sudden conversion of many defeated candidates, there is every reason to believe that intimidation has greatly diminished. Nothing is rarer than a report of the eviction of a tenant for voting against his landlord; and the scandal which would be caused by such a proceeding would sufficiently ensure its publicity. In the majority of cases tenants vote with their landlords from inclination or in compliance with tradition; but the entire body of farmers would resent the exercise of compulsion against one of their number. In some places manufacturers at the last election affected to dictate to their workmen the disposal of their votes; but the experiment could only be tried where the working-classes themselves were greatly divided in opinion. In one or two of the most notorious cases mob violence was combined with the undue influence of the masters, whose capital would certainly not have enabled them to organize riots unless they had had numbers as well as money at their disposal. The practical argument in favour of the Ballot chiefly depends on the existence or prevalence of intimidation, for secrecy of voting would be perfectly compatible with extensive bribery. In some large towns, at the late election, hundreds of newly enfranchised voters were ready to sell themselves on the polling day for a few shillings a head. The risk of such an arrangement, and the conscientious feeling of candidates, prevented, it may be hoped, in the majority of cases, the conclusion of a disreputable bargain; but the temptation to purchase would have been increased by the certainty that the transaction would be secret. The chance of a breach of contract on the part of the voter would be trifling, especially as contrivances might be devised for making payment contingent on the receipt of value. The adoption of the Ballot would perhaps modify the machinery of corruption by compelling unscrupulous candidates to deal with agents rather than with voters; but bribery, unless it is suppressed by other methods, may flourish whether votes are given openly or secretly. The disputants on both sides of the question, if indeed there is a dispute, have of late generally confined themselves to the question of intimidation. A cynical politician might contend that it matters little whether the votes of Norwich workmen were disposed of gratuitously, or exchanged for money or beer. It is not well that a country should be in some degree governed by a venal and ignorant rabble; but there would be little practical advantage in any contrivance for rendering their votes unsaleable. The absence of political conscience and discretion is not to be remedied by open or secret voting.

The entire controversy has in truth been long since exhausted. It is perhaps not unfair to assert that the Ballot is defended or attacked almost exclusively with a view to its probable effect on the comparative strength of contending parties. Mr. MILNER GIBSON, indeed, at the late meeting, professed to desire protection for his opponents as well as for those who shared his own opinions; but the bearing of secret voting on the boroughs and the counties excites a warmer interest than the theory of the ballot-box. On the whole, it may be supposed that the Liberals, or the extreme section of the party, would profit by the adoption of the system which they have long supported. It is useless to inquire whether an increase of their Parliamentary power would be advantageous to the community; for such a result would be necessarily acceptable to themselves, and they have now a fair chance of attaining it. The speakers at the Arundel Street meeting were perhaps not too sanguine in claiming a majority for the Ballot in the House of Commons, including one-half of the Treasury Bench. The Conservatives will vote against Mr. BERKELEY's motion to a man, but out of nearly four hundred Liberals there are probably not a hundred who will directly oppose the change. A much larger proportion of members dislike the contrivance, and the policy of its principal supporters; but the constituencies have to be considered, and the Ballot is almost always included in the local confession of the Liberal faith. If not in the present Session, a Bill or a Resolution in favour of the Ballot will be carried within a few years; and if it appears, after an interval, that the country is in favour of the experiment, the House of Lords will not obstinately resist the popular decision. It is impossible at present to foresee whether voters will shelter themselves under cover of the ballot-box, or adopt the practice of America, where secret voting is practically unknown. The change will be in the wrong direction, but it may possibly be inoperative. It is perhaps more interesting to count the votes which will decide the question than to weigh the arguments which will decorate the trial of strength.

BRAZIL AND PARAGUAY.

ALTHOUGH the Brazilian accounts of the war in the interior of South America are not to be implicitly trusted, experience has shown that they generally bear a certain relation to the truth. The victory at Humaita, some months ago, was not so complete or so glorious as it was represented; but the garrison had in fact evacuated the fortress, and the seat of war was consequently transferred into the heart of the territory of Paraguay. The account of the capture of three thousand of LOPEZ's troops is probably true in substance, although the number of prisoners may have been exaggerated; and the inference that the struggle is virtually at an end may perhaps also be well founded. The triumph of Brazil will in that case be the more conspicuous, inasmuch as the triple alliance of the two Plata Republics with the Empire had of late been virtually dissolved. It was understood that SARMIENTO, the new President of the Argentine Confederation, would take no further part in the invasion of Paraguay, and the ruling party in the neighbouring State of Uruguay has probably enough to do in maintaining itself against domestic enemies. The war originated in a contest between the Brazilian Government and the Dictator of Paraguay for influence in Uruguay; and the Argentine Government was probably involved in the quarrel through its participation in similar intrigues. It is evident that the States which divide among them the finest water communication in the world have a common interest in the maintenance, at least among themselves, of free navigation. It would be advantageous to the inland countries to reach the mouth of the Plata without impediment, while Buenos Ayres would be enriched by possessing the means of access to the Parana and the Paraguay. The only plausible pretext for war, as far as the Argentine Government was concerned, consisted in the restrictive policy which President LOPEZ inherited from his predecessors. Paraguay has always preferred an exclusive system to the advantages which might result from free intercourse with the outward world. The inhabitants appear to have a distinct character of their own, which has been jealously cherished and cultivated by their rulers; and it happens that their country is largely provided with all the articles of consumption which they habitually require. It was natural that their neighbours should resent their churlish policy, and yet the Argentine people seem never to have entered heartily into the war. President SARMIENTO, although he has formally declared his intention of maintaining the alliance with Brazil, appears to have a regard for domestic improvement, which is a singular eccentricity in the head of a South American Government; and he actually prefers the diffusion of education to the prosecution of warlike enterprises. If the defeat of the Paraguay army leads to peace, the Argentine President will probably take a part in the negotiations, for the purpose of securing the navigation of the tributaries of the Plata; but, if the war continues, the Brazilian army must depend on its own resources.

The pertinacity of the Brazilian Government in a costly and apparently unnecessary enterprise is even more surprising than the obstinate firmness of the defence. Although the superiority in number of the invading forces accounts for their victories, much energy must have been displayed in conducting two or three campaigns at a great distance from the coast and the capital; and the material advantages of success appear not proportionate to the expense and the risk. It will undoubtedly be convenient to secure a passage from the south by the rivers of Paraguay to the outlying Brazilian province of Matto Grosso; but, unless the conquered country is permanently retained, the navigation will always be liable to interruption. A desire for the acquisition of additional territory would be singularly unreasonable when the object is to extend the limits of an empire which has room for a hundred times its present population. The nation which owns the teeming and half-explored basin of the Amazon has little temptation to annex the dominions of neighbouring States; yet the invasion of Paraguay, if it is not prompted by ambitious vanity, has received no sufficient explanation. The Government of Brazil indeed complained of the seizure of one of its vessels by President LOPEZ, and there were probably various grievances on either side of a similar kind; but the scale on which the war has been conducted, and the length of time which it has occupied, seem entirely disproportioned to the importance of the ostensible ground of quarrel. It is an additional anomaly that the only monarchy in America should direct its arms against a State of which the Government was rapidly becoming hereditary. Paraguay, like Brazil, has been exempt from the anarchical struggles for power which have distracted all the republics of the Western Continent. The family of LOPEZ was beginning to assume the character of a dynasty when Paraguay was assailed by the invaders. As the Brazilian Government has always insisted on the deposition and banishment of the PRESIDENT as an indispensable condition of peace, it seems probable that the war will produce an internal revolution; and some nominee of the Brazilian Commander-in-Chief will probably be installed as President, to retain his power as long as he is protected by foreign arms. The virtues and demerits of LOPEZ are not easily ascertained from the conflicting statements of friends and enemies. His cruelties seem to have been invented or exaggerated, though it is highly probable that he may have perpetrated acts of despotism and violence. His long tenure of power, and his ability to prolong a desperate resistance, sufficiently prove that he possesses the ability and courage which are the first requisites of a ruler. The people of Paraguay will assuredly regard him as a patriot and a martyr, if he is removed from power at the dictation of a victorious invader. The attacks on his character which have been published by his enemies are probably addressed chiefly to the comparatively uninstructed opinion of foreigners.

Unless the magnitude of the Brazilian victory has been greatly misrepresented, it is scarcely to be supposed that LOPEZ will induce his countrymen to persist in an unequal contest. Even before the evacuation of Humaita, he was embarrassed by a conspiracy of malcontents who desired to make terms with Brazil. Among the confederates were his own brother BENITO LOPEZ, some of his nearest connexions, and one or two of his Ministers. The Brazilian newspapers at the time asserted that the PRESIDENT had put the conspirators to death; but their offence, whatever it may have been, was in truth only punished by arrest. The mysterious plot was closely connected with the misunderstanding which has arisen between Paraguay and the United States; for, according to LOPEZ and his adherents, Mr. WASHBURN, the American Minister, took an active part in the conspiracy, and, after its failure, attempted to make his official residence a sanctuary for the protection of his alleged accomplices. There is no doubt that some of the persons who were accused made confessions, true or false, which implicated Mr. WASHBURN; but, as he absolutely denies his participation in the plot, it must be supposed that the charges were false, or that the story admitted of a different interpretation. The American Government, and Mr. WASHBURN himself, had always professed friendly feelings to Paraguay; nor, indeed, is it to be supposed that the United States can regard with favour the aggressive policy of Brazil. If there is any foundation for the statements published by the Government of Paraguay, it will probably appear that Mr. WASHBURN encouraged the party which thought it prudent to invite overtures of peace from the Brazilian General. A political Opposition in time of war, and in such a country as Paraguay, is not always readily distinguishable from a band of conspirators. The protection which Mr. WASHBURN is said to have afforded to the accused persons may probably have been prompted by a fear that the PRESIDENT would exercise undue severity. On his part he charges the Government of Paraguay with a violation of diplomatic immunities in the detention of an English subject and an American citizen who were attached to his Legation. The American Government has despatched a naval officer in a sloop of war to inquire into the facts, but his mission may not improbably be rendered abortive by the fall of LOPEZ from power. An English officer who had been sent on a somewhat similar mission brings a satisfactory account of the condition of the few Englishmen who are resident in Paraguay. According to his report they are well treated, and it is by their own choice that they remain in the country. As they visited Paraguay of their own accord, there will happily not be any pretext for an Abyssinian expedition into the centre of the South American Continent.

The new world which CANNING fancied that he had raised up to redress the balance of the old has hitherto done nothing to justify the anticipations of forty or fifty years ago; but it may perhaps be worth while to watch the attempts which are made from time to time to give it the commencement of a history. It may be hoped that Paraguay, which has exhibited an exceptional originality, will retain or resume its independence when the present troubles have passed over. The depopulation of the country has probably been exaggerated, and in that fertile region the material waste which has been caused will be replaced in a single season. The great majority of the inhabitants are pure-blooded Indians, although they are lighter in colour than their Brazilian neighbours; and in South America the indigenous race seems to be more capable of civilization than in the North. In Brazil, which is inhabited by a mixed population descended from Portuguese, Indians, and negroes, perhaps the war may tend to create or develop a sense of national unity. The exploits of the army will not be forgotten for want of zealous eulogists, and the glory which may be supposed to have been earned may perhaps be more valuable than territorial conquests; yet there is some reason to fear that the victory achieved over Paraguay may suggest further enterprises for securing the control of the Plata. The left bank is already under Brazilian influence, and feuds in some of the Argentine States might easily furnish an excuse for interference. It will be well if the Government of Brazil can persuade itself that its empire is large enough, and that wars of aggrandizement are out of place and out of time in South America.

SPAIN.

IT has been said that the hardest of all intellectual feats is to keep the mind in an attitude of absolute suspense. Everybody likes to have an opinion, no matter how unprovided he may be with the data wherewith to form it. The Spanish Elections are the latest illustration of this tendency in politics. In theory the Cortes was to be strictly a Constituent Assembly. The Provisional Government assumed, in the first instance, no other function than that of preparing the ground for it. Everything that concerns the future of Spain was to be submitted to its decision. The Government disclaimed even the idea of preparing the materials on which it might work; it was itself to determine what questions should be discussed, as well as to conduct the discussion. In some respects the Spanish nation was unusually fitted for the part allotted to it. It was not intended to arrive at any conclusion of its own, and for some weeks it showed neither the capacity nor the inclination to do so. It really seemed possible that a Cortes might be elected concerning the probable action of which nothing could be divined beforehand. As time went on, however, it became more and more evident that this mental suspense would not last long. First of all, the policy of the Provisional Government began to wear a more decided aspect. Its members were obviously no longer holding the balance to the end that the Spanish people should throw the weight of its wishes into whatever scale it pleased. Day by day it grew clearer that the Revolution, as understood by the Generals who had planned and executed it, meant monarchy in some form. The natural consequence of this change was the formation of a Republican organization charged with the duty of counteracting this predisposition on the part of the Government. As the breach between the two parties became wider, the idea of leaving the members of Cortes unfettered by previous pledges entirely dropped out of view; and when the day of election came, the form the Government should take was openly submitted to the judgment of the individual electors. The candidates were described in the lists issued by the respective parties as Monarchical or Republican, and the greatest of the issues to be decided by the deliberations of the Constituent Assembly has been predetermined for all practical purposes by the votes given a week ago.

The result of the elections might have been predicted with reasonable safety. The conflicts at Cadiz and Malaga had shown that the organization of the Republican party was extremely imperfect, even in the districts where their chief strength lay; and, except amongst the Republicans, there seems to be no political activity in any section of the people. The Provisional Government has had everything its own way outside the Democratic centres, and as it had virtually pronounced for a monarchy some time before the election, the vote, so far as it rested with the authorities, was a foregone conclusion all along. That it did rest with them to a very considerable extent hardly admits of question. The consolidation of the Electoral Boards seems ingeniously devised to give every facility for vesting the complete command of the polls in the party which has the best organization; and in the rural constituencies there was no organization at all except such as was controlled by the Government. It must be admitted, however, that, if every Spaniard had given an unbiassed vote, there is little or no ground to suppose that the complexion of the Cortes would have been materially different. The nation is accustomed to be ruled by the army; and if it made no effort to emancipate itself from military supremacy when the army was on the side of ISABELLA II., it can hardly feel much call to do so when the action of the army has, on the whole, been both useful and popular. It is far from unlikely that the Communist doctrines which have been extensively preached by the Republican agitators have given great and natural alarm to all those Spaniards who have anything to lose. The Spanish Democrats, like their French prototypes, are equally destitute of the characteristics of the serpent and of the dove, and their intention, if they really entertain it, of confiscating private property, seems destined to be invariably frustrated by their inability to keep their designs to themselves. According to some accounts, the reactionary agents have of late made common cause with the Republicans; but it is probable that the clergy, among whom their chief strength lies, however anxious they may be to witness a BOURBON restoration, have a decided preference for the mild, though inefficient, rule of the Provisional Government over the anti-ecclesiastical violence which would certainly have followed upon a Republican victory. The Spanish Church is not exactly the institution which can hope to bend the Democracy to its purpose.

The prospects of the Duke of MONTPENSIER have apparently improved during the last week or two. His ill-advised manifesto has been forgotten or forgiven, and he perhaps now stands a chance of being ultimately chosen as the Government candidate for the throne. Whether the conciliatory mention of Spain in the Speech of the Emperor NAPOLEON at the opening of the French Legislature will have any influence upon the DUKE'S popularity, and if so, whether that influence will be favourable or unfavourable, it is difficult to pronounce. According to the Times Correspondent, the supposed hostility of the EMPEROR has been of great service to the DUKE, inasmuch as French dictation is extremely unpopular in Spain; and in that case, the apparent intimation that France has no intention of interfering in Spanish politics may deprive the Orleanist candidate of the advantages accruing to him as the undesigned representative of Spanish independence. On the other hand, cautious Spaniards may be more inclined to give him their good wishes, if they have no fear that in doing so they will be provoking a French intervention. The probability that NAPOLEON III. will really take any overt steps to prevent the election of the Duke of MONTPENSIER, supposing him to be the choice of the Cortes, is not great. Such an event would no doubt give him considerable annoyance; but Emperors, like other men, have to learn, as they get on in life, that annoyances are made to be put up with. He may be trusted to employ all the means he can command to prevent the election, and among these means may be sundry alarming rumours as to his intention of setting it aside by force of arms. But there is a long interval between hints which cannot be traced to any authoritative source, and such an announcement of the Imperial policy in the matter as would commit him to positive action. In the present state of Europe a war with Spain under an Orleanist King might prove a very grave event. If the Prussian statesmen share in the conviction entertained by many Frenchmen that a war between France and Germany is inevitable, they may see very good reasons for seizing the moment of a quarrel with Spain for settling their own account. Although the Spanish troops might not be able to offer much resistance to a French army, the mere fact of having to send a large body of men across the Pyrenees when the Prussians were marching on Paris would, to say the least, be inconvenient. And with Prussia and Spain in the field the Italian Government might see in an alliance with them a speedier means of obtaining Rome than in waiting till it pleases NAPOLEON III. to give Italy leave to take it. If the Provisional Government can make up its mind between this and the meeting of Cortes to propose the Duke of MONTPENSIER as its candidate, Spain will not perhaps run any serious risk in accepting him. To whatever candidate their choice may fall, they will owe a large debt of reparation for the delay of which they have been the authors. Four months ago the new King of SPAIN would have mounted a throne which had not as yet been shaken by the dynastic revolution. The name of a Republic had never been mentioned in the country, and it was even doubted whether if the cry were to be raised a single Spaniard would be found to take it up. Now the Republicans form a compact minority in the Congress, and a majority in many of the large towns; they have a long list of grievances against the Government; and they are sanguine of being able at no distant time to order things after their own pleasure. The King of SPAIN will have thorns enough in his path, and it is the Provisional Government that must bear the main responsibility of planting them.

ADMIRAL ROUS AND MR. DAY.

LET us suppose the existence of an impossible social monster of the day who knows nothing of racing, and who never saw a race and never made a bet. He would—but writing in the third person is to our craft a weariness to the flesh; so we will fall back on the great omnes solus, and describe the ignoramus we have in view under the more convenient and tripping We. We, then, let us say—we never saw a race. We know nothing of horses, though judgment in horses, sermons, music, and pictures comes by nature to the intelligent Briton. Our notions about the anatomy of the noble creature are extremely hazy. We should be sorry to have to answer a paper in which we were called upon to describe the place in the equine economy of pastern, fetlock, hock, cornet, coffin, or withers. What frog and thrush have to do with a horse passes our conception. Of spavins, ringbone, curbs, and all other technicalities of the veterinarian art we are as ignorant as of the atmosphere of URANUS. And of course we know nothing of the art and mystery of betting. Though, by the way, this is not a matter of course, for we believe there are "Turfites" who are very great in the Ring, but who scarcely know a horse's head from his tail. Our ignorance, however, is dense, total, complete, and thorough. The only book-making we are concerned with is a craft unknown to TATTERSALL'S; and as to TATTERSALL'S, as far as personal experience goes, we don't know whether TATTERSALL is a man or a mountain. With the serene indifference which happily awaits the crassest ignorance, the frightful rumour that there may possibly be no Derby this year, if ever, affects us but lightly. As far as human sympathy goes, we feel as much interest in the chariot-race run at the last Olympic meeting as in the favourite for the St. Leger or the Thousand Guineas. The only consolation attending our humiliating position towards the horsy world is that we can approach and canvass Turf topics with an indifference almost insolent, and with an impartiality which may be thought contemptuous. Such is our attitude towards the case—or threatened case—of DAY v. ROUS.

This case originated in the last Derby. For that race the late Lord HASTINGS had entered two noble animals, The Earl and Lady Elizabeth. Immediately before the race, The Earl, which was a high favourite, was withdrawn—or, in the language of the craft, scratched. Whereupon all sorts of ugly and angry things were said, and upon these sayings Admiral ROUS indited the following letter, which, as it is an historical document, we reproduce from the Times of Jan. 16, 1868:—

ADMIRAL ROUS ON THE TURF.
To the Editor of the "Times."

much laudanum as had been given to the mare he would have been a dead man," permit me to say that it is perfectly untrue. My belief is that Lady Elizabeth had a rough spin with Athena in March, when the Days discovered she had lost her form—a very common occurrence with fillies which have been severely trained at two years old; that when the discovery was made they reversed a commission to back her for the One Thousand Guineas Stakes at Newmarket, and they declared that Lord Hastings would not bring her out before the Derby, on which he stood to win a great stake. I am informed that when Lord Hastings went to Danebury to see her gallop they made excuses for her not to appear. If he had seen her move, the bubble would have burst. But the touters reported, "she was going like a bird"; 10*l.* will make any horse fly if the trainer wishes it to rise in the market. She has never been able to gallop the whole year. Lord Hastings has been shamefully deceived, and with respect to scratching The Earl, Lord Westmorland came up to town early on Tuesday from Epsom to beseech Lord Hastings not to commit such an act. On his arrival in Grosvenor Square he met Mr. Hill going to Weatherby's with the order in his pocket to scratch The Earl, and Mr. A. Padwick closeted with Lord Hastings. In justice to the Marquis of Hastings I state that he stood to win 35,000*l.* by The Earl, and did not hedge his stake money. Then you will ask, "Why did he scratch him?" What can the poor fly demand from the spider in whose web he is enveloped? I am, Sir, your obedient servant, 13 Berkeley Square, June 15. H. J. ROUS.

What this, to a non-expert, seems to mean is that Admiral ROUS charged with a gross fraud certain notables called "the "DAYS." Who is the accuser, who are the accused?

accuser, Admiral Rous, is the very Bayard of the racing chivalry. He is the foremost man of the famous Jockey Club, an institution composed of great lords and notables—the choice "nobs and swells," as the betting shop-boys call them—who have charged themselves with the duty of constituting a Court of Honour and of Final Appeal; to whose decision everything relating to racing disputes and racing honour is referred. Admiral Rous is, like the Virgilian hero, a man grave with racing piety and merits; and the counsel of this great Ahithophel of the betting ring—that is, of the Admiral—is as if a man had inquired at the oracle—not, however, altogether of God. Who are "the Days," thus dignified into a noun of multitude? Very famous trainers generally, and famous specifically as trainers of Lord Hastings's two animals, The Earl and Lady Elizabeth. What the Admiral says, or seems to say, in his letter, is that "the Days" knew that Lady Elizabeth had hopelessly broken down, but concealed this fact from their employer; that they also knew that The Earl was a very good horse, and likely to win; that, with this knowledge, they, or their friends, spread, or caused to be spread, the report that Lady Elizabeth was the best horse; that for their own purposes this party got The Earl withdrawn, and compelled Lady Elizabeth to run, and of course to lose, because they or their friends had made a book against her. Admiral Rous, whose letter is formally only a vindication of Lord Hastings, who had been severely condemned for withdrawing The Earl, compares his noble friend to "the poor fly," and "the Days"—and apparently other folks—to "the spider." This letter was either the most distinct charge of fraud against, or the clearest libel on, "the Days" that could be written. So "the Days" thought, and Mr. John Day immediately commenced his action for libel against the Admiral; and from June to January the sporting world, as their airy prophets would say, has been on the qui vive awaiting the great trial Day v. Rous.

But on Wednesday said sporting world was, as again they would say, electrified by the publication of the following novel correspondence—simplex munditiis:—

ADMIRAL ROUS AND THE TURF.

To the Editor of the "Times."

Sir,—On the 16th of June last a letter appeared in your columns from Admiral Rous, under the title of "Admiral Rous on the Turf," containing reflections upon me and my family.

I have now to request the favour of your giving publicity to a letter which has been addressed to me by the Admiral, withdrawing his former letter, and a copy of which I beg to enclose.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, Danebury, Stockbridge, Hants, Jan. 19. John Day.

13 Berkeley Square, Jan. 18.

Sir,—As the legal proceedings pending between us have been stopped by you, I now withdraw my letter published in the Times newspaper on the 16th of June, and the fact of my having addressed a second letter to the Editor on the same day, requesting him not to insert the first, is a proof that I did not consider myself justified in desiring it to be published.—I am, Sir, yours, H. J. Rous.

To Mr. Day.

We have preferred to preserve this remarkable correspondence just as it stands, for several and obvious reasons. First, we would not willingly see die so valuable and curious a contribution to epistolary literature. Next, because, from our acknowledged incapacity as regards the whole subject, it would be silly in us to pretend to illustrate it. Such a text is its own best scholiast. And, lastly, because in addition to our melancholy ignorance about things equine, we are equally at fault when we enter a moral world in which this sort of thing is possible. Were we to venture on saying what we think, what we think would be quite useless, because we have no experience of the manners and customs, the habits and thoughts, the ethical system, and the duty towards one's neighbour which prevails and is apparently accepted in the sporting world. We survey it as a group of phenomena, very curious and extraordinary, but which concerns us as much or as little as a monograph of the mind or personal habits of the pterodactyl, or pre-Adamite man. If the matter were one of this Toutos-Kosmos, it would seem to come to this:—Admiral Rous makes a grave and serious charge against Mr. Day in a letter to the Times, and no sooner has he written it than, on the very day of writing it, he thinks better of it, and tries to get the letter suppressed. Somehow he fails in this; but though he wishes he had not written, still what he has written, like another distinguished but not voluminous author, he has written; and apparently the gallant Admiral, more valiantly than prudently, does not for six months withdraw the libellous letter. Mr. Day, justly and most creditably indignant at the imputation cast on him, does the only thing an honest man could do. He, as the old women say, will make the Admiral prove his words. So things go on for six months. When all of a sudden the deadlock, like that in the Critic, is unlocked by everybody dropping his weapons. Ground arms; as you were. Admiral Rous has not proved his charge; Mr. Day has not repelled it. Mr. Day withdraws his action, and the Admiral withdraws his letter; whether the charge itself is withdrawn we, not being acquainted with the Turf, know not. Admiral Rous is not now charged with being a libeller; Mr. Day is not now charged with being a rogue. But the charges were made, and they were either true or false; but which is true and which is false, or whether under the circumstances both, either, or neither may be true or false, or both true and false, who can say? If the thing had happened among men, such as men are, we should say that either Mr. Day ought never to have said he was going to vindicate himself, or he should have gone on vindicating himself; either Admiral Rous should not have made his charge, or should have stuck to it. As it is, Admiral Rous seems to have made an imputation which he is unwilling or unable to prove; or—or it may be, and—Mr. Day undertook to prove an innocence which he is unwilling or unable to prove. Does the Admiral say that he made an unfounded charge? he says no such thing. Does Mr. Day say that he has triumphantly vindicated his honesty? he says no such thing. Only both parties find it convenient to let the hot coal drop. The action is withdrawn, and the letter is withdrawn; but whether the action is withdrawn on condition of the letter being also withdrawn, or whether the letter is withdrawn on condition of the action being withdrawn, and which withdrawal was first proposed and first accepted, and from which side the surrender was suggested, we at any rate know not. Very likely we shall hear that the sporting oracles congratulate themselves and their peculiar people on the good feeling displayed by all parties—on the necessity of avoiding public scandal—and the happy termination of this painful matter. But then we are not sporting people, and to our poor minds the termination of this queer business is just the most discreditable thing about it. To hush up such a case aggravates it. "Brother, "brother, we're both in the wrong," may be a very amiable sentiment, and is a very convenient conclusion in this case. But the case is just one of those in which two wrongs certainly do not make one right.

THE POPE ON FEMALE LUXURY.

"THE Sovereign Pontiff," says our contemporary the Tablet, "with that tender and unabating solicitude with which he watches over the children whose souls are committed to his charge, puts his finger upon the evils which corrupt society, and continually points out the practical remedy which is at hand." We cannot profess the same reverence for Papal authority which inspires these characteristic sentences, and we don't expect the Papal finger to be guided with unfailing accuracy. Still we may regard with curiosity the expression of opinion thus solemnly commended to our notice, if only as coming from the venerable head of a body of acute, though prejudiced, observers. The Roman Catholic priesthood could certainly, if they chose, tell us a good deal about the weaknesses of modern society; and the Pope's remarks will naturally reflect the opinions current amongst his order. The evil upon which he dilates upon the present occasion is that of "female luxury and extravagance." This is, he thinks, a "terrible scourge which is everywhere spreading its ravages," and has even crept in to some extent amongst the population which has the peculiar blessing of special Papal superintendence. "It is this," he informs us—and perhaps it scarcely needed a Pope to detect the chain of cause and effect—"which is the occasion of brilliant assemblies, public promenades, and theatres." It leads women to run about perpetually from house to house, and to spend their time in "idleness, curiosity, and indiscreet conversation." It renders marriage difficult, and consumes the patrimony of children. Men, it seems, are unwilling to undertake the enormous expenses which their wives incur; and, if any one should doubt so startling an assertion, he will be crushed by a quotation from Tertullian. "Ten million sesterces," as that author assures us, "are spent upon a necklace"; and possibly he might be confirmed by more modern lists of Parisian prices. This impediment to marriage produces all kinds of disorders; "and seeing"—as the Pope remarks in an elaborate, but, as we might have profanely imagined, rather unnecessary chain of reasoning—"that a town is composed of families, a province of towns, a kingdom of provinces, then, the family being corrupted, it poisons at its source the whole of society, and insensibly prepares for it those calamities which at the present day are overwhelming us on all sides." From all which the Pope infers that "his dear daughter in Jesus Christ, Marie de Gentelles," has written an excellent book; and he augurs a most happy success for her enterprise, which is, it appears, the organization against luxury of the women of the period, and, above all, of those who have enrolled themselves as Christian mothers and Children of Mary.

There is certainly no doubt that the women of our age are a great deal more frivolous and luxurious than they ought to be. Money is spent upon assemblies and public promenades and theatres, much of which might be spent more profitably. Women run about to five o'clock teas and elsewhere when they had better be looking after their children, and their conversation would not always bear to be reported by a shorthand writer. If necklaces don't sell for ten million sesterces, they cost a great deal more in modern money than their purchasers can always afford. This, and much more than this, is very true, and is much to be regretted. We have, indeed, heard something very like it before. As the Pope's appropriate quotation shows, Tertullian was indulging in the same vein of rhetoric, and probably with equal justification, over sixteen centuries ago. Before his time the Hebrew prophets had found occasion to denounce the feminine propensity for luxury after the fashion of their day—at least if the translations (which has been doubted) may be trusted. There might be made with very little trouble an uninterrupted catena of denunciations of this unfortunate weakness, from the earliest recorded history down to the present time. Every epoch has had its own form of the evil, and its own vigorous assailants of the special contemporary manifestations. Nothing was more fashionable in the last century than demonstrations of the startling advances of luxury, and the consequent decay which, as proved by numerous historical examples, was rapidly coming upon the world. The Seven Belgravian Mothers made a remonstrance, couched in a different dialect, but substantially identical with that from which we have just been quoting; and it would be difficult to mention any journal of the day, or the works of any popular novelist, in which the complaint has not been reiterated in one form or another. Of course we do not mention this by way of detracting from the value of the condemnation. As folly and vice have an unpleasant way of perpetuating themselves with more change in the form than the substance, preachers and satirists must necessarily continue to harp upon the same string; and they do a good work if they manage to keep the evil more or less in check. We cannot congratulate the Pope on having thrown much new light upon the subject, as in fact he is merely repeating the commonplaces of newspaper articles in language which is a good deal hampered by the requirements of the pontifical style. But he is perfectly right to protest, though the protest will certainly not win attention by any intrinsic beauties of style. If the similar treatment of the same topic in popular periodicals were not a good deal more lively than that of the Pope, they would have little chance of a hearing. However, a Papal platitude is of course worth much more than any display of eloquence in a newspaper. The Pope may, for example, be able to gain the attention of the distinguished lady who does so much for his cause in France, and at the same time has so great an influence on the fashions of Paris and the world. If she would only set the example of strict economy in matters of dress and entertainment, the new fashion might certainly be taking for a time. We fear, indeed, that even in such a case, the old instincts would be too strong in the long run even for the Pope; and meanwhile, so long as the most distinguished daughters of the Church set a questionable example, the efforts of a Marie de Gentelles are not likely to bear very important fruit.

There is, however, another question upon which we could wish to have seen an expression of opinion. People will doubtless go on breaking the laws of morality to the last syllable of recorded time, and preachers will go on denouncing them. We are not so sanguine as to hope for the speedy eradication of infirmities so deeply rooted in human nature. But we may certainly expect to see certain evils lessened when their causes are thoroughly understood. If female extravagance is common to all times, it breaks out more vehemently at one epoch than another, and it may be that the present is one of them. If so, we should be glad to know what are the specially predisposing causes which make this malady, like nervous diseases, unusually prevalent at this particular epoch. We shall never get rid of all physical or moral evils, but a skilful diagnosis would be equally useful in both. Mere condemnations, whether from Tertullian or from higher authority, are not much to the purpose; because we fully admit the evil; but how are they to be brought home to people's minds most effectually at the present day? The Pope does not enter upon this topic, and we cannot attempt any complete explanation. The great development of material prosperity is one obvious cause of increased luxury; if wealth has made a more rapid progress than civilization, we may expect to find it squandered more recklessly. When a gentleman strikes oil in America he is apt to plunge into senseless ostentation. Our whole generation may be said in a sense to have struck oil; the development of mechanical skill has suddenly enriched whole classes; and a great deal of senseless expenditure has been the result. If this is in any degree a true cause, though not an adequate cause, what is the appropriate remedy? Surely it is by bringing mental cultivation up to the proper standard. That women, as a general rule, are shamefully ill-educated, will be generally admitted. The advocates of women's rights have frequently succeeded in making their cause ridiculous by very ill-advised suggestions, and by their general impression, too frankly betrayed, that the way to put things right is to make women as much as possible into an inferior kind of men. But so long as they insist upon the narrowness and inadequacy of our present system of feminine training, they occupy an unimpeachable position. Women, as a rule, are taught nothing but a smattering of what are called accomplishments, and a still more wretched smattering of the knowledge comprised in "all the branches of a sound English education." Now a number of ladies in this state of imperfect intellectual development have a sudden command of a great deal more wealth than their mothers or grandmothers had before them. Is it not an inevitable result that they should use their power in the most frivolous way? If a woman knows nothing but a little singing and dancing and a few fragments of one or two foreign languages, how is it possible that she should be other than frivolous and extravagant? She has been taught that it is her chief duty in life to make herself attractive to the other sex by dressing herself prettily, and behaving gracefully, and talking nonsense agreeably. Of course, when she grows rich, she dresses more expensively, and talks nonsense more conspicuously, and attends theatres and other abominations of the Papal vocabulary more frequently, and generally acts the same part with rather more vigour than before. There is nothing at all novel or surprising, though there is much to be regretted, in all this. Women whose intellects are systematically confined will be childish in their behaviour, as certainly as women who have been dressed with a view to fashion rather than health will grow up with enfeebled constitutions. One appropriate remedy, though not, it may be, an all-sufficient remedy, is to encourage them to develop their intellects. Give them the means of really employing their minds, and they will instinctively see the frivolity of their present amusements. A woman who knows what is going on in the world of art or science or literature will not waste her time in running about for idle conversation. In short, the best remedy for silly occupations is the creation of a taste for something better. Young men throw away money on the Turf or elsewhere, because their minds are in that stunted stage of development which fits them for nothing else. And women spend large sums on dress because they are often capable of no loftier excitement. What, then, is the attitude of the Roman Catholic clergy towards the higher education? Do they encourage women to study science, for example, as freely and fearlessly as possible? Are they convinced that a woman, who has the necessary faculties, would be all the better for a genuine acquaintance with geology or chemistry or any other study of a similar kind? Do they hold that a thorough study of any branch of human knowledge is an admirable tonic for the mind, and one of the best possible preservatives against the pursuit of frivolity? The question answers itself. We know perfectly well that they are so afraid of the consequences of an excursion into these forbidden regions that they prefer to keep women childish, in the hope of securing a childish obedience. The extent to which women in any country are encouraged to employ their minds boldly is in an inverse ratio to the power of the Roman Catholic priesthood. It may be that the caution is necessary; and that the evils of artificially cramping the mind are not so great as the evils of leaving it to unrestricted action. Perhaps it may be said that there is a temporary alienation between theology and science, and that whenever that is cleared away, and science purified from its accidental bias, women may be encouraged to venture on the forbidden ground. The prohibition may refer to a transitory danger, and will perhaps disappear as that passes away. We will not discuss the wisdom of such a policy; but one consequence is inevitable. If, for whatever reason, you narrow the education of women, you must count upon their continuing to be frivolous. There may be advantages in arresting their development at the age of childhood; but children will play with dolls. When they become rich, the dolls will cost a good deal of money; and the conversation of those who play with them will be something worse than childish. Human nature will obey certain laws in spite of preachers; and one of them is, that the forcible repression of the nobler instincts will lead to a development of the more contemptible.

It seems, indeed, that the "Christian mothers and Children of Mary" are going to set an excellent example of frugality and attention to the duties of their families and of charity. An organized demonstration in favour of economy may do something to repress extravagance, as teetotalism has perhaps done something to discourage drunkenness; and we wish it all success within reasonable limits. But the incompleteness of such a remedy is obvious. It does not really supply new motives, or remove in any degree the cause of the evils, but tries to drill a certain number of persons into enforced abstinence. It is not a mere coincidence that licentiousness generally exists alongside of asceticism, and that, as in Glasgow, the most severe Sabbath-keepers are side by side with the worst of Sabbath-breakers. If you say that all indulgence is bad, you remove every restraint from those who venture to indulge. If the theatre is to be condemned as a school of the devil, it will be pretty certain to justify its character. The virtuous won't go, and the wicked will have it all their own way. If we simply denounce luxury, without finding a better employment for the tastes which it gratifies, society will be divided into fools who submit to the narrowest regulation and fools who submit to none at all. The process of screwing down the safety valve upon human nature always ends in producing a very dangerous compound of bigots, hypocrites, and libertines. It is highly desirable that many, perhaps most, women should devote themselves to charity and to family duties. But many women have no family duties, and many are quite unfitted for devotion to charity. There are other things to be done in the world besides nursing and giving away money, and even, if we may say so, besides attending divine service. There are tastes which will find other gratification; and if all other gratification is forbidden, they will seek for forbidden pleasures. The true method is to develop those tastes, and to discover for them some legitimate means of innocent employment. When the priesthood can boldly encourage women to develop every faculty with which God has endowed them, they will have a chance of effectually denouncing "female luxury and extravagance."

SOCIAL PENALTIES.

THE pressure of society upon the individual is, and must always remain, one of the most important subjects of the anxiety of men who study the conditions of human progress. In excess it plainly leads to the most pernicious results, by stifling those eccentric growths of opinion and feeling out of which new and improved forms have to be taken and shaped by a process akin to that of natural selection among species, and without which the exigencies of circumstances must infallibly outstrip the means of satisfying them; and so a confused kind of despair grows up in the minds, and stagnation in the habits, of men. On the other hand, a deficiency in this pressure leads to evils hardly, if at all, less grievous than those which come of its excess. That everybody should be legally at liberty to follow his own will in the few purely self-regarding kinds of action, and in all matters of feeling and opinion, is a maxim which needs no comment nor confirmation either in England or in any other country which has taken its ideas upon law from English institutions. Thus much is a clearly proven piece of wisdom which no English or American lawgiver is at all likely to overlook. The law, we may be quite sure, will never repair any neglect on the part of the community to punish dissent from the ruling and accepted ideas of the time. But is there no danger of this neglect occurring? no danger of there springing up largely an indifference to the claims of accepted maxims of conduct, an under-estimate of the value of social accord, a passionate readiness of self-assertion, a foolish, thoughtless, and in certain conditions of temper, a malignant contempt for the advantages which the social union confers even upon those who have most diverged from the beliefs which have been chiefly instrumental in binding our modern society together? If this be so, and there are some wise observers who profess to entertain apprehensions in this direction, then it is certain that the penalties which society—that is to say, the majority of the circle to which a man belongs—has it in its power to inflict have lost their efficacy as deterrents, and that a growing number of persons are less and less moved by fear of them. It is worth while to put this in another way, perhaps; that the pleasures which society has to offer, and its prizes, and everything else, have lost their attractions for many minds, so that to be deprived of them counts for less than it might do, or than it used to do. People of a certain sort, and that hardly the lowest sort either, venture to encounter the disapproval of sets and circles to which they belong, because their approval brings no consequences that they are capable of holding dear. In other words, opinion has not moved equally over the face of society. One portion of the world has pushed on or aside, while the rest has remained stationary and fixed in a little narrow circle of ideas, pursuits, and pastimes, which the others have outgrown. The stiffening of social forms, the ever-growing rigidity of etiquettes, the multiplication of fashionable shibboleths of speech and thought and habit—all this means the voluntary self-exclusion of a good many people of independent humour from a life which cramps, restrains, and infinitely wearies them.

And the striking thing is, as we have just hinted, that those who flout society, and retreat to rural hermitages, or shut themselves up in solitary chambers—or else, while feigning solitude, enjoy companionships unrecognisable by drawing-rooms—are not by any means people of the lowest sort, either in intelligence, aspiration, position, or general social good-will. They are no mauvais sujets, out-at-elbows, insolvent, inveterate foes to the minor courtesies, hostile to the tailed coat. On the contrary, in all these things they are found blameless. Their bills are paid, their clothes well-made, their linen good, their salutation and accost beyond reproach. Neither, again, are they as a rule mere cynics. It is not because they despise life, and its enormous tasks and tiny accomplishments, that they save themselves (to use a French idiom) from the favourite haunts of the majority of their fellows; rather because they esteem life too precious to be given away to folly and grievous hollowness. It is probably inevitable that a little folly and a great deal of hollowness should grow into communities that are very large, very rich, and, from their unmellowed age and fundamental constitution, very artificial. But the inevitable is still very often that to which the best minds least easily reconcile themselves. This or that may be no more than the necessary result of conditions which no mortal man can repair or much modify; yet we like it just as little, and are just as little ready to submit ourselves to its burden. Hence, the more unavoidable you show the artificiality of society to be, not the less but the more are people whom artificiality revolts disposed to turn their backs on the scene, and seek simplicity in solitude or else in a clique. It is quite true that in neither of these two resorts are they sure of finding what they seek, for the solitary and reserved man not seldom becomes as artificial in his own way as the dweller in courts and kings' houses; while in small cliques artificiality in one shape or other is pretty sure to have a place, and little circles of people with some special aim or principle to bind them together are notoriously apt to develop a canting phraseology, an esoteric mannerism, a half-pious affectation, compared with which the mannerism and affectation of Fop's Alley or the Belgravian rout actually smell of Arcadia and the green fields. For all this, however, there is rather a feeling abroad that the true social penalties are what are currently styled social joys. To be invited to a great number of drawing-rooms is a worse fate than to be excluded from them. To be patronised by a great host of men and women for your merits is to have a more evil thing befal you than if you had been cut by them for your sins. A wise man might consent never to be invited out to dinner, if the alternative were the position of a frequent diner-out. It may be said, with reason, that the so-called pleasures which society places at the feet of those whom it delighteth to honour are not particularly pleasurable in themselves, but are the outward and visible signs of a high esteem and creditable repute among men. The weakest part of this consolation to the temporary idol of those who distribute social prizes is that he sees them bestowed, far more steadily and lavishly than upon himself, on the mob of the mentally rag-tag and bobtail who fringe dinner-tables and drawing-rooms. If to be taken much notice of, to have many cards on one's mantelpiece, to dine at many boards, and stand in many crowded saloons and on many crammed staircases, be in truth outward signs of social grace, how comes it that they are still more conspicuous in those on whom we would rather have looked for a brand, or the mark of the beast? This is one of the many trains of reflection which are leading some men to a froward and audacious contempt for the worst penalties which the ogre of society is able to inflict on the self-possessed person.

It is sufficiently obvious how powerful an instrument for the coercion of unreasonable whimsicalities and unseasonable manifestations of an eccentric and inexpedient personality is thus thrown away. If the pleasures of social intercourse were more carefully thought about, and more wisely organized, then everybody who had not been born a Diogenes—and the character is mostly artificial—would take as much pains as he could to avoid breaking with a body that had so much to give him, and so much to snatch away from him. It would be a great misfortune, both for the individual and for society, if blandishments and social joys were to trip men up in the conscientious search after truth and elevation of character, or in frank and manly expression. But there is nothing either discreditable to a man or dangerous to anybody else in a certain strong reluctance to offend the opinion or feeling of people about him, with whom he is accustomed to live, and to whom he owes much obligation. If occasion arises when it is above all things expedient that some person or doctrine should be smitten hip and thigh, then the unanimous verdict of the best persons that have ever lived testifies to the need of sacrificing this rightful considerateness to what happens at the time to be the more binding duty of proclaiming a truth or vehemently protesting against an error. But the temper of our day perhaps attributes something too much of a merit to the discovery of discrepancies between oneself and the bulk of one's neighbours. Men, and especially women, think less than they did, or than perhaps it is well that they should think, of flying in the face of old and decent usage. They too often leave the beaten track, not pained at the pain which their divergence gives to worthy souls to whom they owe many a debt, but rather as an army with banners, victorious and jubilant. They too often shake off the old things, not with a touch of regret at parting with what has served generation after generation of good people, but as clever men who have found out a trick and an imposture. There may be many causes for such a humour, and one of them is the disregard into which society has brought such pains and penalties as it has to use. But this, after all, is only removing the difficulty a step further back. Why have the social sanctions grown so comparatively inefficient? Why are average social pleasures so slight, and the deprivation of them so little felt? It must be that the world has grown so big; there is such ample room and variety that men have wider choice of societies than they have in simpler days and among more primitive communities. A man must be a decided villain to be universally tabooed, and on the other hand there are not many forms of eccentricity which he can choose to play at in which he will fail to find playmates; and, if he has any just force of character, it will be no drawback to the pleasures which their companionship confers upon him that they are not the vapid and monotonous pleasures of that lofty but far from exhaustive section which calls itself the world. Seen in this light, the complaint of the decay of the efficacy of the social penalty does not come to very much; it only implies that there is no longer anything like a single and uniform tribunal for that sort of divergency to which the complaint usually refers. Out of the track of acts and opinions which universal common sense holds to be pestilent and will not tolerate on any terms, a man may defy the opinion of one set of people in the just confidence that he is secure of the approval of some other set. There is scarcely anybody in the world, and certainly not anybody worth taking into account, who is not responsible to some social tribunal or other; only in our modern society these tribunals are vastly numerous—whether too numerous and too individualized for the perfect health of the body politic, only very wonderful philosophers indeed can positively decide.

THE FUTURE ADMINISTRATION OF THE POLICE.

THE vacancy in the Chief Commissionership of Police gives occasion, not only for the discussion of personal qualifications, but also of general principles. In articles, in essays, and in society, men debate not only the characters of certain candidates, but also the theories of administration. As the selection of the future Chief will depend in no small measure upon the notion which Mr.

Bruce entertains of the duties of this office, the theories now under discussion are well worthy of consideration.

The principal point of difference between the controversialists is this—should the duties of the Chief Policeman of London be confined to the walls of his office in Scotland Yard, or include active supervision of its force beyond them? There are many, and especially many official persons, who hold that he should confine himself to his bureau, and content himself with receiving reports from his subordinates, issuing orders to them, seeing only a select few of them, communicating with them indirectly through the non-commissioned officers, or more indirectly by circulars and memoranda; that it is not his business to have any personal knowledge, and still less his business to have any experimental knowledge, of the area traversed by his men, of their respective beats, of their conduct while patrolling them, of the incidents which occur to them, of the emergencies which call for their services, and of the manner with which these services are performed. We need hardly say that we entirely disagree from this theory ourselves. But it is one which is in high favour with the ordinary official mind. It satisfies the great official maxim of the day—Pas trop de zèle. This is the great commandment which is pronounced from the heights and permeates through the depths of the Civil Service. "You have your work to do—do it, and nothing more. You have your instructions—follow them, if convenient, to the letter; but don't follow them if you are not likely to be interrogated about them; and don't go beyond the letter." This is the language of chiefs and subordinates. It is dictated by policy and corroborated by experience. If a man is betrayed into zeal, he is sure to do something generous, full-hearted, chivalrous, or rash; he is sure to tread on some one's corns, and to provoke complaints, a motion in Parliament and a Parliamentary blue-book. All this is singularly vexatious, trying, and damaging. Even if he follows his instructions, he can hardly fail to annoy some personage or some department. Instructions were framed, not for the guidance of the instructed, but for the protection of the instructors. If a public officer blunders and people complain, the first strategical move is to ask what were his instructions? Then up gets a voluble Under-Secretary, who, deftly hoisting a dingy little octavo from his coat-tails, waves it before the House and triumphantly shrieks out, "What were his instructions? Why, here are his instructions, which have been implicitly followed by his predecessors from time immemorial"; an answer which elicits the expected cheers from the back benches and silences remonstrants, until it is discovered that not one single instruction is in the least degree applicable to the case under discussion, or to any other case which has the slightest probability of happening at the present day. But for the time the citation does its work, and in most instances does it permanently. And those who study instructions—how cleverly do they adapt them to their own ease, comfort, and irresponsibility! Who does not know the old public servant of thirty years' standing, who in every emergency and every doubt appeals to his instructions? Why did he do this? His instructions told him to do it. Why did he not do that? His instructions said nothing about it. But clearly that was the right thing to do. Well, the instructions should have said so then. But they could not foresee the actual state of things. That is their fault, not his. And so forth. His notion of public duty is to do a certain stated thing, and nothing more. As for catching the spirit, rather than following the letter, that is beyond him altogether. The letter is plain and tangible, the spirit impalpable and imaginary. And as for zeal, he has too much faith in caution, and too much disbelief in departmental gratitude, to commit himself in that behalf.

Such are the maxims of hardened officials. With them, forms and routine are everything. And such as they are, they wish the Chief Commissioner of Police to be. According to their view, he should go down to Scotland Yard, receive reports, read them, make his notes and issue his instructions. If regular and methodical himself, he will impart a certain external method and punctuality to his men. That is, there will be a most ostentatious exhibition of regularity and punctuality at the office itself. Such inspectors and sergeants as are required to attend personally will be there to the very moment fixed. Those who have to report will report at the proper time and in the proper phrase. Certain beats will be reported to have been visited at certain hours, and the men to have been found doing their duty on them. Occasionally, a private policeman, not quite up to the formularies of official life, will be caught napping, and thus afford the exciting cause of an exceptional report, to his personal disadvantage. These, and the little incidents of daily patrols over the whole metropolitan area, will supply, as they have hitherto supplied, matter for daily returns of unexceptionable regularity and precision. The Chief will go on writing and reading; inspectors and superintendents attending with returns; and the whole machinery will work beautifully—on paper. But how would it actually work? What would be its public character and its public fruits? With a Chief who never visited his outposts, who knew nothing of the men personally, who never rode out to excite their ardour or to reprove their languor, with deputies who knew that the Chief was a mere office-man, it would work only in one way—that is, perfunctorily and unprofitably. A certain external activity would be displayed, but it would be useless for the prevention or the punishment of crime. The police would be one great sham, whilst its heads would fancy it to be an admirably active organization, and no one could make out a case of actual laches. The metropolis would be alternately excited to loud bursts of merriment and loud cries of indignation at the costly imposture which did nothi[ng] to protect the property that supported it. And in process [of] time the clamour would become so loud, that Parliament would have no alternative but to break up the unity of the force, and hand its component fractions over to the authority of conflicting and discordant Vestries.

That this revolution would work out its own cure in time, and ultimately tend to the reorganization of the force, we do not doubt. But it is hardly worth while to obtain even such a consummation at such a price. Roast pig is a good thing, but it is dearly bought by the firing of a whole village. How great the price in this case would be, may be calculated by any one who will trouble his imagination so far as to conceive a dozen superintendents of the average calibre playing the part of Chief Commissioner in each of twelve metropolitan parishes. Then let him fancy these superintendents weekly called before the Police Committees of each Vestry, instructed by one fussy proser, lectured by another, and bullied by a third, till he left the parochial senate utterly confounded by the manifold directions he had received, which agreed in nothing but their extreme absurdity. Imagine these varied by private hints and instigations to worry this man's enemy and wink at that man's friend, to get up false charges in one quarter, to suppress true charges in another, and to do all the dirty business which small tradesmen, angry and jealous and greedy, would desire to see done for themselves and to the prejudice of their rivals, and the picture will represent correctly some of the fruits of a Vestry-governed constabulary.

The last contingency which we have suggested reminds us of one important change which ought to be introduced into the police. At present the police are the public prosecutors in the majority of criminal cases. It is for the interest of the public and the police that this should no longer be so. The mere fact that a lawyer is at the head of the police is not sufficient to prevent the miscarriage of justice which too often arises from this system. The head of the police has work of detail enough without being encumbered by legal questions. It is desirable that a lawyer should be appointed to advise the police and to watch the preparation of those cases which do not come under the special supervision of the Treasury or the Mint. Perhaps it would be as well to appoint a public prosecutor for the metropolitan districts, as a preliminary step to introducing the institution generally. One effect of the institution would be to diminish, if not wholly to prevent, scandals such as that to which we drew attention a fortnight ago. Nothing can be more prejudicial to the due administration of justice than the repetition of cases like Bisgrove's. The Secretary of State has taken upon himself to set aside the verdict of a jury and the sentence of a judge, upon evidence unconfirmed by oath. He may be morally right. He may have satisfied his own conscience that Bisgrove was in a state of mind which made him irresponsible for his actions. But how was he satisfied? On what testimony? How given? So far as we understand the case, he has set a precedent which virtually annuls capital punishment in future. What is to prevent any man in a respectable position, who has a dislike to capital punishment, from getting up a memorial for a convicted criminal, and urging illness or epilepsy in his behalf? Most men who drink have illnesses and fits during their lives. The intensity and the effects of these attacks properly constitute the subject of strict medico-legal inquiry at the time of trial. Witnesses cannot there float away on a cloud of vague generalities. They must give facts, dates, proofs. It is a very suspicious matter when these are not adduced before a Court capable of sifting them, but are reserved for an officer of State who has no means of strict investigation, and who has a multitude of other things to attend to. And it is always very dangerous for a man who has not a judge's means of ascertaining the truth to undo the judge's work on an extra-judicial inquiry of his own. But if a responsible officer were entrusted with the duty of public prosecutions, he would not leave open a case for this final and irregular appeal. He would have no particular object in getting a prisoner found guilty of murder. He would see to his being committed for trial, and then set about inquiring whether he was a criminal who ought to be convicted, or a lunatic who ought to be shut up. And he would take care to procure the proper evidence for either result. The same official, too, would be of infinite use in advising the police how to watch liberated convicts and notorious ex-criminals, and in suggesting generally the basis of legislative enactments for the treatment of the criminal classes.

The new Chief Commissioner will have plenty of work to do. Not the least important of his duties will be to point out the additions and changes requisite for securing the efficiency of his department. Among these two are conspicuous—the appointment of more Assistant-commissioners to visit the outposts, and of a law-officer to direct the preparation of criminal cases and the surveillance of criminals. The former is indispensable to the discipline of the police; the latter to the safety of the

GAOL CHAPLAINS.

THE root of all our difficulties in dealing with Ireland and the Irish is religion, and no settlement of these difficulties will ever be arrived at until we are able to regard Protestants and Roman Catholics with impartial eye. To say this is only to repeat an obvious and familiar truth, and yet it is a truth wh[…] numbers of persons by their votes at the late election em[…]

denied. If these persons were asked whether they did not think that the Roman Catholic religion, in spite of all they had heard said against it, was better than no religion at all, they could scarcely avoid admitting that it was. If we compare for one moment London with San Francisco, we shall find that in London the lowest kind of labour is to a great extent performed by Irishmen, while in San Francisco it is performed by Chinese. Without feeling any violent partiality for Irishmen, we shall all of us probably prefer them to Chinese; and even if we do not, here they are, and we cannot easily get rid of them. They are almost without exception Roman Catholics. The influence of their priests over them is considerable, and that influence is generally exercised to promote private morality and public order. It was stated by Archbishop Manning before a Committee of the House of Commons that the population for which he was more especially responsible consisted of about 200,000 of the poorest in London. The Archbishop appeared on that occasion, along with the Reverend Newman Hall, and other ministers of various denominations, to advocate the imposition of further restrictions upon the sale of intoxicating drink. We are not concerned at present with the wisdom of the restrictions thus proposed, and we only refer to them in order to show that Archbishop Manning and his clergy make considerable, and apparently sincere, efforts to promote the morality and tranquillity of London. The population already mentioned is exposed to very great temptation about the time of St. Patrick's day. "During that period," says the Archbishop, "we take special and very active steps to prevent, if possible, the entrance of any of our people into public-houses"; and he thinks that these efforts have been attended with very marked success. Our Protestant friends, if we ask them for any opinion as to the morality of the teaching of the Roman Catholic clergy, will, as we know, fly off into denunciations of the confessional. But we should nevertheless desire to obtain an answer to the question, What would be likely to happen if the Irish Roman Catholics remained in London while their priests were taken away? Our own opinion is, that in that case it would be highly desirable to appoint an efficient Head of the Police. The influence of clergy of all Christian denominations is probably exerted with nearly equal sincerity and efficiency in the support of law and order; and impartial laymen think that one form of Christianity, if judged by visible results, is nearly as good as another, and that any form of Christianity is better than none at all.

If it be thought that the above remarks are not far removed from platitudes, a sufficient apology for making them will be found in a report which has appeared in the daily papers of a discussion in the Court of Aldermen as to the religious teaching of Roman Catholic prisoners in the City Gaol. It appears that a Roman Catholic priest who visits his co-religionists in that prison addressed to the Governor of it a letter, which being read at the Court of Aldermen, affected Alderman Carter with such astonishment and indignation that he almost asked himself whether he was in France, or Spain, or England. The Alderman may not know that he is in England, but, unless he has neglected his opportunities at civic feasts, England may be trusted to know that she bears his weight. The Alderman denounces that aggressive policy of the Roman Catholic priesthood which has been so often denounced before. It appears that there are thirty-five men and ten women of the Roman Catholic religion in the City Prison, and the priest who visits them desires to have the opportunity of assembling them for public worship. Some persons would perhaps consider this desire reasonable, and Alderman Carter does not say that it is unreasonable, but he protests against the consequences which flow from it. "The next thing will be," says he, "that the priest will ask us (the Court of Aldermen) to provide him with a room to worship in." Well, we should think that that would be the next thing. If the Alderman were, as he almost supposed himself to be, in France or Spain, he would expect the afflicted earth to bear his weight. But if the Court of Aldermen provide, according to request, a room, it is apprehended that this audacious priest will proceed to decorate an altar in it. We may regret, though we must admit, that this apprehension seems to us perfectly well founded. Among the thirty-five men and the ten women, in the City Gaol, who profess the Roman Catholic religion, it is highly probable that there are some who value what Protestant aldermen would call the mummeries of the mass. It must be admitted that among nominal members of the Establishment, the combination of a taste for church-going with a taste for swindling is not uncommon, and although we think that chaplains of all denominations are liable to be deceived by an apparent awakening of religious feeling in the breasts of criminals, yet unless the work of reformation is to be abandoned as hopeless, the chaplains must be encouraged to assist in it. The prisoners cannot go to church, and therefore the church must come to them. Any chaplain of the Church of England would desire, not only to address prisoners individually, but to gather them together and invite them to take part in the services of his Church. A chaplain of the Church of Rome desires exactly the same thing; and so, if you once admit him into a prison, he will have, as Alderman Carter says, the assurance—nay, the impertinence—to ask for a room, and proceed to decorate an altar; and we have a strong suspicion that, in spite of the protestations of the Court of Aldermen, he will ultimately obtain what he requires. There is, indeed, another and even more formidable contingency, which, if it should be realized, may well cause Alderman Carter to inquire whether he is in France or Spain, or where. This priest, as appears, came to the prison a month ago, but the Court of Aldermen do not know how he got there, nor whether he was sent by the Pope or by Dr. Manning. "Here," says Alderman Wilson, "is a man whom we do not know, and he asks to be allowed to see prisoners in private." Another alderman, in the simplicity of his heart, said that he understood that the priest was appointed by the archbishop of the diocese. This alderman, perhaps, did not observe the concession he was making to that Papal aggression which all true Protestants are pledged strenuously to resist. But we regret to say that this concession, like those of the room and the altar, will be found on examination to be inevitable. A person presents himself, and states that he is a Roman Catholic priest, and that he is authorized to perform spiritual offices within the City Prison. The Court of Aldermen must either take this statement upon trust, or they must examine the alleged authority, which will doubtless prove to have been derived from the person exercising episcopal functions within a district of which Westminster is the centre, or as even Protestants, if they are not upon their guard, will say, for the sake of shortness, within the diocese of Westminster. The dilemma to which we find ourselves reduced is disagreeable. We cannot exclude Roman Catholic priests from gaols, and if they enter they bring with them the authority of their bishops. In fact, the Court of Aldermen is being quietly brought under the canon law, and wheedled into admitting the territorial titles of the Romish Hierarchy. And even this is not the worst of the alarming business; for, as Alderman Wilson says, it will end in getting money out of the Corporation. The priest would not only obtain his room and his altar, but he would come before the Court and ask for a salary, and "there would be a repetition of what was going on in the county."

We happen to know what is going on in the county, because a motion has been this week brought forward for the appointment and payment of Roman Catholic chaplains in the county prisons. It appears, from a report of Visiting Justices, that the number of Church of England prisoners committed to the Westminster House of Correction in the year 1867-8 was 3,358, while the number of Roman Catholics was 2,053, and the total number of all other religious denominations was 43. The same proportion nearly has been observed in four preceding years. Now, if the attendance of a minister of religion is desirable, it ought to be given regularly, and it is not likely to be so given unless a minister be appointed and paid to do the work. The Church of England chaplain at the Westminster House of Correction receives 400*l.* a year, and, at the same rate of payment, a Roman Catholic chaplain ought to receive 250*l.* a year. The opponents of a motion for payment of this chaplain by the county must either say that he should give his services gratuitously, or that he must look to his wealthy co-religionists to pay him. Either of these resources may be sufficient when the number of prisoners of any particular denomination is very small, but we all know by our own experience what are the usual limits of voluntary effort. As regards prisoners committed to the Westminster House of Correction, we have only the total number for a year. But the daily average number of Roman Catholics confined in Coldbath Fields Prison and in the House of Detention is given, and it is 404. There is, as we all know, a considerable population of low-class Roman Catholics, chiefly Irish, in London, and they contribute to our prisons the large proportion of inmates which we find reckoned as belonging to that communion. Having got all these Roman Catholics in prison, what are we to do with them? Nobody proposes to leave them wholly without spiritual instruction, and we suppose that hardly anybody would propose to employ Protestant clergymen to convert them. It remains that they must be attended by ministers of their own faith. We must once more confess that we appear to ourselves to be painfully reiterating platitudes. But arguments which it is impossible to answer may be repeated in the hearing of magistrates and aldermen without producing the slightest impression on their minds. If a proposal should ever be brought forward for paying the priest who now ministers at the City Prison, we shall have Alderman Carter asking himself whether he is in France, or Spain, or England. And even if this particular alderman could be removed to France, or Spain, or heaven, some other alderman of the same views would remain behind to denounce the attempt of the Roman Catholics to get money out of the Corporation.

It may, however, be reasonably hoped that Alderman Carter and his five brethren who voted with him will all go to heaven in course of time, and that they will be succeeded by aldermen with minds more accessible to reason and common sense. Among these six aldermen we recognise, as might be expected, three who were Conservative candidates at the last election. The Irish difficulty will be removed whenever Englishmen are agreed in treating Roman Catholics and Protestants impartially, and considerable progress has been already made towards that happy consummation, because we find that where six aldermen voted against giving facilities for Roman Catholic priests to hold services in the City Prison, seven aldermen voted in favour of these facilities being given. The motion which was thus carried by seven votes to six proposed indeed no more than a reference to the Gaol Committee to consider how facilities might be given. But it was considered, by one of the aldermen who voted against it, of such "vital importance," that he gave notice of a motion to rescind it. This success will afford encouragement for other and greater conflicts. If the sup-ious equality keep "[illegible]

at their arguments will in time penetrate the heads even of aldermen who stood for boroughs on constitutional principles at the late election.

The county of Middlesex has shown itself less intelligent and liberal than the City of London; for the proposal for payment of Roman Catholic gaol chaplains has been rejected by a majority of two to one. The opponents of the measure have talked in the usual strain about the aggressive policy of Rome. Her motto, says one Protestant orator, is excelsior. It is rather hard upon Rome that her adversaries should impute to her their own ignorance of Latin grammar. The truth is, although the majority of these magistrates cannot be brought to see it, that their own fanatical intolerance makes the Roman Catholic priesthood powerful, by furnishing them with just grounds of complaint. If a Roman Catholic prisoner is sent to a convict prison, he is regularly provided with the attendance of a minister of his own Church; but as long as he remains in one of the prisons of the County of Middlesex, he is dependent for that attendance on the charity of the Roman Catholic community. But the heads of the Protestant party have admitted the necessity of Roman Catholic gaol chaplains, and the tail will be reluctantly compelled, in course of time, to give to this admission practical effect.

BENEVOLENCE AND THE POOR.

THE most amusing, if it were not the most pathetic, of all the instances of distress which the winter has of late brought before us, is the distress of a really kindhearted man who wishes to do something for the poor. A host of societies beseech him to check his first instincts of benevolence, and set before him the evils of indiscriminate almsgiving; but no sooner does he depute to his censors the task of more wisely administering his charities, than these societies themselves are denounced as the chief producers of pauperism. He turns to the clergy, but the clergy are half convinced that their course of late has been only a revival of the old system of doles; while a chorus of guardians attributes to the almoner, the sister of mercy, and the district visitor, the sudden increase of mendicancy which has undone the work of the Poor-laws. A little discomfited, perhaps, at finding that there is really no room for any personal benevolence of his own, the philanthropist buttons up his pocket, leaves the poor to the Poor-laws, and plunges into his Times. But even here he is far from peace. Morning after morning his breakfast table is seasoned with denunciations of the very system which professed to be all-sufficient, with protests against the incompetence of the central office, the ignorance of guardians, workhouse mismanagement, the neglect of the sick, the starvation of the poor. Indignation turns him into a reformer; he sits patiently under the endless statistics of the Adelphi; he studies the systems of Elberfeld, of Paris, of the Jews. Unluckily, each new system breaks down under the triumphant criticism of its rivals; each demands, as a first condition, an entire change in our legal and constitutional views of things, while it is plain that to introduce any one of them would be the work of a lifetime. At this stage even the most persevering of philanthropists might be pardoned for abandoning his quest, and falling back with a sigh of relief on the familiar beggar at the crossing. The disappointment has, in fact, come to most of us, but a disappointment is sometimes a gain in forcing people to consult possibilities. Now that the storm of the Adam Street theorists has a little subsided, it may be possible to set about considering, not the great question of how to abolish our present Poor-laws, but the smaller one of how to make the best of them.

What is wanted, in fact, is, not a radical change of system, but less rigidity and less red tape. Officialism, however, can scarcely be expected to open its arms to reformers who are yet more exclusive and self-sufficient than itself. There is hardly a single suggestion which has been made in the voluminous correspondence of the last two months which does not possess some value, but the value of each is commonly marred by representing it as the one thing needful. A gigantic scheme of emigration which looks on America or Australia as the mere recipients of what Mr. Carlyle calls "Rubbish shot here" is so ludicrously impossible that one is tempted to set aside emigration altogether. But such a remedy is singularly adapted to local and temporary gluts of unemployed labour, such as the past winters have seen at Poplar and Limehouse, and it is sudden gluts such as these with which the ordinary system of poor-relief is least calculated to deal. Another heroic remedy, that of the penal treatment of pure pauperism in the mass by the withdrawal of such civil rights as the control of his children from any parent on his third application for relief, or by the treatment of drunkenness—the great parent of pauperism—as a legal crime, is big enough in its impossibility to hide out of sight the smaller and more practicable course of putting the man whose deliberate misconduct brings his children to penury on the same criminal footing with the man who is now punished for throwing precisely the same burden on the rates by the desertion of his family. The chief objection to the Elberfeld scheme of dealing with the poor is a precisely similar one. Elberfeld is a thriving town with a singularly sensible man, the brother of the present Finance Minister of North Germany, at the head of it. The municipal regulations of the place allow the central board of guardians to call some three hundred of their fellow-citizens to their aid, and to set each of these as "a father" over some four families among the number of those relieved from the rates. It is needless to go into the details of grouping by which this large organization is bound together; its essence lies in this intimate and personal supervision of the poor, and the word "father" very fairly expresses the spirit of the system. Both the sides of paternal government are fairly represented. On the one hand, the duties of the "father" are far from being confined to administering necessary relief; he investigates carefully the causes of the distress, and the character of the family; he is expected to exert a moral influence over his flock, and to aid personally in procuring employment for those who are willing to work. On the other hand, he possesses a father's penal power; on his report the gambler, idler, or drunkard is liable to imprisonment, and the same penalty awaits the pauper who refuses to work to his full strength when work is given him, or the unemployed labourer who has not made a sufficient effort to obtain employment. This penal power is, in fact, the backbone of the whole system; moral influence would be wasted on the "sturdy beggar" whom our English law allows to "throw himself on the parish" when he will. But, save to the limited extent which we have before pointed out, such a penal treatment of pauperism would be impossible here; while the minute official supervision and interference—in fact, the "paternal government"—which is the essence of the whole, would to our national temper be unbearable. It must not be forgotten, too, that in its practical working such a plan would involve the danger of the most meddlesome and vexatious tyranny. A small tradesman, placed at the head of a group of pauper families, would hardly fail to use his position in a way directly profitable to himself, and to procure forced labour at a rate beneath its market value. In fact, with laws such as those at Elberfeld it would be possible, by a simple combination of the employers and a rigid enforcement of the laws against "idleness," to reduce wages to a minimum and to place the labouring class absolutely at their masters' mercy.

That the introduction of the Elberfeld scheme in its present form into England is impossible does not, however, diminish its suggestive value. It is noteworthy that the personal supervision which forms its chief feature is rendered possible by a general conviction that the reduction of pauperism is the common business of all, and that it is not a task which can be deputed to paid officials. Nor is it the least valuable feature of the plan, as it is reported, that this sense is brought home to the working classes themselves by including artisans among the district supervisors. One cannot help wishing that some mode of representation could be devised, by which delegates of the working classes should themselves sit among the guardians of the poor. Nothing would bring home more forcibly to the very masses from whom pauperism springs its real nature and the necessity of mastering it. At present, abuse the tradesmen-guardians as we may, theirs is the one class which fairly takes its part in this great work of coping with national distress. But, as we have said, the essence of the whole scheme lies in the plan of personal supervision. It is impossible to doubt the power of this when we find it reducing the number of the pauper class by two-thirds, a reduction which is yet more remarkable as a moral gain to the community than it is as an economical one. The impossibility of introducing such compulsory supervision as that at Elberfeld we have already acknowledged, but it does not follow that superintendence need lose all its power by losing its compulsory character. Here, in fact, we think, lies the true field of private benevolence. The man who would devote himself to the moral and social elevation of half-a-dozen pauper families would be cutting off the very spring of pauperism. What has yet been done by the clergy, or by the voluntary agencies associated with them, has been done on too wide and diffusive a scale to prove anything better than mere almsgiving. What is wanted is the spirit of self-sacrifice which would induce a man to concentrate all his energies on some four disagreeable homes, and to work at them, if need be, for years. It is not a question of giving money; benevolence in this sense destroys the very relation which a true friend to the poor would wish to create. The sense of a friendly interest taken in them, the offer of a healthy sympathy, the knowledge where to go for counsel and advice, the certainty that there is someone to look to for help when help may fairly and rightly be given, these are moral elements whose power it would be impossible to exaggerate in the redemption of the poor. A word will often ensure the child's regularity at school, the cleanliness of the house, respectable dress and demeanour. A very little time and thought will often find new spheres of work for the unemployed, get the girl out into decent service, or find the boy a remunerative place. No one who has not worked personally among the poor knows how wanting they are in shiftiness and inventiveness, how thriftless in prosperity, how apathetic when the bad time comes. But it often needs only a suggestion to induce them to "lay by," or to rouse them to new efforts to obtain employment. That, as a class, they are wonderfully grateful for any sympathy, and inclined to repose only too great a confidence in any whom they believe to be their friends, the experience of every clergyman and district visitor could tell. The lesson is a very simple and homely one, but it is the lesson of the Elberfeld experiment, and it is none the worse for being an answer to our wandering and disappointed philanthropist. We would simply advise any reader who is gently tormented with his desire to do some good to the poor, to take the first four families on the relieving officer's list, and to see what a year's personal friendship, counsel, and aid can do towards putting them into a position to help themselves.

THE SITE OF THE LAW COURTS.

SIR CHARLES TREVELYAN has exhausted all that can be said in favour of the Thames Embankment as the site for the New Law Courts. His grand argument—the alleged superiority of the Embankment for architectural effect—we have already considered, and, notwithstanding a certain plausibility in the project, we were driven to the conclusion that, from a purely architectural point of view, the site originally selected was the more promising. But Sir Charles Trevelyan does not rest his case upon architectural effect alone. He maintains that the substitution of the Embankment site would render the Courts more convenient to the lawyers and others who frequent them, and seems to believe that it would not increase, and might perhaps diminish, the cost of the undertaking. Even in the construction of sumptuous public buildings economy is not altogether to be disregarded; but we cannot think the money question as of more than secondary importance. That we should have a building suitable for its purpose, and an ornament to our city, is far more essential than that a scarcely appreciable reduction should be effected in the cost of its construction; even supposing that this would be the result of changing the site, which we see very little reason to anticipate. It is quite unnecessary, however, to discuss Sir C. Trevelyan's finance till we have ascertained whether his plan would afford the facilities for the conduct of forensic business which the concentration of the Law Courts was intended to provide. Let us then examine the comparative advantages of the two sites from the point of view of practical convenience. Upon this subject Sir C. Trevelyan insists that the Embankment site is preferable. 1. Because it is on a dead level, while the north side of the Carey Street site is 40 feet higher than the Strand side. 2. Because the Embankment site will furnish a larger area available for building. 3. Because the Embankment site will be flanked by two arterial thoroughfares, while the Carey Street site has at present but one frontage to such a street. 4. Because it will be practicable, by some rather bold manipulation of public and private property, to bring the chambers of practising lawyers at least as near to the Embankment site as they now are to the Carey Street site.

There are some other minor points touched upon, but the substance of what is urged in favour of the Embankment, so far as convenience is concerned, is based upon these four allegations. Very brief consideration will, we think, suffice to show what the argument amounts to. The difference of level of Carey Street and the Strand is no doubt a fact to be dealt with, but it is one that points to a conclusion exactly the opposite of that which Sir Charles Trevelyan derives from it. The effect of the difference of level is almost equivalent to doubling the area of the ground floor of the building, for that which is a first floor to those who enter from the Strand will be on the ground level if approached from Carey Street. If, therefore, the whole area actually covered by the building were 7 acres, there would be 14 acres to which access might be had from the street, without mounting a single step. So obvious an advantage was not lost sight of by the architects who sent in competitive designs, and one at least of them availed himself of it to the utmost by laying down a carriage drive for the Judges, from Carey Street within the building up to the very doors of their respective Courts. This of course would have been vastly more difficult, if not altogether impracticable, had the building been designed to stand on a dead level. For convenience of access, therefore, the inequality of the ground is a positive advantage, and this part of Sir Charles Trevelyan's argument recoils upon himself.

The limited area of the site at present purchased is a much more serious matter. It is not large enough for the sort of pile which has been proposed. Almost all the architects, however, fell into the error—the error, that is, from the point of view of convenience merely—of planning the Courts on too large a scale. Nothing impedes business more than an over-spacious Court. To place judges and counsel in a large echoing room, so far apart as to compel them to raise their voices above their natural and easy pitch, is a real and a needless hardship to both; for if spectators are accommodated, as they should be, in a separate gallery, a very moderate area suffices for all the lawyers and others who attend as a matter of business at any one time in one Court. Space might also be economized by curtailing the area of consultation rooms and other adjuncts; but still, when all was done, the actual site in possession of the Government (about 7½ acres) is confessedly too small to allow of adequate light and ventilation. But it has already been proposed by the Commissioners to take 6 acres more, and we observe that Sir C. Trevelyan, when he is dealing with the cost, always very properly debits the Carey Street site with the estimated cost of the whole 13½ acres, which no doubt will ultimately be taken. This being so, the comparison lies between 13½ acres on the selected site and the area of the embankment between Somerset House and the Temple, which Sir Charles Trevelyan gives as 9½ acres. As convenient access to the Metropolitan Railway is reckoned among the advantages of the site, it ought not to be forgotten that an important slice out of this 9½ acres is not unlikely to be required for a station; but even without allowing for this deduction, the available area on the Embankment is considerably less than that which it is proposed to acquire at Carey Street. As a set off against this, it must be admitted that the Embankment site may, without sacrificing light and air, be more completely covered than would be desirable on the original site; but 4½ acres is far more than margin enough to allow on this score, and the net result is, that the available area on the Carey Street site is considerably in excess of what could be procured on the Embankment. The argument from area, therefore, like the argument from levels, is an argument against, and not for, the Embankment site.

But is Sir Charles Trevelyan any more happy in his next point? To place the Courts between two great thoroughfares, such as the Strand and the Embankment-road, is about the last thing which the lawyers would wish for. The actual road traffic attracted by the Courts, even when concentrated, would be trifling compared with the through traffic that would be always sweeping by them with its accompaniments of dust and noise. Lincoln's Inn Fields and Chancery Lane are now the two approaches to all the Equity Courts and Offices. Of these, Lincoln's Inn Fields preserves an almost rural quietude, and Chancery Lane, narrow as it is, would seldom be overcrowded if it were not made the principal channel for vans and omnibuses desiring to pass between Holborn and the Strand. Perhaps the merely legal traffic in this district is not above a fourth of what would accumulate round the new Courts; but if it were multiplied by ten, it would be a mere drop in the ordinary flow of Holborn or the Strand. There are other reasons, no doubt, why such a building as is proposed to be constructed should have approaches not unworthy of it; but if the convenience of lawyers alone were consulted, the Courts would be removed somewhat from all leading thoroughfares, and approached by streets of moderate width, provided with ample space for pedestrians. Carey Street and Chancery Lane are no doubt at present too narrow; but even as they are, it would be long before the traffic of the Courts alone would obstruct them.

We come now to the last and most important question. Which site will be most accessible from the chambers of counsel and solicitors? It is not denied that while Lincoln's Inn remains where it is, the answer to this question must be conclusive against the proposed change of site. The alteration would not much affect the Templars, though, on account of the elongated shape of the ground, the centre of the Embankment site would perhaps be rather more distant than that of the present site from the centre of the two Temples. Lincoln's Inn, however, would be four or five times as far from the Courts, besides being cut off by the barrier of the Strand; and we believe that the great mass of the lawyers who are settled in and about Lincoln's Inn and Gray's Inn (forming two-thirds of the whole profession) would rather go on without new Courts at all than have them placed on the site which Sir Charles Trevelyan has proposed. This really fatal difficulty is met by two alternative proposals, which can scarcely have been seriously put forward. One is that Lincoln's Inn should sell off its present property, and buy the land, or part of the land, which has just been acquired, by the Commissioners for 750,000*l.* On this it is suggested that they might erect lofty suites of chambers (as if third, fourth, and fifth floors were of any use to practising lawyers) to which it is assumed that practitioners would instantly migrate, and so bring themselves more within reach of the Courts. Even then they would be cut off by the living stream of the Strand ceaselessly flowing between them and their business; but it is needless to consider the consequences of an arrangement which has the objection of being impracticable.

The other scheme is certainly not more likely to be realized, and indeed is so ingeniously complicated, that even its author produced it in the first instance with a sort of apology. The main features are these. The Government offices now accommodated in Somerset House are to have new quarters built for them in the region of St. James' Park. The Society of Lincoln's Inn is to remove to Somerset House, leaving the Hall, Chapel, Library, and Chambers at the disposal of King's College. The Incorporated Law Society is to take part of the land cleared between Carey Street and the Strand, and Clement's Inn is to revive its corporate existence for the sole purpose of appropriating the rest. Where the money is to come from for a plan which in fact would use up both the rival sites, and require in addition a new block of offices in St. James's Park, need scarcely be asked; for the other obstacles are so insuperable, that a question of a few millions sterling becomes trifling in comparison. And when it was all done, the Courts would on the whole be less accessible to those professionally engaged than if they were built on the Carey Street site, without any disturbance of existing arrangements. The more completely the Courts and offices are surrounded by professional chambers the more convenient will they be. A river on the south side of the building would cut off about one-third of the space otherwise available for chambers. On the north, the noisy Strand would be almost as serious an impediment; and the Temples at one end and Somerset House at the other would be the only legal quarters from which the Courts could be approached. Under these circumstances, one can scarcely regret that the notion of Lincoln's Inn bartering Old and New Square—with Stone Buildings, Hall and Library thrown in—against Somerset House and King's College, is too wild to be seriously entertained.

THE IRISH ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOPS.

A FAR less sensitive and "earnest" statesman than Mr. Gladstone might well feel appalled at the task lying before the Ministry in the coming Session of Parliament. Ireland has indeed for many a long day been the standing terror of politicians, and not without some reason. There was no subject—not even Church Rates or Parliamentary Reform—which it was so impossible to touch without rousing a storm of angry opposition from all sides at once. The moment it was mooted, a cry of "injustice" was certain to resound glibly and fiercely from everybody's lips; the one point which all seemed agreed upon being that justice to your neighbours was necessarily injustice to yourself. Mr. Gladstone must have been well aware —or, if he was not, he cannot have been long in discovering—that to announce the policy of disestablishment of the Irish Church was to open the bags of Æolus, and send all the winds of heaven careering about him at their own not very sweet will. At all events, since some Tory genius, whose name we forget, described him during the election in language which "froze his blood," he must have learnt that the path of justice in which he had elected to walk would not be strewn with roses. But he probably expected, as he no doubt had a right to expect, the hearty confidence and support of those in whose interests he was incurring such bitter obloquy. At least it would have been reasonable to expect it if he had not been dealing with Irishmen. But what Herodotus said of the ancient Egyptians is true, in a somewhat different sense, of the modern Irish, that they do everything by contraries. Let us not be misunderstood. We have no doubt whatever that there is a large class—including all really wise and patriotic Irish citizens, men of whom the new Lord Chancellor O'Hagan may be taken as a representative—who are sincerely anxious to do all in their power to strengthen Mr. Gladstone's hands in his difficult task, and who have the sense and the candour to make full allowance for its difficulties. Nor would we by any means imply that none of the Roman Catholic prelates are to be reckoned among them. In the account of the lengthy epistles from several of these dignitaries read at the recent meeting of the National Defence Association in Dublin, one name will occur to everybody as being conspicuous by its absence. Dr. Moriarty, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Kerry, is facile princeps among his mitred brethren though a man in every way his inferior is their titular head He has often before now come forward to speak words of peace and moderation, and has even professed himself not at all averse to accepting endowments in the shape of glebes and sustentation funds for the fabrics of churches, though not salaries for the clergy. He is not, however, among the five bishops whose letters were read or quoted at the meeting the other day, and, to judge from the extracts before us, he probably felt that he would not have been in congenial company.

Before, however, we proceed to examine in detail these episcopal manifestoes, it is only due to the writers to observe that, however great may be their unwisdom, they have nothing to learn from the example of their Protestant rivals. It appears that about the same time that the National Association met in Dublin, the Central Protestant Defence Association was holding a meeting at Cork, and was addressed by the Bishop of Cork and Lord Bandon. The Bishop, with an exquisite mixture of good feeling, good sense, and good taste, denounced all who would not fight tooth and nail for the Establishment as pure and simple cowards who were "showing the white feather" before the battle was well begun, and he "wished those people would hold their tongues and not bother them with their wisdom." After scolding to his heart's content in the style of a fussy and incompetent nurserymaid, his lordship handed over the cudgels to the Earl of Bandon, who, if somewhat more dignified, was—not to put too fine a point upon it—a good deal more idiotic than his spiritual compeer. He delivered what is called "a lecture," for the purpose of "dispelling false notions about the meaning of the terms disendowment and disestablishment"; in other words, for the purpose of insisting that they had a sense quite different from anything that could be found in the dictionary. Disendowment, according to his lordship, "meant that the Protestants were to be robbed of their property"; disestablishment meant "that the supremacy of the Sovereign was to be overthrown, and Papal supremacy established in Ireland." To argue with persons who present the question in this form would be as idle as to argue with a denizen of Colney Hatch or a writer in the Record. But when Protestant bishops and peers talk the sort of nonsense we have just quoted, it is hardly to be wondered at that Cardinal Cullen and Alderman M'Swiney should pay them back in their own coin. We can only fancy a genuine lover of Ireland rising from the perusal of the strange and strangely-timed letters of the Roman Catholic prelates with a feeling of agonized bewilderment. What intelligible motive can have inspired them, unless it be the desire to secure a little temporary popularity in just the quarters where it is least worth having, it would probably puzzle the writers themselves to explain. No doubt it is important to Mr. Gladstone to have the fullest moral support which the clearly expressed sentiment of the Irish nation can give him in his crusade against the Established Church. But it is at least equally important to his success to have his hands left free to achieve a difficult work in the readiest and most practicable way he can devise. And if the Roman Catholic prelates wished to fetter his action and tie his tongue, they could hardly have hit on a more effective means of doing so than by inditing the reamsful of frothy rodomontade specimens of which have appeared in all the daily papers. To do Dr. Cullen justice—and we are the more willing to make the acknowledgment as reticence is certainly not his besetting weakness—he was more reserved, more dignified, and more reasonable than his right reverend brethren, so far as the extracts from his letter enable us to judge. He expressed his belief that "the question of the Established Church gives promise of being settled in a manner comformable to the desires of the Irish people," and his "confident hope that from the wisdom and justice of such men as Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright" a satisfactory solution of the Land question would be obtained. We cannot quarrel with him adding that "the country would not be content without a denominational system of education"; for to that principle, whether wise or not, the Catholic hierarchy have long been pledged, and probably a considerable body of national sentiment is with them.

But, when we pass from the Cardinal to his brother prelates we find ourselves on a kind of inclined plane, sinking gradually, as we pass from one to another, to a lower and lower level of moderation and common sense. Archbishop Leahy contents himself with the enigmatic and perfectly pointless demand of "justice for the tenant without injustice to the landlord." Bishop Keane, of Cloyne, begins indeed by recognising the "manly and frank promises of perfect equality for all classes spoken in words of clear and thrilling eloquence" by Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright. But he immediately proceeds to hint his distrust of their sincerity by observing that "they must give something more than promises," and advising that Irish members should make their support of Mr. Gladstone dependent on certain conditions. And, not content with this, he goes on to intimate, in language studiously offensive and inflammatory, what will be the "terrific and inevitable" consequence if these conditions are not complied with. "Disappointment and exasperation," he suggestively remarks, would then "be the only counsellors" of the Irish people. And when England is engaged in a Continental or American war—"not an improbable contingency"—they "would cheerfully seize on the long-wished-for opportunity, and in their onward movement of vengeance they would respect neither the advice, nor the ministry, nor the lives of those who stood in their way." Whether the "ministry" referred to is that of the Roman Catholic or the Protestant clergy is not quite obvious; but if, as seems probable, the latter is intended, there is a more than Hibernian infelicity in the suggestion. In the first place, it is neither politic nor persuasive to assure a highly respectable body of men who, on just grounds of public interest but for no fault of their own, are called upon to undergo what to them must be a severe humiliation, that if they make any resistance, they will have their throats cut instead. There is a pretty general agreement that the Irish Church ought to be disestablished, because it was a mistake from the beginning, but no one has breathed a syllable against the character or conduct of the present generation of Irish clergy; and all sensible men must desire that the necessary change should be made as little painful to them personally as is consistent with the ends of national justice. More than that, there is no class of the community whose lives should be more secure from the dagger of the peasant assassin than the Irish Protestant clergy. Whatever may be their shortcomings in their spiritual capacity, it is admitted on all hands that they have been good friends to the poor; and, as a matter of fact, it is not they who have been the victims of agrarian murder. Bishop Keane's mild exhortation to them to "stand and deliver" at the dagger's point is as gratuitous as it is foolish and indecorous. Dr. O'Hea, Bishop of Ross, who appears to have been the most prolix as well as the most fervid of the episcopal letter-writers, makes "the disestablishment and total disendowment of the Church as by law established" the keynote of his strain. He professes his willingness that vested interests should be respected, but he is very suspicious as to "the manner" of respecting them, and very determined that not one shilling of her present endowments shall remain in perpetuity to the disestablished Church. "The principle of justice which has so long been left in abeyance" would be "compromised" by any such "half-measures." Considering that no small portion of the endowments dates from post-Reformation times, and has a purely Protestant origin, this reasoning does not come home to one as self-evident.

But after Alderman M'Swiney had read the letters of these various prelates from the chair, Mr. O'Neill Dermott went on to cap them by an argument of his own which certainly deserves to be put on record. The chairman had asserted that "complete disestablishment, thorough disendowment, and perfect religious equality" would alone satisfy the people, and that they would view anything short of it as "a mockery, a delusion, and a snare," and had expressly condemned "the policy of substantial re-endowment, which some persons attributed to Mr. Gladstone." And then Mr. O'Neill Dermot got on his legs to prove why it would be unjust to leave the Protestant endowments in the hands of the Protestant Church. His first argument was an appeal to that kind of justice which is sometimes called poetical, and which is therefore hardly amenable to the frigid and unfeeling laws of prosaic criticism. We quote it simply as a noble outburst of poetic genius. "It was only a just retribution that the anti-national Establishment, whose perpetuity was promised as part of the price for which Ireland was basely and wickedly sold, should at last be itself overthrown by the very power on which the renegades of 1800 relied as its pillar of strength." After this, any further argument might seem superfluous; but Mr. O'Neill Dermott subjoined another which appears to us to lose in poetry more than it gains in logical force. "In England the Catholic Church had been the State Church for nearly a thousand years, and yet the English Government, when it suited them, did not hesitate to get rid of it." As a defence of what was done in Ireland at the period of the Reformation, this argument might have some show of plausibility; but what conceivable analogy there is between the ritual and doctrinal changes introduced at that period into the English Church, which did not lead to the disendowment or disestablishment of any Church at all, and only of very few individual priests and bishops, Mr. O'Neill Dermott must be left to

But his third argument is evidently the one on which he fly relies, and we may safely say that it is the most remarkable f the three. It has been said, he observes, that by far the larger proportion of the glebe lands now possessed by the Protestant Church was never possessed by the Roman Catholic Church, bu was given by Protestants for Protestant purposes; and he tacitly admits that this is true of five-sixths of the glebe lands now held by the clergy of the Establishment. To ordinary minds the conclusion would seem to be irresistible that they have a fair righ to keep them. Not so, says the speaker, for "the Governmen seized at the Reformation the rectorial tithes of not less than 562 parishes, together with 1,480 glebes, and handed them over to laymen, while, in addition, 118 parishes became wholly impropriate." With what face, then—the force of the ergo is scarcely obvious—"can they (the Protestant clergy, we presume, are meant) claim any title to the glebes created since the Reformation? In point of clear equity such glebes can only be considered as substitutes for the old Catholic glebes." Here, again, the reasoning would be plausible if it were urged for a different purpose. The Government robbed Peter, and allowed its friends to pay Paul; therefore it is "clear equity" that it ought now to take Paul's money, and give it to Peter, in compensation for what it robbed him of. There might be a sort of rough justice in such a procedure, but that is not at all what Mr. O'Neill Dermott means. He and his friends assure us they will touch none of the money which, as Dr. Manning absurdly enough expressed it, has been "desecrated" by its application to Protestant purposes; the "clear equity" of the arrangement proposed is not that of robbing Paul to reimburse Peter, but of robbing Paul in order that Peter, who was himself robbed some time ago, may have the satisfaction of seeing somebody else subjected to the same process now.

There is one other remark made by the same speaker, and substantially involved in the reasoning of all the prelates whose letters were read at the meeting of the National Association, which has a wider bearing than most of them may have cared to remember. "All Church property," he said, "is, or should be, a trust fund held for the benefit of the people." If this is sound doctrine in Ireland —and we are by no means anxious to dispute it—why is it unsound doctrine in Italy or Spain? We are not now discussing whether Church property in those countries is, or was, usefully applied for the people's good. Of course, if the affirmation can be successfully maintained, there can be no excuse for meddling with it. But the Papal Non possumus of which we have heard so much of late years—and not least from those who are eloquent on the abominations of Church property in Ireland—has been based, if we are not greatly mistaken, not on an affirmative answer to this question, but on a previous objection to its being raised at all. We have no wish whatever to suggest that justice and "perfect religious equality" should be refused to Ireland till the temporal claims of the Papacy have been reconciled with the just demands of Italy, and the principles of religious equality with the doctrines of the last Encyclical. Such reasoning would be as foolish as Mr. O'Neill Dermott's. But it is worth while to remind the prelates who are so eloquent in their denunciations of religious ascendency and their demands for "perfect equality" civil and religious, that they are sanctioning a lex iniqua, or what would appear to them to be such, against themselves, which those who for the nonce are content to follow their leading are not likely hereafter to forget.

THE AGRICULTURAL RETURNS.

THE volume of Agricultural Returns for Great Britain for the year 1868, recently published, is the second complete and uniform annual issue, and may be taken to exhibit the condition of agriculture in that year. We have had in previous years to find fault with the late period at which these returns were given to the public; and Mr. Fonblanque, of the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade, in submitting these returns to the Board, admits the justice of this complaint, and informs my Lords that the neglect is not with his department, but with the occupiers of land. "As the forms are issued stamped for free transmission by post, a ready means for the early return of the forms is afforded by the Post Office. In many cases, when the forms are not so returned, considerable delay is occasioned by the officers having to make personal application at houses situated at some distance from their own residences." In spite of these difficulties a summary of the returns was sent to the London papers upon the 19th of September. This being the case it is but fair to acknowledge the difficulties of the department, and to throw the blame where it should lie—that is, upon the farmers. Every month lately has seen the development of the farmers' movement—a movement which has for its object the recognition, by the Government and by the public, of the farmers' grievances and the farmers' wants, and the farmers' demands to be cared for as those engaged in trade and commerce are cared for by the Government. And we do not say that their agitation is unreasonable. Take it only on the point of the amount of capital employed. There are in the United Kingdom about 45½ millions of acres under cultivation or bearing stock. Assume, and we believe the estimate to be under the mark, that there is a capital of 4*l.* per acre employed; this would give in round numbers a total capital of 185 millions sterling employed in the business of farming; and on the ground only of the importance of the amount of capital employed farmers may fairly claim to have their voices heard and their interests regarded. But how can they expect the public to their cause when it is perceived that they are slack and ...nt in a small matter which affects the interest of the ...ole trading community, such as that of making a simple return once a year? They ought to know by this time that the knowledge disclosed by these returns is as valuable to them as it is to commercial men; and as we now hear no more of that stupid narrowmindedness which prompted the refusal of all information, so let us hope that Mr. Fonblanque may no more have to complain of the carelessness or indifference which compels him to wait to a much later period than is needed for the publication of these valuable statistics. Let the Chambers of Agriculture, and the societies devoted to agriculture, put what pressure they can upon their members and friends during the ensuing spring to make their returns on the day on which they are asked for.

It is to be observed that the book is entitled Agricultural Returns for Great Britain, with Abstract Returns for the United Kingdom, British Possessions, and Foreign Countries, 1868, and on examination of the contents we find that "the detailed Returns for Ireland will be found in the annual Report prepared by the Registrar-General for Ireland, and laid before Parliament." The totals, however, under each heading for Ireland are given. Now we cannot but think that under a "Justice to Ireland" Ministry, if it survive until the next publication of this annual, there ought to be found under one cover all the detailed information of each division and county of Ireland, in the same form as we now have it for each division and county of Great Britain. And then, with the addition of a column for horses, which strangely are still omitted, we think the Agricultural Returns for the United Kingdom will leave very little to be desired, except an account of the actual crops per acre which have been gathered in preceding years, so that we may in time ascertain what are the average crops of this country—an account which, let it be marked, is given by all foreign countries. The demand that the Irish accounts should stand side by side with those for Great Britain is not so small a matter as may at first sight appear, for the Irish question must in the end resolve itself into the Land question, and we therefore cannot be too well informed upon all points and details of Irish agriculture, and in no way shall we have them so accessible for contrast as if they stood side by side with the Returns for Great Britain. We should then have brought out prominently, what is the fact, that Ireland is the worst-farmed country in North-Western Europe. It is not too much to say that there are no "systems" of agriculture in Ireland, such as exist in Great Britain, France, Holland, or the various German provinces; and in Ireland, of all countries, ought to be found the best system. For if Ireland be not distinguished by good agriculture, in what else can she look for distinction? The nature of her climate may be a difficulty in the way of her becoming a great corn-producing country, but the fertility of her soil, and the advantage of her position as the nearest neighbour of a country with the enormous wants which make England the best market in the world, should be inducement enough for her farmers to force the production of all animal food. Yet we find from these returns, that while in Great Britain there has been an increase of the number of both cattle and sheep borne on each 100 acres in 1868 over 1867, in Ireland there has been a decrease of each. We have only to turn to the detailed tables to trace to what division or county of England the increase is due, while, if we wish to seek for the details of the decrease in Ireland, it is necessary to turn to other tables not so popular nor so generally accessible. Altogether apart, however, from the teaching of these returns we cannot forbear from expressing our belief that bad farming is more the cause than the result of Ireland's misfortunes. Compare Ireland with Holland. Remark the advantages of the one country and the disadvantages of the other. Yet Holland flourishes. With examples near at hand, the Irish farmers make no progress; and the general run of the specifics proposed seems little likely to improve their practice. The tendency of many of them is in the wrong direction. Take Mr. Bright's plan for the subdivision of land; the effect of subdivision would be to throw the tillage of the soil into the hands of those who could (or should) cultivate it by their own manual labour—men without capital to make improvements, men without knowledge of what improvements ought to be made. Instead of division, the wisest movement would be in the direction of agglomeration, with farms of such dimensions as could afford to employ the appliances and the implements of modern husbandry. The Irish "system" is the rule of thumb, and hence it is that, in spite of cheap labour, a good climate, and a fertile soil, Ireland cannot sustain competition with countries where good scientific systems are practised; and we find, as now reported, her live stock, her chief stock in trade, decreasing instead of increasing, as it has done in Great Britain. And it is a very striking fact that, while in the whole of Great Britain there are 530,392 occupiers of land and owners of live stock, there are in Ireland alone 600,000 under the same heading. In England, Lancashire is the county where, on the average, the least extent of land is farmed by each occupier, and no one would point out Lancashire as a shining light in the matter of agriculture. It grows the least corn, in proportion to its area, of any English county; but as it has, taking the three divisions of Yorkshire as counties, the largest population of any, it does the best thing it could do for its people by keeping by far the largest number of milking cows of any English county. But it supports comparatively few cattle intended for consumption in the shape of beef; and, except Middlesex, it has the least number of sheep to each 100 acres of cultivated and grass land of any English county. But Ireland, having about the per of acreage under corn crops, has a less number of cattle and a less number of sheep per 100 acres than Lancashire. Now Ireland ought to be able to grow beef as well as it is able to breed cattle, and unless there is something in the climate which makes the sheep as good fencers and steeple-chasers as the horses (and we are bound to admit that the performances of the former are as much maledicted as those of the latter are praised on this side of the Channel), her pastures should give us as good mutton as that which we have to fetch from our eastern neighbours on the Continent. And, to try to learn why she does not do all this, we want to have the Irish statistics in the same volume with those for Great Britain.

There is constructed from these tables a somewhat curious corroboration of Mr. Caird's division of England into "two groups of acknowledged importance and interest—the grazing and the corn-growing counties." Following his plan, but working on the basis of the actual proportions of the corn crops to the total acreage as disclosed by the returns, the counties of England have been divided into two classes; "and it will be observed that in the grazing counties the proportion of corn crops is as low as 10 per cent. and not higher than 33 per cent., but in the corn-growing counties the proportion of corn crops ranges between 33 and 55 per cent." (we quote from Mr. Fonblanque). And the remarkable thing is, that, excluding the four northern counties, and the North and West Riding of York, which are grazing districts, without exception the whole of the corn-growing counties lie to the eastward, and the whole of the grazing counties to the westward, of a line of division running north and south pretty nearly through the centre of England. The term grazing must be understood to apply to cattle, for the sheep are to be found on each side of the line in nearly equal numbers and in nearly the same proportion. We think very few would have selected Cornwall as the county having the greatest proportionate number of cattle to every 100 acres of cultivated land. It is a confirmation of Mr. Caird's principle of the westward counties being the proper grazing lands: for, as Cornwall is the westernmost county, so it has the largest herds. With sheep, however, the case is different; they are not wanted merely as converters of vegetable matter into flesh; they do this, but at the same time they have equal value as manure distributors; and thus it is not surprising to find that in Lincolnshire, that well-farmed county, there is the greatest absolute number, while in Kent, the very garden of England, there is the greatest number of sheep per 100 acres of cultivated land, except in Westmoreland, whose fragrant mountain pastures, alternating with its rich valleys, carry a fraction more than even Kent. Scotland cannot be taken into comparison, because there both sheep and cattle live on the mountains and moors, which are not reckoned in the acreage of the returns. For instance, while in Kent there are but 156·1 sheep per 100 acres of cultivated land, there are in Sutherland 957·4 sheep for the same quantity. However, in Sutherland, out of 1,207,188 acres, there are but 23,148 cultivated; while in Kent, out of 1,039,419 acres, there are 719,491 under cultivation. Notwithstanding the comparatively small acreage of the United Kingdom, there is a greater number of sheep in it than in any other European country of which returns are presented, except Russia, and even the United States do not come up to our figure. Other nations, however, possess more cattle and pigs than we can boast of.

The pig was not a favourite animal last year; "it is a kind of stock discouraged by the high prices of food, and there is a decrease in the number in 1868 compared with 1867 of 1,032,000 for the United Kingdom." It appears to be a very unpopular animal in Scotland, as there are only 139,000 in that kingdom against about two millions in England. Pigs are pretty evenly distributed in England, Suffolk having the most in proportion to its area, and the greatest number of any county; but Northumberland, Durham, and Westmoreland have very few; and Cumberland and Yorkshire, notwithstanding their reputation for hams, only just outstrip their neighbours. The number of pigs in Australia and all our Southern colonies is small, and appears by comparison with that of their sheep and oxen, even smaller than it really is. One reason is evidently that the warm climate throws great difficulty in the way of their conversion into bacon. The "hog" trade of the world is rightly settled in those regions of the United States where the summers are warm enough to grow maize to feed the pig, and the winters cold enough to cure him.

The high price of wheat, as a matter of course, induced our farmers to plant it largely; the total increase of acreage under that crop in the United Kingdom being 310,000 acres. This has been done at the expense of barley and green crops. Potatoes and oats have been more extensively grown than in 1867. It rather surprised us to observe that hops are to be found returned as a crop in twenty-nine English counties, and in four Welsh counties, and that even so far north as Aberdeen four acres were grown in 1867. Flax is distinguished for the first time in the returns of 1868. There are but 17,543 acres under this crop in Great Britain against 206,446 in Ireland. Yorkshire grows a third of the crop on this side of the Channel, and Scotland less than a tenth.

The tables which are added to the volume, containing a summary of the condition and results of agriculture in other countries and in our colonies, are most valuable. The only fear is that they may have the effect of bolstering up our national vanity; for, as a mere matter of figures, the general result seems to be that England, notwithstanding its well-abused climate, is, in proportion to its acreage, the most productive country in the world.

WINTER EXHIBITIONS.

"THE Institute of Painters in Water-Colours" opens its "third" Exhibition of pretended "sketches and studies." The Gallery presents a not unpleasing medley of drawings highly elaborate and pencillings excessively slight, of compositions pseudo-poetic and jottings fragmentary as notes in a student's sketch-book. It will readily be understood that the collection wants winnowing. If the tares could be gathered together for a general burning, the arts would indeed benefit. Such a consummation, however, can scarcely be brought about even in a metaphorical sense. Indeed, the fate of the Institute differs but little from that of the Academy and other Societies ruled by vested interests; all such bodies are of the nature of pocket boroughs. The prescriptive right of members to exhibit works, however inane, has become the bane of London Exhibitions. In tenderness names are usually withheld, and the critic naturally turns, as in the Gallery before us, to what is bright in the present and hopeful in the future. The Institute has wisely recruited strength from the ranks of youthful talent; and it is with pleasure that we recognise faithful students of nature among the recently-elected Associates and Members.

"The Triumph of Justice," by the late E. H. Wehnert, is curious as the last vestige of an extinct art, not to say of an extinct species of man. The figures swell and distort themselves as so many pre-Adamite river gods; the muscles seem to have been studied from Michael Angelo rather than from nature; the attitudes are far too heroic for the observance of good manners or minor proprieties, and the nether extremities, almost as a matter of course in spurious high art, become ostentatious of sans-culottism. As for poor harmless "Justice," she sits aloft as a school-girl rehearsing meekly her part in private theatricals. This "Study for a Cartoon at Westminster Hall" shows what was the sort of art fostered twenty years ago by a Royal Commission intent upon importing grand historic styles into England. "The Triumph of Justice" evidently lay beyond Mr. Wehnert's reach; a vigorously truthful study of an old woman, here also exhibited, indicates that the artist ought never to have forsaken actual nature for ideal creations. A like mistake has prejudiced the career of Mr. Edward Henry Corbould. Wehnert and Corbould entered into the Westminster competitions with ambition, and, after the lapse of more than twenty years, drawings here produced prove that ambition has been the bane of these artists. Mr. Corbould is proverbially clever but artificial, brilliant but meretricious; that he is happy in thought and ready in composition may be seen by "The Ladies of the Court of Rufus on their way to Castle Malwood"—an offhand sketch which to our mind has more worth than a cartload of overwrought drawings produced wholesale. Mr. Corbould's manipulation certainly is a marvel. Take, for instance, the armour in that astounding catastrophe the "Fall of James III. of Scotland"; how sharp is the touch, how keen the edge of the steel, how cold and bright the light which glances from the burnished surface! That this light cannot be accounted for, the painter does not care; a pictorial effect so dazzling was not to be lost simply because it might be contrary to actual fact. Assuredly the artist's productions have a stroke of genius beyond the reach of nature; they are too clever by half to be wholly true. An amusing illustration of the method whereby such dashing painters concoct compositions is found in the "ink sketch" of a certain "Marriage Ceremony" with choral service which provoked some talk at the time. We find in the list of marriages the following:—"At Westminster Abbey, by the Archbishop of York, assisted by the Dean of Westminster, H. Weigall, Esq., to Lady Rose Sophia Mary Fane, only daughter of the late and sister of the present Earl of Westmoreland." To this historic scene—worthy no doubt of a permanent place in art, not to say in the annals of the Abbey itself—Mr. Corbould has given appropriate éclat. Even the accessories have been set off with becoming pomp. The picture includes the large mosaic of the "Last Supper," together with Mr. Gilbert Scott's elaborate reredos, but unfortunately this stately background did not arrive at the Abbey till more than six months after the illustrious company had departed. The creative artist is naturally independent of the Clerk of the Works; he forthwith finishes the reredos by a wave of his pencil, and the picture thereby gains the distinguished merit of being finer than the scene depicted. Thus do clever artists embellish facts and improve upon history.

The artificial and stilted school shows at the Institute in uncommon force. Guido Bach certainly presents a favourable example of the academic manner in a masterly sketch, the "Monk Preaching to Sclavonians." Knowledge and command are certified by the drawing, grouping, and execution. It may be objected that another sketch doctored to fit the title "Idle Hours" is too obviously after the trick of groups of paid models dressed up and composed gracefully according to the routine of life academies and costume classes. Yet it is hard not to admire the artist's sense of beauty and grace in line. Guido Bach, in fact, stands almost alone in "treatment" and "style" as practised by the Italians and taught by Reynolds. It is astonishing how this kind of thing has of late gone out of fashion; and, be it observed, two solitary disciples of academic creeds—Guido Bach and Mr. Frederick Leighton, R.A.—owe less to English than to German traditions. Englishmen, for more reasons than one, cherish antipathy to all that comes from modern Germany. No gallery nowadays preserves so many hazy memories of an obsolete and worn-out ideal as the Institute; tenderness falls into indecision, and sentiment is compassed by a muddling touch. Even landscapes come dressed in pretty attire, and rustic figures have been walhed and polished for the carpet of the ____ room. Mr. Henry Warren, Mr. Henry Tidey, and Mr. Augustus ___vier have favourably as well as unfavourably become famous for styles indigenous to this Gallery. Mr. Warren has thrown over the shoulders of the "Woman of Samaria" academic drapery of approved symmetric folds; Mr. Tidey has made "Phœbe" pleasantly pretty; and Mr. Bouvier gains in chalk "designs" somewhat of Flaxman's grace of line and beauty of form.

"Studies in Chalk" are a good sign. These Winter Exhibitions unfortunately indicate that such hard honest work is exceptional, whereas schools strong in drawing have always studied form in black and white, and gained power of hand and precision of touch by use of the firm pencil instead of the flimsy brush. Worthy of all encouragement is the willingness which Mr. James Liston has shown to place on public view a couple of preliminary studies for pictures. That for "Giorgone"—a composition which some seasons since fixed the artist's position—is admirable for defined form, firm hand, and intelligent purpose. In a study for "Rejected" the artist has seized, with pointed pencil, upon character, in face, attitude, and costume; he lays hold on the essentials of his subject, and all that is minor he makes subordinate. Wholly different in quality is Mr. Jopling's "Pascuccia"; a drawing thus confident and yet careless, seeking effect yet indifferent to form, can answer no good end, save to indicate what conscientious students should shun. A slashing so-called "Sketch," by Mr. John Absolon, for a picture from the "Barber of Seville," falls under the same condemnation. At best it may be accepted as clever bravura; it would win a wager for most paint laid on in least time.

Genre is happily gaining ground on the pseudo high art of this Gallery. Among the most honest and truthful works in the room are studies from rustic life by Mr. C. Green, Mr. G. G. Kilburne, Mr. Andrew Gow, and Miss Emily Farmer. "A Girl Reading" is a considerable advance for Miss Farmer; though perhaps still the face is a little too smooth and pretty either for actual nature or honest art, yet really this is an exquisite little picture. Also Mr. Gow deserves to be remembered for a capital composition, "In Church"; the materials are well put together, the light and shade and colour have been managed with knowledge and tact. But drawings within the range of the simply naturalistic and domestic are necessarily so much of a muchness that description becomes tedious and criticism monotonous. We may note, however, the appearance of an artist, Mr. Valentine Bromley, who imparts to even so trite a theme as "Harmony" a new reading and complexion. This Music Party leaves much to be desired in workmanship, yet the attempt may be taken as a pleasing pledge of the growing practice whereby common everyday incidents receive elevation by colour, and reach the imagination through warm harmonies reflected from Venice.

The landscapes, like the figure-drawings, in the Institute are forced up for the market. Messrs. Rowbotham, Leitch, and Harry Johnson emulate the brilliance of chromolithographs, and gain the prettiness of tasteful vignettes. We must not, however, thus dismiss an impressive and poetic drawing by Mr. Harry Johnson, "The Skirts of a Pine Wood near Pisa." This composition is put together with method; the idea proves rare intuition for the dramatic element in nature. These shadowy pine trees form as it were a dark funereal procession, marching to meet troops of storm-clouds that hang on the sunset horizon. Far more scenic, and indeed absolutely meretricious, is "Moonlight," by Mr. W. Telbin. This artist knows well how remunerative is the trade in moonlights; often has his heart rejoiced when pit and gallery responded to the poetic appeal of chalk and water. The principle upon which this drawing has been manufactured is trite and well-nigh worn out. A white watery moon struggles to release herself from an inky cloud, and in so doing casts silver light upon sea and shore. Of course a torch is made to burn redly, as a complementary hue to the pallid moon. The picture is a muddy mixture of black and white, blue and red; the sentiment would seem so intense that anything like form or fact is deemed superfluous; in short, there is not a vessel on the shore that would prove sound and safe at sea. It is really too bad when a clever artist thus far presumes on his good name. As a relief let us turn to that painstaking student of nature, Mr. Edmund Warren. "April in the Forest of Dean" may recall a lovely picture of "Spring," by one of the younger Linnells; though somewhat dotty, it is at all events sparkling, and if opaque in paint it is certainly lucent in sunlight. Mr. Warren has adopted a style the very merits of which lie close upon defects. It is evident that infinitude of detail—scarcely less painful than marvellous—involves the artist in all but insuperable difficulties. Thick body colour clogs the brush so that, freedom of execution becoming impossible, the touch hangs fire. Thus, in a study made in the "Avenue at Wootton," the botched leaves do not poise lightly on the stems, nor does the sky, when painted solidly as enamel after the trees, gain atmosphere. Yet we frankly admit that much credit is due to Mr. Warren; his success in the use of stipple for transparent washes has been greater than could have been anticipated, but the difficulties and disabilities involved will deter other artists from adopting a method which fails to yield results commensurate with the labour.

The transit from the Institute to the neighbouring Pall Mall Gallery is easy. In the former are Mr. Charles Vacher's warm washes for Southern sunlight, and Carl Werner's "Coffee-house in Cairo," realistic as a photograph in its texture of stone surface. We pass to the Pall Mall Gallery to enjoy once more Mr. Elijah Walton's feverish yet feeble reveries. On entering we gladly re- that this poetic and ambitious artist has been in the way [illegible]ovement since the days when he covered acres of canvas with white, blue, pink, and lilac, and thus acquired the reputation, at least among the Alpine Club, of being the only man who could paint the Alps. There is here a small drawing of the "Dent du Midi," which has less than usual violence of contrast between white and black, less of blue smoky mists, less of cast-iron rocks, less of wide wastes of unmitigated white, and, instead, more of delicate articulation in mountain, and of light filagree in snow; more of half tones as relief to hardness, and as the means whereby to express far-stretching distance, atmosphere, and the gradations of space. This enterprising artist has taken a happy hint from birds of passage; he migrates with change of season; he spends his summers among the cool Alps, his winters on the warm banks of the Nile or of the Red Sea. In these Scripture lands Mr. Walton paints as the patriarchs lived—in tents. And some praiseworthy results of recent journeyings in the track of the children of Israel may be seen in a series of drawings, true even to timidity, made around the mountain group of Sinai. The artist gains colour, light, detail; but, as usual, he lacks breadth, and consequent power and grandeur. The mountain whence the Law was given amid thunder becomes, under Mr. Walton's hand, a molehill backed by a serene sky.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

EIGHT new performances have already taken place in St. James's Hall, and with a result showing that the Monday Popular Concerts stand higher than ever in public estimation. This is no more than just, when we bear in mind the spirit and intelligence with which they are conducted. Without the fanfaronnade and self-glorification to which we have for so many years been accustomed in other quarters, Mr. S. Arthur Chappell succeeds in making the world believe that his entertainments are, of their kind, the best of the best. And such is really the case. Nothing that is meretricious has any part in them. They are not concerts for the egotistical display of "virtuosity"—the most detestable things imaginable—but quite the opposite. The greatest and most genuine executive artists, it is true, evening after evening appear; but these are the very artists who think least of themselves and most of what they have to play—Joachim, Arabella Goddard, Charles Hallé, Piatti, &c., representative artists in a sphere of activity where music, as music, is the primary consideration. All this, however, has been for a long time acknowledged, and the foundation of the Monday Popular Concerts rests on a solid basis. The general wish is that they may continue to prosper as they have hitherto prospered, and to earn success by the same legitimate means. The quartets and sonatas of the great composers, at one period, were confined exclusively to the few; they are now, thanks to the enterprise of Messrs. Chappell, open to the many; and it is pleasant to think how thoroughly the many are able to comprehend and appreciate them.

The concerts which take place before Christmas are something like what the ante-Easter season used to be in the most brilliant days of Her Majesty's Theatre, when Mr. Lumley was at its head, and the Grisis, Persianis, Rubinis, Lablaches, Marios, and Tamburinis only came with the summer. Mr. Arthur Chappell has, however, at command a library of music fairly inexhaustible, and, the necessary changes in the leader allowed for, a first-rate quartet. More than this, in Signor Piatti, the most accomplished violoncellist within the memory of the actual generation, and probably as admirable a quartet player as ever lived, he has an instrumental "Lablache" to serve him on all occasions. We need scarcely dwell upon the enormous significance of the bass in a quartet. It is, in fact, not less important than the leading violin itself; and now that Signor Piatti is at the violoncello desk both before and after Christmas, the most favourable opportunity is secured to every "first fiddle" who may chance to be engaged. Happily the leaders of quartets in the early part of the present (the eleventh) season were performers of the right stamp. M. Sainton appeared at the first two concerts, Herr Ludwig Straus at the three others—the posts of second violin and viola being assigned, as in former years, to Herr Louis Ries and Mr. Henry Blagrove. The quartets in which M. Sainton took part were the D major of Mendelssohn (No. 1, op. 44), and the two movements—andante (in E), and scherzo (in A minor)—found among the posthumous papers of that great musician, and (which, we need scarcely say, is mere conjecture) supposed to have been intended by him as component parts of a new work of the kind. Both these being already known at the Monday Popular Concerts, it is enough to add that the impression created by the scherzo of the last, than which a more genuine Mendelssohnian scherzo could not be cited, was as lively as ever. M. Sainton entered freely into the spirit of it, and the audience insisted upon hearing it again. Herr Straus led two quartets by Haydn (in C and G minor), and Schubert's quartet in G, "op. 161." The more of Haydn the better; his music sounds well, no matter what may precede and follow it; it makes one in love with existence, so strongly does it convey the sense of pure enjoyment which mere physical life afforded the genial old composer. The G minor quartet was heard for the first time in St. James's Hall, and Herr Straus should be thanked for introducing it. With Haydn, nevertheless, he was pretty certain of success; for, in all likelihood, there is not extant a series of works of more generally equal merit than the more important among the eighty-three string quartets of that very prolific master. Herr Straus's experiment with Schubert, however, was more hazardous. The quartet in G major is very long, very laboured, and very difficult (if not impossible) to understand, or even half understand, at a single hearing. Those familiar with all that is accessible of Schubert's music are aware that this quartet is ranked by his admirers with the much better known one in D minor, and the string quintet in C major * —its only rivals, excepting the great symphony in C, the pianoforte trios, and some pianoforte sonatas, in prodigality of invention and charming indifference to "order." It may be that the G major quartet is not only equal but even superior to its companion in D minor—produced in the same year, 1826. At any rate it was written off in ten days ("Innerhalb zehn Tagen hat Schubert einer seinen schönsten Compositionen hingezaubert"—says his German biographer); and many a composer has laboured for ten years without, in the whole course of those ten years, producing a tenth part of the melody, to speak of nothing else, which, in ten days, came to Schubert. We may add that the quartet was finely played by Herr Straus and his associates, and that its early reappearance at the Monday Popular Concerts is but a question of expediency. M. Sainton and Herr Straus, in the course of their respective engagements as leading violin, each brought forward a specimen of the fiddle music of the early part of the last century, M. Sainton selecting a sonata in G, by Porpora (Haydn's first master), and Herr Straus a sonata in D, by Corelli. Both these "effigies rerum" (as Vanini might have termed them) enjoyed every advantage that excellent playing could give; but neither, we think, is likely to be asked for again with enthusiasm. In the way of pianoforte playing that erudite and laborious professor, Herr Ernst Pauer, at the first three concerts, gave, in his best manner, performances of sonatas from Beethoven, Mozart, and Weber (all well known), besides joining M. Sainton in Dussek's charming sonata in B flat, happily unearthed by Mr. Chappell, and taking part in sundry concerted works—among the last being Hummel's Septet for pianoforte with string and wind instruments, a well-worn, but never unwelcome, because always imposing show-piece. At the fourth concert the pianist was Mr. John Francis Barnett, who played Beethoven's long and difficult sonata in C major, op. 53 (dedicated to Count Waldstein), without book; and at the fifth, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, an extremely clever young artist, celebrated her début at the Monday Popular Concerts by a spirited execution of Mendelssohn's early sonata in E, which some of our contemporaries confounded with the sonata in B flat, one of the recent posthumous publications. Miss Zimmermann, who was received with great favour, also played, with Signor Piatti, Beethoven's sonata in A, for pianoforte and violoncello, the third and best of the five written by the composer of Fidelio for those instruments in combination. Add to the foregoing two performances of Beethoven's famous Septet for string and wind instruments, one of Mozart's Quintet in A, with Mr. Lazarus as clarinet, with one of Schubert's very remarkable Ottet in F, equally for "string" and "wind," and we have recorded pretty well all that it is necessary to record about Mr. Chappell's ante-Christmas season. The Ottet of Schubert has been from the first a favourite at the Monday Popular Concerts, and would seem almost to have eclipsed the still greater Ottet of Mendelssohn, not to mention the double-quartets of Spohr, once so much in vogue, now apparently ignored at St. James's Hall. But Schubert is just at present the rage, alike in St. James's Hall and the Crystal Palace; and what it behoves us most to be careful of is not to spoil him. He is so amiable, so tender, so winning, so exuberantly tuneful, and at times so irresistibly eloquent, that we are tempted to pass over his shortcomings, and to forget the veneration we owe to the greatest masters, in awarding him a place side by side with them, knowing, at the same time, that his art was very inferior to his genius, and pardoning him, perhaps, because knowing equally well the precise cause of his inferiority—the want of that indispensable education which, only just at the last moment, Schubert had determined upon acquiring through the instructions of Sechter, one of the dryest and most pedantic of all musicians, who would have been emphatically to Schubert what Albrechtsberger was, more or less, to Beethoven—a clog and an impediment. Well may Schubert's biographer (Kreissle, p. 451) speak of the idea of his hero and Sechter "in gemeinschaftliche musikalische Arbeit vertieft" as something almost impossible to realize.

The return of Herr Joachim, whose yearly visit is now the most interesting event of the London musical season, has, if possible, caused greater excitement than at any former period. After playing at intervals, from the time when, as a mere child (in 1844), he first appeared, recommended by Mendelssohn, in Mendelssohn's most heartfelt language, with Beethoven's concerto, at the Philharmonic Concerts, and was at once proclaimed, and justly proclaimed, a prodigy, till now, when his annual appearance at the Monday Popular Concerts (an institution of which Mendelssohn could never have dreamed) is looked forward to as a sine quâ non, delighting us every time, and forcing us to say that he always plays better than he played before, Herr Joachim may fairly claim exemption from the criticism which artists less endowed may reasonably expect. Without being hero-worshippers, we feel real pleasure in giving expression to a truth with which, time out of mind, we have been deeply impressed—that Herr Joachim is beyond comparison the very greatest master of his instrument since Paganini, and as a master of his instrument wishing to make that instrument subservient to the highest ends of art very far superior to Paganini. A lover of display—like Franz Liszt, the pianist, for example (a dozen Rubinsteins and Tausigs in one), or Paganini himself—on such an occasion as that of his first appearance before a London public, would have induced the director of the concert at which he was to appear so to arrange the programme that the "virtuoso" should be all in all and the music nothing. But Herr Joachim is made of different stuff. Not only did he abstain from any "solo" exhibition whatever, but he selected for his "rentrée" (we must use a French term) one of those divine quartets by Mozart, and another of those divine quartets by Haydn, in which the music itself is the sole passport to distinction, and the only way to shine is to shine through its influence—the great quartet in C of Mozart, and the best of Haydn's quartets in the key of B flat. And how Herr Joachim played in them we shall no more attempt to describe than we shall attempt to describe the extraordinary enthusiasm with which he was received, by an audience that crowded St. James's Hall in every part. But the quartets were not the only performances of Herr Joachim. He also played, with Madame Arabella Goddard, the last, the most original, and the most beautiful, of the ten sonatas composed by Beethoven for pianoforte and violin—the one in G, op. 96. So perfectly was this executed, by both artists—and no two artists were ever better matched, Madame Goddard being not less consummate a mistress of her instrument than Herr Joachim of his—that the audience, charmed alike by the music and the performance, called them back twice in succession at the end. Not the least remarkable feature of this interesting concert was Madame Goddard's performance of Schubert's solo sonata in D, one of the three before which Schumann—who, had he possessed Schubert's genius, might have been greater than Schubert—was lost in admiration. Here again came forth the irrepressible musical hero of the time; and here, let us own, he came with a power not to be denied. This sonata in D is, in its way, a prodigy. Each movement has a character apart—the impetuous first allegro, that seems to go wherever it lists, and yet always to be right; the slow movement, which, with what Schumann would have called "its heavenly length," seems as if it can never come to an end; the scherzo, so energetic and bold, varied by a trio so melodious and expressive; and the final rondo, depicting pastoral life as graphically as the last movement of Beethoven's so-called "Pastoral Sonata"—are one and all, if originality and imagination count for anything, masterpieces. They are diffuse, no doubt; but Schubert was almost invariably diffuse. Happy he who can be thus diffuse, and yet never bore. Madame Goddard's performance of this sonata was what might have been expected from one who, independently of natural genius, never comes into public with any great work—and no pianist has a more extensive repertory at command—without such preparation as secures a faultless execution of it in all its parts. Success could not have been more complete or more legitimate than hers on this occasion.

Herr Joachim's two other appearances have been no less interesting than his first. At the second he led Cherubini's fine quartet in E flat, first of the only three works of the kind known to have proceeded from the composer of Medea, Les Deux Journées, Faniska, and other dramatic masterpieces, not to speak of church music that few but the highest masters have equalled—that illustrious Florentine whom Schumann compared with Dante. This quartet, for the resuscitation of which we are indebted to the spirit of research which has ever distinguished the Monday Popular Concerts, is now readily admitted into the charmed circle hitherto filled up by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn, an occasional corner being grudgingly awarded to Spohr. So—not long hence, it is to be hoped—may be admitted its fellow-quartets in D minor and C major. Cherubini is one of the few really grand musicians; and whatever he wrote merits consideration and respect. Herr Joachim has also introduced, for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts, Mozart's most graceful quartet in B flat, one of the three written expressly for the Court at Berlin, where there was a violoncello player after the com-

D, already mentioned, is the first. Here again one of the most thoroughly Mendelssohnian of the Mendelssohn family of "scherzi" produced its accustomed effect, being rapturously encored. But, perhaps, that for which we have to thank the great Hungarian violinist most heartily is his making the general public acquainted with J. S. Bach's masterly violin concerto in A minor, which he played at the most recent concert—with accompaniment of double string quartet, an accompaniment quite strong enough for Bach's music—in a style as perfect as Bach himself could possibly have contemplated. That Herr Joachim knew his audience was proved by the result. No work has been more earnestly welcomed since the Monday Popular Concerts were instituted; and never was a more unanimous "encore" awarded to any piece of music than that which followed the finale of Bach's concerto—a finale in nine-eight measure, with a theme in the "gigue" style, of which Bach and Handel have left so many vigorous examples, but considerably developed, so as to distinguish it from the ordinary dance movements often met with at the end of their suites de pièces. The next thing Herr Joachim must do is to produce the double violin concerto, with accompaniments, by the same composer. We would cheerfully be responsible for its success.

At this same concert Mr. Charles Hallé made his first appearance

* Composed in 1828—which Mr. A. D. Coleridge, in his recently published translation of Dr. Heinrich Kreissle von Hellborn's cumbrous book, Franz Schubert, once in his Catalogue and once in the body of the work (vol. ii. p. 78), mistakes for a quartet—doubtlessly misled by a misprint in the original German (p. 392).

for the season, playing Schubert's pianoforte sonata in A major (which he had already played in St. James's Hall), with that wonderful accuracy and neatness for which he has been famous ever since, in 1843, he first paid England the honour of a visit. This work is one of the three sonatas Schubert intended to dedicate to Hummel, but which, Schubert dying, his Vienna publisher, Diabelli, inscribed to Schumann (then an influential musical critic), and which Schumann could never be made to believe were Schubert's last. Their comparative inferiority to the three with which Schumann was so captivated easily accounts for his incredulity; and we are inclined to share his doubt as to the actual date of their composition. Mr. Hallé also joined Herr Joachim in Beethoven's duet-sonata, in G major, Op. 30—a capital performance on both hands.

The vocal music at the Monday Popular Concerts, compared with the instrumental, is naturally of subordinate interest; nevertheless, it is a treat to hear Schubert's exquisite Lieder from the lips of Miss Edith Wynne—"The Young Nun" especially, which she gives in perfection. Both she and Miss Annie Edmonds have afforded real satisfaction in songs by Mr. Arthur Sullivan and Mr. Benedict—as usual, the accompanist sans pareil; while Miss Cecilia Westbrook, Miss Emily Spiller, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Madame Sainton-Dolby (whose rival as a classical contralto we have yet to find), have also appeared from time to time.

The Saturday Afternoon Concerts begin to-day, when Herr Joachim is to lead Mozart's incomparable quintet in G minor—a piece so marvellously chaste and beautiful that, remembering there is a Wagner now, as there was a Vogler in Mozart's time, one might imagine it to have been written as much out of hatred for that which sins against art as out of love for that which worships it:—

Oderunt peccare boni virtutis amore.

At the concert on Monday night, Madame Goddard is to play a sonata by Dussek, in England known as Plus Ultra, in France and elsewhere as Le Retour à Paris, but which does not depend upon its name for its beauty. It is some years since this fine work was heard; and no admirers of what is genuine—more particularly those who are aware how much Dussek did, and how scant acknowledgment he has received—will regret to hear it once more. To the Monday Popular Concerts we may almost be said to be indebted for the rescue of this genial composer's music from oblivion—or, at any rate, from something very near it.

REVIEWS.

LIFE OF BISHOP ATTERBURY.*

THESE are weary volumes to get through, all the wearier because it is a good subject spoiled, and because the author seems to have had good opportunities, if he had only known how to make use of them. But what can we look for from a writer who evidently thinks that the present Master of the Rolls is Sir Samuel Romilly? At least we can get no other meaning out of the following sentence in Mr. Williams' preface:—

> In the year 1847, Mr. J. H. Glover, then Her Majesty's Librarian, was permitted to publish a volume of the Bishop's correspondence while the latter was in the service of the nominal "James III." It is much to be lamented that this task was not given to one of the able editors of the State Papers, that were published under the superintendence of Sir Samuel Romilly, the Editor's loyalty apparently having caused him to practise an amount of reticence respecting the Jacobite author of the letters, likely to be far from satisfactory to the historical student. Nevertheless, the volume, though awkwardly arranged and most perplexingly illustrated, is extremely valuable for the broad light it throws on the administrative career of one of the most distinguished statesmen of his time.

Mr. Williams expresses himself throughout his preface in this dark kind of way, not making it quite certain whether he really has had access to unpublished materials or not. But, as he tells us that his publishers have lately bought some of the Bishop's papers which were preserved by his descendants, we suppose that he has. But in any case Mr. Williams has very little idea indeed how to make use of materials of any kind. A colection of letters, with just commentary enough to make their dates and allusions intelligible, is a most legitimate piece of editing; but then it is hardly a narrative; it is hardly a book to be read straight through. A narrative biography, on the other hand, may often, if it is judiciously managed, have letters scattered through it; but it is a thing which must be judiciously managed. Now Mr. Williams, in his first volume, attempts a narrative, such as it is; in the greater part of his second volume we can hardly say that he attempts any narrative at all. It is simply a collection of letters, with mere narrative tags between them. This is always a vexatious arrangement, even if the narrative paragraphs are as brilliant as may be; but it is specially vexatious when they are so dully and poorly put together as they are by Mr. Williams. No story more needs some little art of composition to be bestowed upon it, to make it interesting or even intelligible, than the story with which the second volume deals—the story of the petty and yet complicated intrigues of the sham Court and sham Cabinet of the Pretender. When we are shifted about from one place to another place, and from one man to another man, how we long for Lord Macaulay's power of setting every man and every place clearly before us! In Mr. Williams' hands all is dull confusion; we know not where we are or with whom we are dealing; the chief impression which we carry away is regret at seeing powers like those of Atterbury frittered away in such utterly contemptible intrigues. In the first volume, the "notices of the distinguished contemporaries," which, if skilfully managed, might have added much to the interest of the work, are so contrived as to bring in only another element of confusion. Instead of being worked into their proper relation to Atterbury and to one another, they are shovelled in higgledy-piggledy, so as sometimes to read, if it be not a bull, like a Biographical Dictionary without any alphabetical arrangement. The style is poor throughout, and not always intelligible, and the poverty of style is accompanied by equal poverty of idea. Everything is touched upon lightly and weakly; nothing is ever thoroughly grasped or done justice to; and while Mr. Williams nowhere displays a particle of real humour, we are ever and anon offended by artificial attempts at wit of the poorest kind. We suppose, for instance, that he somehow thinks it funny to say that Lewis Atterbury, the Bishop's father, "on March 1st, 1651, permitted himself to be created M.A. by dispensation from the very remarkable Chancellor of the University, Oliver Cromwell." We suppose too that there is some hidden wit, though we are too dull to see it, in Mr. Williams' way of going on constantly to talk about "the Rev. Lewis Atterbury" and "the rev. gentleman." Mr. Williams seems somehow to be as much amused at his hero's father being a clergyman as a biographer of Burke whom we remember was at his hero's father being an attorney. It was thought amazingly clever always to talk about the elder Burke as "Mr. Burke, attorney-at-law." We do not see the cause of the merriment in either case, unless Mr. Williams means a sarcasm upon the elder Atterbury for being not only a clergyman, but a clergyman of the school of the Vicar of Bray—one thing under Cromwell and another under Charles the Second. This he certainly was; but how the fact is set forth by always speaking of him as "the Rev." we really do not see.

Let us now look a little more minutely into Mr. Williams' qualifications for dealing with the times with which he has undertaken to deal. Let us see what he makes of the most familiar facts in the history of those times. There is one thing, however, slightly in Mr. Williams' favour, that he is one of those writers in whom it is hard to distinguish between actual ignorance and a mere dull way of writing. It is hard to say whether he really does not know things or whether he simply cannot put his thoughts into intelligible English. Mr. Williams is, in his second chapter, talking, in his confused way, about various things which happened in the reign of James the Second. After saying something about Obadiah Walker, John Locke, and others, he suddenly stumbles upon Rabbi Smith:—

> Dr. Thomas Smith, one of the Fellows of Magdalen College, has left a detailed account of the proceedings of the King, Lord Sunderland, who had turned Papist, and Father Petre, the King's principal adviser. The Doctor, who was an eminent scholar and divine, had declined the Presidency of his college, in consequence of certain conditions attached to his acceptance of that dignity; and when required to acknowledge the Bishop of Oxford as President, he also acknowledged the King's supremacy "out of a principle of conscience and loyalty, as becomes a priest of the Catholic and Apostolic Church of England." He appears to have been much consulted during the whole affair, nevertheless did not gain favour from either party.

To talk of "the Bishop of Oxford," without adding his name, is just one of the careless sort of ways in which writers like Mr. Williams indulge. But, more than this, one would fancy from this passage that, when Mr. Williams wrote it, he had never heard of Farmer and Hough at all. And the fact that Smith was offered the Presidency on any terms was new to us. We have not hunted up the matter, but, if Mr. Williams, who quotes no authority, is right, Lord Macaulay is wrong.

But, two pages on, Mr. Williams does quote an authority; at least he refers to Lord Macaulay himself. By this time he has heard both of Farmer and of Hough, but he does not seem to know that the story which he is now telling has anything to do with the story which he was telling just before. Mr. Williams' account is worth comparing with Lord Macaulay's:—

> The crowning insult came in the King's appointment of an apostate scamp, named Farmer, as President of Magdalen College; nevertheless the Fellows exercised their privilege, and elected an excellent divine, Dr. Hough. The High Commissioner deprived him; but the unfitness of Farmer was so notorious, that Jeffreys could not contend against it, and when the Fellows respectfully, but firmly, insisted on the legality of the election made by them—in a letter addressed to the Earl of Sunderland, to which were appended the signatures of the Duke of Ormond, and the Earls of Halifax, Nottingham, and Danby—even the headstrong James hesitated as to taking coercive measures to support his second nomination. He visited Oxford, and endeavoured to force the election of the Bishop of Oxford by threats. This also proving ineffectual, Penn, the Quaker, was induced to attempt to cajole the refractory Fellows, but did not succeed, and his proceedings have drawn severe censure upon his memory.

Not very long after Mr. Williams goes on to give us, as a sort of obiter dictum, his sketch of the history of the Revolution:—

> It is impossible to exaggerate the interest Francis Atterbury took in the Romanizing proceedings at Oxford, as well as in those which followed when the scene was removed to London. The incarceration of the Seven Bishops, one of whom was an "Old Westminster," Sir Jonathan Trelawney, greatly increased his excitement, which did not abate in the University when it became known that the prelates of the Anglican Church had joined in sending an invitation to William of Orange. The Protestant champion came, and clerical excitement was at fever heat; the Popish oppressor fled, and a frenzy of congratulation seized upon the members of the rescued Church.

* Memoirs and Correspondence of Francis Atterbury, D.D., Bishop of Rochester, with Notices of his Distinguished Contemporaries. Compiled, chiefly from the Atterbury and Stuart Papers, by Folkestone Williams. 2 vols. London: W. H. Allen & Co. 1869.

The passage marked in Italics is indeed news. It is wonderful to find any man multiplying the one Bishop Compton into "the prelates of the Anglican Church"; but it is still more amazing to find a man doing so who, we presume, has heard of the memorable passings of question and answer between Bishop Compton and James the Second. Lord Macaulay wrote twenty years ago, and we suspect that many people have by this time forgotten him. But Mr. Williams refers to him; so he has no excuse.

The account of Creech, a contemporary of Atterbury's at Oxford, or rather the account of the Latin poet whom he translated, strikes us as not a little funny:—

> His Lucretius was printed at Oxford in the year 1682, and Thomas Brown, a student of Christ Church, Dryden, Waller, and other distinguished authors, added complimentary verses. The work was subsequently severely attacked for its irreligious tendency, though it had been partly translated by John Evelyn. Nevertheless, this translation was much admired.

Mr. Williams goes on to tell us how Creech, twenty years after, killed himself, "owing, it has been reported, to his having been jilted by a girl to whom he was attached; but," continues Mr. Williams, "as he was a little over forty at this time, a disappointment of this nature was not likely to affect him so severely." Mr. Williams perhaps somewhat over-estimates the philosophy of men a little over forty, but perhaps a translator of Lucretius was bound to be more philosophical than other people. Atterbury himself was not tried in the same way, as he married when he was twenty-four. In 1687 "he had taken a wife—a young lady of considerable personal attractions [has Mr. Williams been in the habit of writing police reports?], and a fortune of 7,000*l*. Miss Katherine Osborn," he goes on, "was believed to be a natural daughter of Sir Thomas Osborn, and had resided in the neighbourhood of the University." Now is this Sir Thomas Osborn the famous Sir Thomas Osborn better known as Earl of Danby, Marquess of Carmarthen, and Duke of Leeds? If so, should not Mr. Williams have told us? And if he is some more obscure Sir Thomas Osborn, should not Mr. Williams have told us this also?

One is a little amused (vol. i. p. 63) to hear of the "unassuming virtues" of Prince George of Denmark, but the following piece of chronology is more remarkable:—

> The royal sisters were specially charmed with him [Atterbury]; and after he had preached before the House of Commons in 1701—when he included in his masterly review of our Constitution in Church and State, his well merited eulogium on the Prince to whom the nation was indebted for its preservation—though others were removed from the post of chaplain after Queen Mary's death, he was retained.

It is clear that Mr. Williams thinks that Queen Mary died at some time later than 1701. A few pages on we are startled by the mention of "Sir John Trevor, almost as intelligent a Master of the Rolls as Sir John Romilly." Mr. Williams is clearly one of those who, in Lord Lindsay's phrase, progress by antagonism. A book is commonly written before its preface; so it seems that when Mr. Williams wrote his book, though he did not know that Lord Romilly was a peer, he at any rate knew his Christian name, but in getting backwards to his preface he got a step further still from the right thing, and had learned to confound Sir John and Sir Samuel. A page or two further on, after the passage which we last quoted, Mr. Williams, forgetting, after the manner of loose and inaccurate writers, what he had himself just before written, talks of "the Master of the Rolls, Sir John Trevor," as if he had never heard of him before. Now to be compared to Sir John Trevor is no great compliment for Lord Romilly, or for anybody else. Mr. Williams cautiously confines the comparison to the intelligence of Sir John Trevor, and says nothing about his honesty. Perhaps Sir John got improved in this last respect by listening to Atterbury's sermons. At any rate, we hope Mr. Williams will not attempt to do honour to any living Speaker of the House of Commons by likening him to Sir John Trevor.

Mr. Williams, who is thus unlucky with Trevor, makes an equal hash with Sacheverell. He clearly has no notion that the famous Doctor was impeached by the House of Commons and tried by the House of Lords. "Dr. Sacheverell," he tells us, "was prosecuted, and forced to stand a public trial." Presently we read, "Sacheverell was condemned by the court that tried him." If Mr. Williams knew by what court Sacheverell was tried, he has done himself great injustice in his manner of expressing himself. And yet he had just before spoken incidentally of Sacheverell "appealing to the sense of justice of the Lords temporal and spiritual [the order is Mr. Williams'] whom he was addressing;" and presently after he quotes Lord Halifax's "Seasonable Questions," in which Sacheverell is distinctly spoken of as "convicted by the High Court of Parliament." Meanwhile Mr. Williams tells us that "the Sacheverell fever had to be kept up, and the Doctor was now induced to make a journey into Wales that led to frantic demonstrations of devotion to the endangered Church in every town through which he passed." Now, why should Sacheverell, in order to produce frantic demonstrations, have made so long a journey as into Wales? Mr. Williams leaves this unexplained. But Sacheverell had a very practical reason for his progress. He went to be inducted to a living to which an admirer had just presented him.

These are fair specimens of the kind of writing of which we complain, in which, as we said, it is hard to say how much is ignorance, how much is mere incapacity for composition. But it is too bad to spoil the story of "Dearly beloved Roger," and to translate it to Saint Patrick's Cathedral. This is what we presume that Mr. Williams means in the following somewhat mysterious passage (i. 181):—

> Swift at last contrived to obtain an acknowledgment of his merits from the Government, and was preferred to the Deanery of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, where the smallness of his congregation induced him to risk a well-known change in the service.

Surely the "well-known change" took place in one of the country churches which Swift held before he became Dean; and was not the faithful Roger his parish clerk?

And now for a few words about Atterbury himself. He deserves a better biographer than Mr. Williams. Mr. Williams seems equally unable to deal with either the praiseworthy or the blameworthy portions of his character. Atterbury had many good and great qualities. No one can doubt his eloquence, his capacity for affairs, or his love of letters. He appears everywhere as excellent and amiable in all private relations, and conscientious in the discharge of his ecclesiastical functions. His correspondence with his daughter and son-in-law during his exile is interesting and touching, and few scenes can be fancied more pathetic than his meeting with his dying daughter, barely in time to exchange their farewell greetings and to administer the rites of the Church. Some of his letters with regard to the disposal of ecclesiastical preferment do him honour, especially his constant refusal to collate his brother to the Archdeaconry of his diocese. His long friendship with Pope is equally honourable to both parties. We may, if we please, condemn the proceeding which sentenced him to banishment and deprivation, not by any process of law, but by a special legislative act. Bills of pains and penalties call for some special justification only one degree less loudly than bills of attainder. But Mr. Williams has really no right to talk of the Government of George and Walpole as a "tyranny more brutal than that of the Stuarts." Any one of the four Stuart Kings would have thought it a rather mild sentence which stopped at banishment and loss of ecclesiastical preferment, and spared life, limb, and private property. And the conduct of Atterbury after his banishment is the truest justification of his banishment. He at once became a confidant and minister of the Pretender, and did not scruple to share in the basest of all intrigues—intrigues for the invasion of England by a foreign force. The Jacobites—or, as Mr. Williams sometimes amusingly calls them, the Jacobins—were ready to ransack Europe for any one, Frenchman, Spaniard, Swede, or Russian, who gave them the least hope of helping to restore the Stuarts by an invading force. Now for rebellion against this or that government a great deal often may be said, but nothing can be said for conduct like this, direct treason against one's country. Mr. Williams tries in vain to palliate the conduct of Atterbury by enlarging on the demerits of Walpole and George the First. Now really this line of argument is utterly off the point, and, after all, though George the First was certainly not a King to call forth any very fervent loyalty, he was at any rate quite as good as James the Third. Atterbury in short soon found out what a poor creature it was for whom he had sacrificed itself, and the latest period of his life, when his correspondence becomes almost wholly domestic, is a bright contrast to the days when he was the centre of plots which disturbed the whole of Europe. Mr. Williams says:—

> The grossest misrepresentations have been published of Bishop Atterbury's motives in embracing the cause of the son of James II.; there is very little doubt, however, that it was the necessary result of his position. By every consistent promoter of High Church principles James III. must have been regarded as his legitimate monarch. It had been found impossible to reconcile a large number of excellent clergymen of the Church of England to a departure from the recognised law of hereditary succession in favour of William and Mary, notwithstanding the evidence James II. had afforded them of his intention to subvert the Establishment. The son of James had given the strongest assurances of his respect for their faith, and they could not deny his claim to the throne of his ancestors.

It is hard to say what "High Church principles" are, but nothing is more certain than that the doctrine of an hereditary right to the Crown, transcending the power of Parliament to dispose of the Crown, would, in the days of Elizabeth, have been looked on as treasonable. In fact the whole doctrine was got up for the convenience of the Stuart dynasty, a dynasty which might represent William and Cerdic and Brute himself, but which, reigning in the teeth of an Act of Parliament, might, far more truly than any dynasty before or since, be called a dynasty of usurpers. Mr. Williams' Jacobitism is a thing quite out of date, a thing peculiar to a single age, which would have seemed as unintelligible in earlier times as it does now. And after all, Mr. Williams' Jacobitism is of a very old kind, for he tells us, seemingly without a sneer, that the death of William the Third was no less "edifying" than his life.

AMERICAN PHOTOGRAPHS OF ENGLAND.*

THERE is a great pleasure in occasionally realizing the poetical aspiration of "seeing ourselves as others see us." However much modesty they may affect, most men thoroughly enjoy having their photographs taken, and there are few who are altogether above the weakness of gazing affectionately at a looking-glass. The truth holds good of nations as of individuals, and thus the volume of literary "photographs" before us endeavours to gratify what is at least a natural taste. Its author, Mr. Fiske, speaks with due modesty of his performance, and anticipates the possible criticism that his book is painfully incomplete. The criticism would surely be unreasonable, for no one can expect a complete picture of England in fifteen short magazine articles. He seems to claim a hearing, however, on two grounds—first, on the very reasonable ground that he has written in a spirit at once frank and friendly—a claim which we are very happy to admit; secondly, on the much less reasonable ground that his book is dedicated to Mr. Charles Dickens, and "has been thought not unworthy of the editorial supervision of Mr. Edmund Yates." This, he says, proves that his "observations have included some of the best representatives of English character." In a preface a man may be pardoned for speaking after the manner of prefaces. In colder blood Mr. Fiske would probably admit that a good deal of trash has in all probability been dedicated to so distinguished a man as Mr. Dickens, for much of which he would be sorry to answer; and we fear that Mr. Yates's editorial labours have frequently been exerted upon matter which is certainly not worth publishing twice.

Coming to the substance of Mr. Fiske's descriptions, we may at once say that he has very fairly hit the mark at which he aimed. It was not a very ambitious mark; he has not sought to be a political and social philosopher, to predict the future of the British constitution, to sum up the statistics of English commerce, or to appreciate the schools of thought represented in our literature. He has equally avoided the sin which most easily besets travellers from the two countries—that of ludicrous exaggeration of their peculiarities. To judge from most books of a similar kind, the English or American traveller expects to find his cousins to be, not men, but grotesque monsters, differing in everything but external form from the normal type of humanity. Mr. Fiske has simply moved about with his eyes open, chiefly it would seem in London, and describes men and manners in a lively style, and with a general accuracy which speaks well for his powers of observation. It is true that he seems to have come with some of the old prejudices about him. He could not but think it rather odd that English lords walked about in the ordinary dress of the period, instead of being covered with gold lace, and girt with diamond-hilted swords. The lord has not even got a ribbon in his button-hole, as Mr. Fiske declares; and "a real republican feels almost injured or defrauded when he sees men of rank in ordinary attire." However, it is suggested that the said republicans may find consolation by attending at some public dinner where noblemen wear their stars and collars, or by being presented at Court—a suggestion for which we fear that Mr. Reverdy Johnson will scarcely be grateful. On his first landing, indeed, Mr. Fiske was a good deal taken aback by the unexpected civility of the islanders. One gentleman in a railway carriage offered him a light for his cigar, and another asked him for a newspaper. Nay, these Britons actually passed round whisky and sherry and water, got up a general conversation, and even indulged in some mild chaff directed at the foreigner. Now it is an article of faith with Americans that in England no stranger ever addresses another; whereas, says Mr. Fiske, "all Americans talk with their fellow-travellers." We may mention for Mr. Fiske's benefit that we have heard precisely the opposite remark. Those who have travelled in the American cars are generally struck by the want of conversation there, as compared with those in England—a fact, if it be a fact, which may be partly explained by their construction. As the seats only admit two, with not too much room, it is obviously more difficult to produce anything like conversation. In face, however, of the conflict of testimony which obscures this point, we will not venture into a dissertation upon the causes of so doubtful a phenomenon.

Mr. Fiske's remarks bear for the most part upon certain obvious external differences between the two countries. He describes steamboats, railways, hotels, cabs, theatres, and so on, and compares them with those of his native land. His criticisms are, on the whole, such as we may willingly admit. They are to a great extent illustrations of one prominent distinction between an old and a new country, which must strike every traveller. The abundance of labour in the one contrasts with its scarcity in the other. America is celebrated for its labour-saving machines, and many of the social as well as of the material contrivances are simply due to the same necessity. Thus, to take a trivial example mentioned by Mr. Fiske, the English omnibus is provided with a conductor; in America the conductor is abolished as a luxury, and the driver discharges his functions, communicating with the passengers through a hole in the roof. In an English hotel, says Mr. Fiske, you are bewildered with the quantity of servants; there are three or four young ladies in the office; as many in the bar; a dozen waiters round a joint of meat in the coffee-room; a score of porters round the luggage; and scullerymaids, housemaids, and chambermaids in amazing multitudes. An American house, built after the modern plan, is a vast machine for saving labour. They have hot and cold water and gas laid on to every floor; there is a bath to every room in the house; there are speaking-tubes to convey orders; there is a lift from cellar to attic; instead of lighting a fire in every room, which, after all, only warms one corner and requires infinite labour in carrying coals up and down stairs, there is a single furnace in the basement which warms the whole house with hot air, and can be turned on or off by simply moving a grating. There are refrigerators to preserve meat and provide a steady supply of distilled ice-water, and there is a machine for doing all the washing on the premises. Two servants can keep a good-sized house in order, and many families are content with one. On the other hand, the servants are far more intolerable than the worst of those who provoke an English housekeeper to appeal to the newspapers. They are raw Irish girls, freshly exported, with notions of domestic ——— derived from a miserable shanty, and with principles which teach them to devote all their savings to the Fenians, or to the building of a new Roman Catholic church. Their new independence makes them insolent, and they are more disposed to order their mistress out of the kitchen than to treat her with decent respect. According to Mr. Fiske, English servants at their worst are so much better than servants in America that "an American who prefers his comfort to democracy would do well to exchange countries for this reason alone." Every one who has witnessed the troubles of American ladies must feel the force of this lamentation; but it is only one of innumerable ways in which society is modified by the same condition. In some cases, the struggle to save labour has resulted in ingenious contrivances which more than compensate the evils; in others, any contrivance fails to supply the want of labour. Mr. Fiske is puzzled to understand how Englishmen can possibly prefer European hotels to those of his own country. It is not wonderful, he says, that Englishmen should not take refuge in hotel life from the miseries of housekeeping, considering the extreme discomfort of English hotels. Yet there is one plain advantage in European hotels above those gigantic caravanserais which the Americans call by the same name. The service is far more abundant, if it is not better organized. An American hotel of the larger kind is a wonder of organization; the guests receive a certain amount of comfort, turned out with all the precision of a well-regulated machine; but they are nothing more than the bit of raw material which is put in to be operated upon. They are known by numbers, like convicts. They receive none of that personal attention which makes a good old unsophisticated country inn bear some resemblance to a home. The English inn in its best form—rare enough, it is true—is the development of a comfortable house, whose proprietor has resolved to admit a few additional guests. The American inn is simply a huge factory, in which hospitality is manufactured like cloth, at so much per day or per yard. In London we have recently installed the American plan with very partial success, in hotels which are gigantic enough to lose the advantage of personal attention, and yet not organized with the American skill in saving unnecessary labour. We may add that London hotels suffer especially from the development of club life, which partly accounts for Mr. Fiske's remark, that the stranger is apparently expected to pass the day abroad.

Another illustration of the same state of things is to be found in the railway system. Mr. Fiske complains bitterly of our mode of transporting baggage. There is something very tempting about the American plan, which enables you simply to give a check to an official, and have your luggage transported, without further trouble, to your hotel. The system is, in fact, absolutely necessary in a country where a railway porter is a rarity and a cab a mere engine for extortion. But in England, where we have an army of porters and a boundless supply of cabs, we at any rate have this advantage, that, after a good deal of scrambling, and at a certain risk of losing our portmanteaus, we do succeed in getting to our destination with such luggage as we have saved in ten minutes, when an American would take half an hour, and have to wait two hours more before his trunks would follow him. With certain minor animadversions, which, we should say, Mr. Fiske mixes with very candid acknowledgments of our superiority in other points, we fully agree. Why, for example, is an English engine-driver always exposed to the weather, rain or fine, instead of sitting in a comfortable sheltered room like his American rival? Why is an English steamboat or ferry contrived so as to provide the maximum of discomfort below, and the minimum of shelter on deck? Why is an English theatre so arranged that, in case of fire, about nine-tenths of the audience would necessarily be burnt or crushed, whereas the largest theatres in New York can be comfortably emptied in four minutes? Why is it impossible to travel comfortably by night on any English, or, for that matter, on any European, railway? Why are the streets of an English town made a scene in which a modest woman finds it unpleasant to go abroad after nightfall, when even New York, in most respects the worst-managed city in the world, is perfectly decent externally? Why do Englishmen, above all other civilized beings, enjoy the privilege of beating their wives and jumping upon them with hobnailed boots? An English labourer who carried out his national custom in Milwaukie was summarily lynched by a dozen Irishwomen, says Mr. Fiske, who thumped him with mops and pokers till he promised never to beat his wife again. We are no friends to lynching as a general rule, but the precedent deserves attention.

We are getting into rather serious topics, upon which Mr. Fiske touches very shortly. We would only add, therefore, that we should not give a fair account of his work without adding that he does us for the most part as much justice as we could wish, that he is a hearty admirer of many of our customs, and that his chapter on England and America may be read with profit by all who wish for a plain statement of the difficulties which hinder a friendly feeling between the two countries. He has, of course, been guilty of one or two blunders, upon which Mr. Yates might advantageously have exercised his editorial skill. For example, he has a very exaggerated notion, in our opinion, of the strength of what he calls "caste" prejudices in England, and especially of the supposed reluctance to receive a man into society because he is the son of a tradesman. And it is rather odd that any one who has even a speaking acquaintance with the English history of the last century and a half should fancy that Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone broke through routine by becoming Premiers without titles. But a foreigner, even with Mr. Yates's supervision, must expect to make a few blunders.

LIFE OF SIR JAMES GRAHAM.*

IT is not a bad thing that the lives of men who have cut a prominent figure in the world should be surveyed from a more or less strictly local point of view; that Cicero should be estimated from the standpoint of Arpinum. It is a great and unquestionable gain to a politician to have a local side—to have neighbours, friends, acquaintances, who have known and watched him from his youth upwards, who like to think of him as getting forward in the world, and who constitute for him a peculiar sort of public opinion which encourages, steadies, and warms him in its own way. The home feeling is always a good element in a man of public renown, and those who saw most clearly that Mr. Gladstone was rushing to defeat in Lancashire perhaps felt some sympathy with the motives which he avowed for going there. A man born in the Tower Hamlets or Hackney might as well have been born in Sahara or Oregon for any of that regard or domestic sentiment which surrounds the growing eminence of a provincial, and which, if he has any good stuff in him, ought to exert the most wholesome influence upon his character. And it is not a bad thing for the provincials who stay behind to have a personal motive for taking a keener interest than they would otherwise be likely to do in the affairs of State. It will always be the case, so long as human nature remains at all what it is at present, that people will be more stimulated by persons than by principles, by men than by causes; and it is highly advantageous in free governments that as many people as possible should care about public things. The more numerous the links that connect all who are far removed from the centre with central affairs the better. North-country people are usually the strongest in this sort of sentiment, and of North-country people the Cumbrians probably possess more of what may be called local patriotism than any other section of Englishmen. Perhaps we might go on to say that, of Cumbrians, Dr. Lonsdale is pre-eminently devoted to the culture of the genius of the county. His book on Curwen and Blamire was very interesting, even to those who have the misfortune not to be Cumbrians nor to care specially about the Workington agricultural shows. It was a very graphic, entertaining, and instructive picture of social growth in an out-of-the-way region of the earth. From the same almost exclusively local side, Dr. Lonsdale has now given us an account of a man who was as much more conspicuous than Curwen in the larger field of affairs as Curwen was more conspicuous than Blamire.

Sir James Graham was of genuine old Border stock, and his handsome form and high spirit may be counted among the illustrations, in the face of a thousand the other way, of the doctrine that, after all, it is old blood that tells. Nothing very remarkable happened to him in his youth, and his first entry into political life came to nothing. In 1818, at a cost of six thousand pounds, he got himself returned by a narrow majority of fourteen for Hull; he made no impression on the House; left Hull, went to St. Ives, and was quickly driven to ask for the Chiltern Hundreds by a petition which he had not money enough to contest. He was just under thirty at this time, and his withdrawal to agriculture on his father's estate seemed to justify a prophecy which somebody had made in the House on the occasion of a weak speech of his against Government at the time of the Six Acts, "Well, there's an end of Graham." But Graham had that kind of stuff in him which does not so soon come to an end. For five years he worked hard on the Netherby land, and we may here learn the useful lesson which our publicists too characteristically forget, that marked and widespreading improvement must usually be initiated by some one man, and not be expected merely from the spontaneous activity of the sense of their own needs or advantages in the many. He was young too, as initiators are so commonly and naturally proud to be, and his energy succeeded in introducing improvements about which those who have come after can only wonder—as happens with reference to all improvements that have established themselves—how the world got on without them. Tile-draining, roads instead of quagmires, good stock, good farming, good homesteads, all these were new to Netherby five-and-forty years ago. The only fault which his neighbours could find with the Knight of Netherby was that he was reserved and averse to the practice of hospitality—a defect of grave weight in the Border country. But perhaps they agreed by-and-by that he was better employed in studying economics and finance, and in preparing himself by general cultivation for the Parliamentary field. Dr. Lonsdale points out how much service was rendered to Sir James Graham by a neighbouring yeoman, named Rooke, whose views on corn and the currency were those which now find most general acceptance. The yeoman seemed to have reached free-trade conclusions by something like mother-wit, and it is highly suggestive of unspeakable things, as Mr. Carlyle would say, that truths which were hidden from the wise of the earth, even from Peel at that time, revealed themselves to simple men who had the stupendous advantage of looking straight at the economic facts without considerations of party or Parliamentary policy. In 1846, when the Corn-laws were repealed by a movement in which Graham was the able lieutenant of Peel, the Knight of Netherby wrote to his yeoman counsellor—"The necessity of no longer treating the trade in corn as an exception to general principles was obvious to you long before it had forced itself on my convictions; I give you full credit for your foresight." The present biographer, in his zeal for the honour of the county, is gravely vexed with his hero for not embracing Rooke's opinions earlier, and so snatching for himself and Cumberland the glory which eventually went to the Sussex Cobden and the Lancashire Peel.

To a generation which knew Sir James Graham only as a Tory and at last as a Peelite, it is startling to find him suspected in 1830 of being a revolutionist, and taking part at banquets where his own brother-in-law could propose—it was just after the Three Days of July—as a toast, "May the heads of Don Miguel, King Ferdinand, and Charles Capet be severed from their bodies, and rolled in the dust, and the more speedily the better." That a baronet of the old stock should indulge in sentiments so pronounced as this, may show that there may be even in the stout Cumbrian gentleman an element of sans-culottism. Perhaps, however, the germ was warmed into life rather by natural heat of blood than by any deliberate purpose; and it is not impossible, moreover, that a Lawson and a Graham, while drinking sanguinary toasts to the destruction of the foreign Bourbons, were thinking a little of the Bourbons of Cumberland, the mighty Lowthers. It is probably difficult for us who have flourished in days since the first Reform of the House of Commons to appreciate the difference in political tone which that measure brought about. Before then, there had been no such thing as a peaceful, orderly, and lawful revolution, and people had some reason, therefore, for believing that violent solutions were the only solutions possible, when the problem was the transference of power. The Reform Bill, and all the circumstances of its enactment, proved that our institutions, unlike those of other countries, could be better bent than broken, and in consequence the temper of men turned to bend rather than to break them. Sir James Graham was a vehement Reformer. In 1830 he had brought forward a motion for the reduction of official salaries, and exposed what Burke would have called the shameful parts of the Civil List—its pluralities, sinecures, and jobbed pensions. But he found that no administrative reform could be effected without organic change, as other men had found before him. Cumberland was strongly of the same way of thinking. The election of 1831, says Dr. Lonsdale, "was so grandly enthusiastic in every way, that its record constitutes an historical chapter of which Cumberland may well be proud." The Lowthers were thoroughly beaten, and Graham was returned for the division at the head of the poll. In the Grey Ministry he presided over the Admiralty until the Irish question, which had all along been the danger of this, as of most other Governments, came irresistibly to the front, and Graham, along with the present Lord Derby, seceded. Perhaps by a not unnatural reaction, perhaps from a certain craftiness to which he was not a stranger, he had no sooner got the legislative machine reformed than he felt or feigned dire alarm lest the reform in the machine should lead to change in the work done. It is not impossible that in our own days we may see something similar, and that some of those who have been most eager for a Reformed Parliament may show themselves not eager at all for reformed legislation. At all events, Sir James Graham now went in for caution, and he drew the line at the Irish Temporalities; to touch them was to pass from Reform to Revolution. The Cumbrians were not quite satisfied with his secession; then, as now, the man who fails his party is unbeloved of his constituency. But things grew worse. The Whigs drew nearer to O'Connell, and O'Connell was Graham's chief aversion, both personally and as the representative of a policy. The Knight of Netherby went over to the camp of Peel and Lyndhurst, and the remonstrances of East Cumberland went up to Heaven. The canvass at the next election was most discouraging. The very laws of nature seemed suspended, for the man who had been the Whig champion in 1830 was backed by the terrible Lowthers in 1837. He went to canvass a yeoman, and meeting the mother in the lobby, said, with the factitious gaiety usual in candidates at election time, "You see, Mrs. Twentyman, I walk in with the same freedom as in days gone by." "Ay," was the chilling reply, "but ye're sair altered since then; we hardly ken what ye are now." Sir James afterwards spoke of this as one of the most disagreeable rebuffs he ever experienced, for the dame had been kind to him, even in remote schoolboy days. Some emissary of a religious society had painted up in huge characters near the entrance of Carlisle, "Flee from the wrath to come." A Blue wag painted up before it these warning words, "O, Netherby apostate;" and the warning came true—the wrath of the Blues overtook their former chief, and not even the fifty-three electors of the name of Graham who came to vote for the head of their house could save him from being at the bottom of the poll. He was not the kind of man to bear defeat with good humour, and at a Tory dinner shortly after the election he widened the gulf by his biting assaults on old allies, local and other; Brougham, "the boaster daily correspondent of royalty," being treated with particular severity. Dr. Lonsdale, though no Tory, declares that we cannot fail to see in the ostracism of Graham "a modern instance of the Roman treatment of an English Coriolanus." We may be quite sure that Graham was about the last man in the world to play Coriolanus willingly. For ten years he was an exile from the good-will of his county, and for some part of the time, at any rate, he was scarcely less unpopular in the country at large. He was Home Secretary in Peel's Tory Ministry, and his part in the proceedings against O'Connell, his harsh expressions about Ireland, and, above all, the famous letter-opening business in 1844, surrounded his name with sinister associations. However, all this blew over in time, and in spite of the offence which he gave in 1850 by refusing to take part in any proceedings about the "Papal Aggression," he was at length, in 1852, after long estrangement, taken back to local favour, and returned for Carlisle. On the Chinese question, in 1857, he voted against Lord Palmerston, and Carlisle approved of his vote; and he was returned a third time after Lord Derby's Dissolution in 1859. In 1861 he died. It can hardly be said that at any time, even when he was most popular, he attracted much enthusiasm among his neighbours. The reserve of which they had complained when he was young did not lessen as years, responsibilities, and official dignity grew upon him. He appeared cold and distant to men of the middle ranks, Dr. Lonsdale says, "and more lukewarm than cordial to those of his own walk; he seldom unbent himself, except to his Parliamentary equals, and rarely looked 'at home' in the yeomanry circle, where he might have won golden opinions so readily." His manner was not held to be pleasant; "the gloved finger, held out as if by compulsion, felt like a cold touch to a person counting on the manly grasp and hearty response to his own shake of the fist." The Cumbrians did not think him thorough; and Cumbrians, as their lover here says, "above all things like naturalness and openness of disposition."

The executor in whose hands the Graham papers remain is of opinion, in which he is probably quite justified, that the time has not yet come for giving them to the public; and therefore Dr. Lonsdale has not been able to tell us anything that was before private or unknown, and in point of larger political interest he has not equalled Mr. Torrens's biography. But his book will be delightful to Cumbrians, provided they are not under "the cloven foot of the Lowthers," to use his own rather strong expression, and to the rest of the world it will seem lively enough. It gives us a curious picture of the sturdiness with which a yeoman population know how to cling to their opinions, and of the keen and unsophisticated sense with which they keep an eye on their representatives. The only thing to be said against them is that perhaps they are, or at any rate were in Sir James Graham's case, disposed to respect the independence of their chief rather less than they value their own. There are many reasons for thinking that town populations are less ready to resent divergencies from party than a constituency largely made up of yeomen; but the difference probably cuts both ways, and is only partly creditable to the towns.

SAINT CLEMENT DANES.*

THE parish of St. Clement Danes may be said at the present moment to be passing through the throes of a metamorphosis of a most extreme and almost exhaustive kind. On no district of London has the hand of improvement laid a firmer or more revolutionary grasp. It would seem as though everything that meets the eye—church, burial-yard, parish institutions, official and private dwelling places alike—were, to use an expressive Americanism, being "improved off" the face of creation. The clearance actually effected for the site thus far assigned for the projected Law Courts disposes at once of a full quarter of the area of the entire parish. Another quarter at least—including the church of St. Clement's, and the narrow slums of Holywell and Wych Streets—will disappear under the inevitable enlargement which this site, if finally adopted, must undergo, together with the necessary approaches and thoroughfares. On the other hand, should the scheme for transferring the new building bodily, or for the major part, to the Thames Embankment be carried into effect, the first step would be to cart away every stick and stone now remaining above the soil of St. Clement's to the south of the Strand—more than another quarter of the now existing parish. Two outlying and isolated fragments of St. Clement's exist, we believe—one comprising the site of the Lyceum Theatre, the other occupied by certain narrow streets and culs-de-sac between the precincts of the Savoy and Cecil Street. These detached blocks will in all probability be ere long all of "St. Clement Danes past and present," that will meet the eye of posterity. No great loss will, we are bound to say, be inflicted by this clearance upon the interests of art or of architectural association. Few regions of the metropolis are less conspicuous for the absence of monuments or edifices which visibly uphold the dignity or constitute the beauty of any site. The parish church, despite the prestige which the name of Wren may attach to so mean and meagre an architectural pile, will leave scarcely a regret at its inevitable demolition. The three lesser Inns of Chancery—Clement's Inn, Dane's Inn, and New Inn—have little of antiquarian or architectural interest about them, and Clare Market with its appendages, reeking with the blood and offal of centuries of hecatombs of slain beasts, will fall a welcome sacrifice at the altar of Hygiea. All that we expect or hope to see towering above the flood of destruction are the two solid and noble bulwarks of health and science—the College of Surgeons, and the Hospital of King's College.

Barren, however, and unsightly as the parish of St. Clement's in its outward and visible aspect may be thought, there are memories and associations connected with it which we would not willingly see thrown carelessly into the same limbo of oblivion as its more material belongings and characteristics. We are glad to find that the sense of its approaching demolition has brought forward a loyal and painstaking parishioner to rescue from forgetfulness the more prominent matters of interest which attach to it. St. Clement's, Mr. Diprose pleads with not less truth than warmth, is no mean parish. "In it have been enacted some of the most noteworthy events in the history of our country; in it many great and worthy men as authors, actors, statesmen, or lawyers, have been born, flourished, and died. On the other hand, time has unravelled in the parish many a plot against the throne and the people, and it is not a little curious to find that on this very spot which has been the scene of many a crime and deed of infamy will be erected one of the most magnificent buildings ever dedicated to the great cause of justice." With so many links of interest binding in one the past fortunes and future destinies of the parish, we should have seen with regret its memorials scattered to the winds for want of a vates sacer to collect or chronicle them. Imperfect as Mr. Diprose's volume is in many respects, it fulfils the task of putting together a sufficiently copious mass of particulars to justify him in styling it "one of the most remarkable parishes in the metropolis." He is right in not presuming to offer it to the world as a History in the full or proper sense of the word. It is neither ample nor critical enough in point of matter, while nothing can be more loose and unmethodical than the way in which the contents are jumbled together. It is only towards the middle of the volume, after floundering through divers desultory notices of the new Law Courts, as well as of the existing Inns of Court—not one of which, by the way, lies within the boundaries of the parish—with broken scraps of antiquarian gossip of all ages, that we find the author seriously set to work with his "historical sketch of St. Clement Danes." We are treated to a full churchwarden's account of the charities, ancient and modern, with which this parish teems beyond perhaps any other in London. The compiler would have thrown additional light upon the past, and pointed a moral most appropriate to the present time, had he traced the results of this damnosa hæreditas of parochial endowment in the growth and successive deterioration of that congeries of rookeries, slums, and haunts of vice which these lavish incentives to improvidence and idleness have entailed upon St. Clement's. The formal part of his book, too, begins with a blunder of the most portentous kind, which is the more superfluous in that the next page supplies him with the materials for correcting it. Accounting for the fact that the parish has an anchor for its crest, "it is thought," he says, "by antiquarians, to have its origin with the Danish people, the early settlers in this locality, who coming from abroad, and belonging to a seafaring race, must have cast anchor in the Thames, perhaps opposite the very Strand itself; and what so emblematical of a foreigner who invaded our island, and landed from a ship, as an anchor?" A still more idiotic conjecture has occurred to him, that, "the Strand being the shore of a river, very possibly the anchor was first suggested through that circumstance." Had he the slightest antiquarian knowledge, or had he even construed the passages he proceeds to quote in a lame and second-hand style from the Acta Sanctorum, he would have recognised in the anchor the common and inseparable emblem of St. Clement; that saint—the fourth Pope, according to the ordinary calculation, from St. Peter—having suffered martyrdom under Trajan, by being cast into the sea with an anchor tied to his neck. In the true spirit of bookmaking, he must needs cap his own original absurdity with a lot of the most heterogeneous twaddle in the shape of a note:—"Anchors are of ancient use, and the invention belongs to the Tuscans.—Pliny. The second tooth or fluke was added by Anacharsis the Scythian (592 B.C.).—Strabo. Anchors were first forged in England A.D. 578. Those of a first-rate ship of war (four) will weigh 99 cwt. each, costing 450*l.*—Phillips. The Admiralty anchor was introduced about 1841. Improved anchors were made 1831, 1846, 1848, 1853.—Haydn."

The primary connexion of this quarter with the Danesis, fixed by Fleetwood, writing to Lord Burghley, an inhabitant of St. Clement's at the date 886, when those Danes who had married Englishwomen, being exempted from the decree of Alfred which drove the Danes at large from the country, were compelled to settle between Westminster and Ludgate. Here they built what he calls "a synagogue," which was known as ecclesia Sancti Clementis Danorum. There the body of Canute's son and successor Harold Harefoot was twice interred, and there the Danes in their extremity found a sanctuary and a burial-place. There is no need of Pennant's suggestion that the parish received its name "from the massacre of certain Danes who had taken refuge there." The residence of Danes within the limits of the City is certified by the dedication of churches to two of their native kings—Saint Olaf and St. Magnus. Mr. Diprose has not traced with any great amount of pains the annals of his parish in the times immediately following the expulsion of the Danes. His nearest record, which he may have gathered from an author as commonly known as Newcourt, is that Henry II. gave the church to the neighbouring Knights Templars, on the dissolution of which order, he might have added, it passed to the Canons Regular of the Holy Sepulchre at Warwick. In the year 17 Edward II. the Bishop of Exeter, through an exchange of lands, became patron. By the same process the benefice passed, 1 Edward VI., to the Duke of Somerset, and, on his attainder, reverted to the Crown. By Queen Elizabeth it was given to the Marquis of Exeter, in whose successors the patronage still remains vested. In the Rolls Office Certificates of the Commissioners of the delivery of church goods collected from the churches in the City of Westminster under Edward VI., "the parish of St. Clement Danes without the bar of the New Temple" is named, but a record made of "no specialities." In a record touching chantries in the same office (temp. Hen. VIII. and Edw. VI.), mention is made of "tenements" given by Roger Bowle to "Guide a preste" called the "chapleyne of the fraternity." The old church of St. Clement's escaped the great fire, but, becoming ruinous, was rebuilt in 1680 by Edward Pierce, who lived in Surrey Street, under the superintendence of Wren, who from this would not appear primarily responsible for the poverty of the design. We are told, however, by Hatton (1708), that a stone in the new church stated "that Sir Christopher Wren freely and generously bestowed his great care and skill towards the contriving and building of the present church." Mr. Diprose's pages contain many curious notices of memorable personages and events in connexion with both church and parish. He might as well have given us from the parish books, which are in good preservation, a list of rectors, at least for the last three centuries. Among them would have been found Henry Shelford, Dean of Hereford, Roger Sandyford, principal of Broadgates Hall, and John Layfield, Fellow of Chelsea College, translators of the Bible. Bates, a favourite Caroline preacher, and Hascard, Dean of Windsor (1700), at different times held the living, as well as Dr. James Fitzjames, Dean of Wells (1534). To the list of illustrious dead interred within the walls of the old church might have been added the names of Bishops Arundel and Booth of Exeter. On August 28, 1557, Machyn inserts in his diary, "a herse for the duchess of Norfolk was set up in the church," and in October of the same year "the countess of Arundel died at Bath Place." From the same well-known diary it would have been worth quoting a curious account, June 14, 1555, of the "procession of St. Clement parish, set forth with a great many stremers and banners, and the whites (waits) of London, with crosses. In the myds of the crosses was the Spaneards crosse of the Savoy. And yt was rond like to the bangys over the sacrament of cremeson velvet, imbroidered; and after clerkes and prestes in rycho copes synging Salve festa dies, and followyng all the Inns of the Court ther and after all the paryshe with whyte rods in ther hands a gret nomber." A similar procession "unto Powlles," including "a iijxx. copes and prestes and clarkes," was seen by him "the viii. day of Juinj 1557." A whole chapter is devoted by Mr. Diprose to Dr. Johnson, one of the greatest parishioners, "who might regularly be seen entering the church as the bells of St. Clement's were heard invitingly ringing." We are glad to see some pains taken to look through the indices of the Calendars of State Papers, which have supplied many desultory bits of history relating to St. Clement's.

By far the best portion of Mr. Diprose's book is the topographical, in which he follows up one by one the streets, courts, and purlieus of the district, and has something to say in connexion with each by turns. There is so much really good matter in these chapters that we should like to see the book put through another edition, in which the omissions might be supplied, the arrangement rectified, illustrations of a better class introduced, and the numerous errors of the press corrected. Though the first aspect of the volume is neat and pleasing to the eye, misprints abound to a degree peculiarly scandalous in the case of a writer who makes a wholly needless parade of his connexion with a trading typographical firm. Misprints such as "Forregiano," for the name of the famous sculptor; "Fædora," for Rymer's great work; "eccelesia," and "Hierosolinitatis" are, within a few pages of each other, utterly beyond excuse. "Inveniam viam aut faciam" is surpassed, as possibly a mere printer's slip, by the more deliberate grammatical blunder of the translation,

> By all the powers that in me lay,
> I will find or make a way.

What makes these instances of carelessness or ignorance worse is the fact of there not lacking indications of a purpose to make this book a kind of advertising medium. To what other end are we shown a drawing of St. Clement's Lane, now numbered with things that were, in which the object that most conspicuously strikes the eye is the trade premises of "Diprose & Bateman, printers"? Good wine needs no bush. And good writing and printing, we may rest equally assured, will be more certain than any tricks of trade to bring home to author or publisher the proper fruits of literary toil.

RITCHIE'S BRITISH SENATORS.*

WE notice this book, not because it is of much value or interest, but because it is, as they say, a representative or typical one. What it represents is what used to be called Grub Street, but what is now better known as the literary gent. Mr. Ritchie we conceive to belong to, and not unfavourably to represent, that class, a numerous and sometimes mischievous one, who, unlike Wordsworth,

> Much and oft delight
> In merely personal talk.

Sometimes this personage calls himself a Flâneur, and sketches his Club-fellows; sometimes he figures as a London Correspondent to some provincial newspaper, and, with a business eye to his gossip getting reproduced in a London journal, and always for a purpose not unfrequently subsidized, gets a rumour or a scandal or an invention or a piece of gossip, malevolent or not, floated. These sketchers in society and purveyors of gobemoucherie have a fearful and wonderful repertory of facts, which may well be, considering that they have their own rich inventive powers and the vast expanses of imagination to draw upon, without the slightest sense of responsibility.

> All men and things they know, themselves unknown,
> And publish every name except their own.

Strictly speaking, they can never be convicted of an untruth. They may safely say "It is said," for have they not themselves said it? and "It is rumoured," which is undeniable, for the inventor of the rumour may with truth testify to its existence. These are the omniscient and omnipresent persons who give us the details of the Queen's conversation with Mr. Bright, who can tell you who wrote what in every review and newspaper, and are quite familiar not only with the earnings and income of their literary friends—the purveyors of magazine padding—but with the salaries of Edinburgh Reviewers, and the profits of Mr. Tennyson. No doubt the creature is no modern innovation. The Town and Country Magazine of a century ago, the Satirist of our fathers' days, Edmund Curll's famous hands, the writers in the Snarler and the Scourge immortalized by Goldsmith, and the gossippers of Button's and Will's, are the legitimate ancestors of the London Correspondents—the key-hole and trou-Judas journalists, the Loungers at the Clubs, the Owls, Vampires, and Ghouls, and the Jim Crow Vultures who do the scavengers' work of what they call literature; and cart away the offal and feculent drainage of London society, only to disperse it through many a secret pipe over the country fallows.

Mr. Ewing Ritchie, though we cannot acquit him of belonging to this class, is not to be charged with malevolence or mischief. His fault is that he publishes a book full of small personal details and mere gossip which nobody ought to care about, but which such books encourage a silly if not vicious curiosity about. He has, it seems, at various times composed personal "sketches" of Parliament men; and we suppose has published them in many newspapers. And now he has collected them, with additions; and if with corrections, he has left himself plenty of blunders to correct. Mr. Ritchie frankly enough announces his plan; his "book is not intended for clever critics, but for country people who like to know a little about members of Parliament." This is candid; his book is what he describes it; beneath or beyond criticism, clever or otherwise, and suited for the Little Peddlington market, it certainly argues an exact acquaintance of the writer with provincial tastes. At least we suppose so; though we have not found country people at all less intelligent, or with worse taste, or with a lower sense of what is becoming, than London people, especially London people of the literary profession. And we set it down as a somewhat indirect reflection on country people generally to assume that they can either be amused or instructed by the intellectual food provided for them by Mr. Ritchie, or the like of Mr. Ritchie. But let that pass. If country readers want to know the colour of Mr. Disraeli's hair or Mr. Gladstone's waistcoat—we beg pardon, of "the distinguished, let us add the talented, individual who fills the situation of the First Lord of the Treasury" —Dicky Gossip, Dicky Gossip is the man. Here they will learn—and much may they be edified—that the proceedings of the House of Commons are inaugurated by prayer, and, "that operation over," strangers are admitted into "an elegant and spacious chamber"; that Mr. Disraeli has "a pale Hebrew face," with "a power of individuality which makes you hate the object of his hate"; that Lord Stanley has "an impediment in his speech," and "not very long since" read a speech in the House of Commons; moreover, that he is "much more plainly dressed than the great exponent"—by which may be meant expositor—"of the Asiatic," commonly called the Asian, "mystery, and by no means so elaborately neat as the worthy member for Droitwich;" which worthy member for Droitwich, we are further informed, is "of the middle size, with a pale face and rather hooked nose," while his "dress gives indications of correctness and finish rather than of greatness or genius."

Here Mr. Ritchie is nearly original. He has heard of Sartor Resartus, and perhaps has a dim notion that "habits" is an ambiguous word, and that it has been said that there is some subtle connexion between the clothes and the mind. Sir John Pakington's coat and waistcoat do not give indications of genius. We know that Brummell's did. Mr. Ritchie takes the tailor's view of man. Mr. Disraeli's is "an elaborately dressed form," hence his "power of individuality," whatever that may be. From Mr. Gladstone's "plain dress and fluent delivery you might almost mistake him for a clergyman"—a conclusion which has suggested itself to other people, not from Mr. Gladstone's dull coat, but from his dull homiletics on "Ecce Homo" in Good Words. Mr. Lowe is "a plain man, dressed in black"; and here again the Ritchie theory of the identity of clothing corporeal and intellectual would suggest the parsonic mind. But it breaks down. Mr. Gladstone's plain dress is only the outward and visible expression of common honesty and singleness of mind. Mr. Lowe's dress, equally plain and equally subfusk, suggests "disappointed ambition or party spleen." Mr. Stansfeld is "guilty of the Dundreary affectation of wearing his hair parted in the middle, but he is now always neatly dressed." Mr. Layard's beard, we regret to find, is becoming grey, and Mr. Ritchie is astonished to find that the member for Southwark does not attend St. Stephen's in an Eastern dress—we mean "Oriental costume."

Next to senatorial clothes, Mr. Ritchie is most communicative on senatorial hair. Mr. Cardwell's hair "is undeniably red," but his temper is much cooler than what Mr. Ritchie would call his chevelure. Lord Lytton seems to suffer under an undescribed form of trichosis; for we are informed that "all the flesh on his face seems to have run into hair," an affection which the great novelist shares in common with a rat-catcher's dog. The late Mr. Johnson Fox had "the shortest and fattest possible body, with a head adorned by thick masses of grey hair parted in the middle"; but this middle parting, which in gay Mr. Stansfeld suggested ——, in Mr. Fox suggests John Bunyan. Things that are equal to the same thing are equal to each other; and Mr. Ritchie, being a logician, must infer the common nature of Mr. Sothern's hero and the divine tinker by virtue of that style of parting the hair which John Milton, John Bunyan, and Lord Dundreary equally adopted. Mr. Miall, it appears, has given up black clothes since he left off preaching; the late Mr. Duncombe subsided into seediness and a wig; Mr. Whalley wears a white waistcoat—not, we trust, the cast-off vest of the Young England of five-and-twenty years ago. But more than enough of this. Whoever desires to be informed which of our senators is "auricomous"; which had a German-Jew bookseller for a grandfather; which is "shabbily dressed, a little man with a hooked nose and a face indicative of weakness and premature decay"; which son of Peel has "the look of a theatrical gentleman," and which "brushes his hair straight," are not these things written in the book of Ritchie?

In all this Mr. Ritchie is anything but original. Mr. James Grant has preceded him in "Random Recollections" of precisely the same character. So has Mr. Francis. The Pall Mall Gazette published a Parliamentary Gallery twice as clever and not much less personal. But in these there was some attempt at order and method. Mr. Ritchie's book is chaotic, and were the coming historian of the times to avail himself of these contemporaneous portraits, he would find Mr. Mill dismissed from Westminster while Mr. Disraeli was not Premier, and Mr. Gladstone just turned out from Oxford; Mr. Lowe member for the University of London, and Sir Bulwer Lytton not yet translated, except in the index and heading, to the serene seclusion of the peerage. Mr. Ayrton has "proved his right to be one of the men for the new Parliament," which in one page is spoken of as future and in another as existent, and of which the chief notables figure in the respectable and nonconforming persons of Mr. Sheriff M'Arthur and Henry Richard, Esq. The fact is that the book is a mere catchpenny collection of old newspaper sketches, not even written up and corrected to the time of publication. Based upon Dod for its facts, it tells us no more than the merest tyro in the politics of the last twenty years knows by heart. But it is Dod and his brief biographies done in that funny and pantological style of which Mr. Sala is the great master and Mr. Yates a very promising artist. But these pantologists have one little defect. They know everything, but, like Homer's Margites, they know it all badly. Mr. Ritchie has picked up a good many things, many anecdotes, many quotations. He is wonderfully well up—many small writers are—in Tennyson's Ulysses and Locksley Hall, and he actually quotes the Vision of Sin. But he should stop here, and not get out of his shallows. Dryden we might reasonably expect any literary gentleman of the day to make a mess of; but when Mr. Ritchie condescends "to borrow a simile from the 'Hind and Panther,' Reynard ravaged the garden and pulled up and destroyed fruit and flower," it would have been better to go to the original, and he would find the ravager in the "bristled Baptist boar." And surely Mr. Ritchie might have remembered Lord John Manners' famous foolish couplet, which he gives us in this very novel reading:—

> Let learning, laws, and commerce die,
> But give us back our old nobility.

It is generally safe to credit Sydney Smith with every joke which it is convenient to quote; yet it was not Sydney Smith, but Bishop Blomfield, who is responsible for the definition of an archdeacon as one who had to discharge archidiaconal functions; nor was it to Sydney Smith, but to Dr. Johnson, that we owe the phrase a "clubbable" man. Like all wits of the day, Mr. Ritchie patronizes the Bible, and somewhere condescends to call it that grand old Hebrew Book; but the Bible speaks of Methuselah, not of Mr. Ritchie's "Methusaleh." It is a great thing in these airy writers to be able to point an illustration with equal ease from things scientific and sporting, and to be alike at home in natural history and the hunting-field; but it is new to us that the boa-constrictor sucks the blood of his victim, and at an awkward fence it is the rider, not the horse, who "cranes"—i. e. makes a long neck to see what is on the other side of the hedge. When Peel, in 1828, deplored his difficulties in forming an Anti-Catholic Ministry, he spoke of the fate of a Government "composed," not "of Goulburn, Sir John Pechell, Wetherell, and myself," but of "Goulburn, Sir John Beckett, Wetherell, and myself." Here, however, we credit the printers with the blunder; or, at the most, Mr. Ritchie only corrected the proof carelessly. Mr. Ritchie makes a similar mess of an anecdote related of Joseph Sturge. "When Bradshaw, of the Guides, died, I myself," says Mr. Ritchie, "heard Sturge exclaim that there were more tears shed when the nation heard of the death of Mr. Bradshaw than when the hero of Waterloo died." Either Sturge or Ritchie has, we suspect, confused Bradshaw of Bradshaw's Guides with Braidwood, the head of the Fire Brigade, whose gallant death really made a great impression on us all. And we should recommend Mr. Ritchie, when he quotes Arbuthnot, to quote him accurately. "Martinus Scriblerus, we know, failed to teach his son logic. He could never get him to conceive of an abstract Lord Mayor apart from his fur cap and gold chain." It was Cornelius Scriblerus who was the father, and Martinus the son; and the difficulty was not about the "fur cap," which is worn by the sword-bearer, or one of the civic retainers, but the "fur gown," which is the Lord Mayor's robe. On the whole, it would be safest for the fluent gossippers of the day never to go beyond their Pickwick, Thackeray, and Tennyson. Dryden and Pope, Swift and Arbuthnot, are, in every sense, beyond the literary gent.

THE ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION.*

It is not often that a volume of pictorial among those which are published at this season of the year, — of much intrinsic or permanent value. Such works are generally got up with a regard more to external than internal embellishment, and are designed as ornaments for the drawing-room rather than for reference or information in the study. The publishers of the volume which forms the subject of the present notice have, however, succeeded in issuing a work which is far superior to the ordinary class of picture-book, and is really a valuable production. The Abyssinian Expedition will have many historians by the time that all the works now advertised on the subject have been issued, but for the general reader there will hardly be any so good as the one which now lies before us. It embodies illustrations of all the most interesting incidents of the campaign, artistically drawn and carefully engraved, with a clear and concise history of the expedition, compiled with much care, and written with much literary ability, by Mr. Roger Acton. The illustrations, which are from the pencils of Mr. Simpson and Lieutenant-Colonel Baigrie, depict faithfully the striking events which occurred both in the preparation and progress of the expedition, from the equipment of the rifled mountain guns at Woolwich to the departure of Lord Napier from Abyssinia. By their means the nature of the country and of its inhabitants is brought forcibly before the eye, and they are a pleasant adjunct to Mr. Acton's history, which could, however, have well stood alone.

Mr. Acton commences with an introduction, descriptive of Abyssinia, which bears the impress of much study. He has evidently consulted all the best authorities which have appeared both lately and at more early periods, and has succeeded in a few pages in giving a general sketch of the manners and customs of the Abyssinians which may save future readers much painful consultation of authorities from Bruce downwards. Few except those who have been obliged to make the attempt can understand how difficult it is to arrive at any satisfactory knowledge of a partly-explored country. The tales of travellers, proverbially fallacious, can only be trusted where they support each other very clearly. In making a compilation of this kind of evidence it is necessary to consult the productions of nearly all who may have visited the country, and it is wonderful how many visitors there have been to even a very partially-explored land. Mr. Acton must have consulted about twenty ponderous works to obtain matter for his introduction alone, and he has with great skill condensed, and issued in a readable form, the result of his investigations. In the short space of eight pages he tells us all that we care to know about the religious rites, food, furniture, agriculture, dress, and administration of justice, or rather injustice, among the Abyssinians, illustrations of which are conveniently placed alongside the text. After showing us the country and the people, Mr. Acton reviews the life and actions of King Theodore; calmly and coolly he weighs and dissects the various accounts which have appeared of that wonderfully praised and maligned man, and he seems to arrive at a very just conclusion. He traces the rise of Theodore from the time when, on his father's death, he was sent to be educated as a scribe in a convent near Lake Tsana, where he imbibed that knowledge of religion and Scripture with which he often startled and sometimes terrified his British visitors. The convent in which young Kassai, as he was then called, was being educated, was destroyed in one of the civil disturbances which constantly occur in Abyssinia, and he returned to his native province of Kwara, where he became the leader of what cannot be called by a higher name than banditti. He took much plunder from the Mussulman traders near Metemna, which not only enriched him, but secured him a large following. He then defeated the troops of Ras Ali, the ruler of Southern Abyssinia, and as the prize of his victory received one of his provinces and the hand of his daughter in marriage. In 1853, after many adventures, he again defeated the troops of Ras Ali, in the battle of Djisella, and subjected the whole of Amhara to himself. He then bribed the Abuna, or chief priest, to declare him legitimate sovereign of all Abyssinia, marched against the ruler of Tigre, defeated him, secured his kingdom, and was crowned with great pomp as Emperor of Ethiopia. Although, however, Theodore had conquered all Abyssinia, he had not consolidated his acquisitions; the chiefs of the provinces quickly rebelled against him, and when the British army landed in 1867 he had no power except in his camp near Debra Tabor and in his fortress at Magdala. His barbarous cruelties had alienated his soldiers and many of his chieftains from him. Mr. Acton justly discards the very interesting sketch of Theodore's character drawn by Mr. Plowden and sent home to the Foreign Office, as being far too favourable. Mr. Acton says, "Mr. Plowden, whose zeal and abilities in the public service need no commendation, was a gentleman of enthusiastic, we may say romantic, temperament, and his imagination was excited by the spectacle of a victorious hero starting up in the obscurest and remotest part of the country, and by the strength of his own mind and uplifted sword-arm putting down all the obstacles in the way of its political unity and social improvement." "One little incident which Mr. Plowden saw the first day that he was at Theodore's court does not at all bear out his enthusiastic eulogies of that Sovereign's just and enlightened rule. A poor native was dragged into the Royal presence, and accused of being a convert to the Roman Catholic faith. The King ordered him then and there to enter into a public theological disputation with the Abuna before a thousand people without any delay; his Majesty vouchsafing to be, like our King James I., the arbiter of the controversy between them. The convert pleaded that he could acknowledge no religious authority but the Pope. He was instantly ordered to be shot, and though Mr. Plowden, by special entreaty, obtained his life, the King would not spare him perpetual imprisonment in chains." Mr. Plowden's is the only evidence extant which would lead any one to suppose that King Theodore was ever a just or humane man. The ingenious theory that he was a hero until the death of his first wife, and only became cruel after he lost her, will not hold water; it is controverted by facts related by Mr. Plowden himself. As Mr. Acton says:—

> The facts already narrated show him to have been from his youth a robber and traitor, guilty of the vilest ingratitude towards his benefactors; utterly false and faithless; a hypocrite if not a fanatic, but probably a compound of both. It may be true that he was not originally disposed to wanton cruelty. The same is true of Nero. It was that moral insanity which is a penal visitation of nature on men who offend her by tyranny and the effects of frequent intoxication that made Theodore revel in the blood of his own people, and find his chief entertainment in tortures of mankind. Till three or four o'clock in the afternoon he was sober, and fit for business; but after his siesta he would begin drinking some fiery liquor, and perhaps go on with it till he was mad. No one then dared to approach him uncalled. If he were then irritated by contradiction or disappointment, he would sally forth and glut his rage, like a fiend rejoicing in havoc, upon the limbs and lives of his helpless victims.

Theodore's admirers have followed in Mr. Plowden's course, and have described him as a good, just, and generous man in the early part of his career, and have depicted him in later life as a grandly wicked and satanically noble hero; but this idea of Theodore is purely the creature of their own imagination. Those who carefully study the accounts given by the captives who were so long in his hands will perceive that he was deceitful, malignant, cowardly, undecided, and puerile. He was bold and cruel only towards those who were helpless in his hands; he was constantly asking his European prisoners to be reconciled to him, and to forgive him. We seek in vain for any traces of his political ability. The mythical accounts of his sagacity in discovering crime, and of his way of doing rude justice between appellants to him, may or may not be true. Some of these stories which Mr. Acton quotes are striking:—

> A peasant woman complains that a man has stolen and drunk her milk; the man denies it; he has drunk no milk that day. "Cut him open," says Theodore, "and let us see." It is done in a minute; the man's belly is full of half-digested curds. "All right," says the monarch, "here's the price of your milk; but if you had lied we should have cut you open to see if you had got it yourself."

After describing the character and early life of King Theodore, Mr. Acton proceeds to deal with those whom he so long held in captivity. He clearly exculpates Captain Cameron, but shows that much of the necessity for the Abyssinian Expedition lay in the neglect of the Foreign Office under Lord Russell to answer Theodore's letter to the Queen. It was under the influence of irritation from this cause that Theodore first imprisoned Captain Cameron, and, after he had once made up his mind to put an Englishman in chains, he determined to keep his captives as hostages, in the hope of obtaining as their ransom large amounts of munitions of war and of machinery for the manufacture of cannon. Diplomatic efforts to obtain their release were of no avail; negotiations were useless, and preparations for an armed delivery of the captives were commenced in July 1867. Bombay was chosen as the most convenient base of operations, and all the preliminary measures were confided to the Government of Bombay. The command was entrusted to Sir Robert Napier, the Commander-in-Chief at Bombay. The force required was estimated at about 12,000 men, of whom about 4,000 were Englishmen. Sir Robert Napier in his preparations was well supported by the Horse Guards and War Office in England, but at Bombay he was trammelled in the organization of the Land Transport Corps, one of the most important of his departments, by the interference of the Bombay Government. It was in this Land Transport Corps that the only failure in the conduct of the expedition took place. A reconnoitring party and a pioneer force were despatched and landed at Annesley Bay in November 1867, to make preparations for the arrival of the main body of the army. Sir Robert Napier himself reached Annesley Bay early in January, and the campaign then began in real earnest. Mr. Acton's account and the engravings which accompany it give a clear description of the country, and of the difficulties which the expedition had to surmount. The latter were by no means slight; the difficulty of obtaining food in the country and the constant failure of transport weighed heavily on the commander, but by the strenuous exertions of every one connected with the expedition all difficulties were overcome, and early in April the army appeared on the Bashilo, a river about ten miles from Magdala. On the 13th of that month, Good Friday, an action was fought at Arogee, in front of the fortress. This appears to have been brought on rather by accident than design on the part of the British, as the leading troops moved nearer to Magdala than Sir Robert Napier intended, and Theodore caused his army to sally down upon them. The Abyssinians were defeated with enormous loss, chiefly inflicted by the breech-loading firearms of the 4th regiment. The broken remains of Theodore's army retreated sadly into Magdala, where King Theodore spent an uneasy night. The following day, in hopes of making peace, he surrendered the captives, sent them into the British camp, and also proffered to Sir Robert Napier a large present of cows and sheep. These were refused, and Sir Robert Napier demanded that Theodore should make his personal submission. This Theodore did not do within the allotted time, and on Easter Monday the 33rd regiment, supported by artillery and the rest of the infantry, advanced to assault Magdala. Theodore's retreat or escape was prevented by the British cavalry which had been sent to watch the further side of the fortress, as well as by the wild Gallas, with whom an arrangement had been made to close the passes, and to whom a large reward was offered for the capture of the King. The gate of Magdala was sternly defended by Theodore and a small number of his chiefs, but the soldiers of the 33rd turned the gateway and forced their road through the defences into the interior of the fortress. As they were coming in, Theodore placed his pistol in his mouth and fired it; the bullet passed out at the back of his head, and his death seems to have been instantaneous.

Such is a brief record of the events of the expedition; all these Mr. Acton has forcibly described, and he has filled in the details with an accomplished hand. He has carefully bestowed praise on those who were entitled to it, and has nowhere betrayed any evidence of the partisan and personal feelings which were so evident in the letters of some of the newspaper correspondents who accompanied the expedition. He is always lucid, and gives vivid descriptions such as could hardly be expected from one who was not an eye-witness. In telling of the action of Arogee, he says:—

> The chieftains and leading knights of King Theodore's host were gorgeously attired in robes or loose tunics of scarlet silk, while some had burnished helmets, and most of them wore tippets made of the hides and tails of wild beasts The small horses they rode were gaily caparisoned. Their weapons were lances or carbines, and curved scimitars pointed almost like great hooks, with round curved shields held on the left arm. The multitude of their followers were about equally divided into spearmen and musketeers. They were in thick masses or in scattered groups, but in no regular order. Dashing onward with furious cries of exultation, they were now scarcely a hundred yards from the thin line of our advanced skirmishers. All at once, from the hill of Afeejo behind our troops, a hissing noise as of a fiery flying dragon came rushing through the upper air. The British sailors, in one minute after climbing up to their position on the side of that hill, had taken their rocket apparatus off the mules' backs, placed and pointed the tubes, and sent one of those strange messengers of deadly terror blazing and whizzing into the midst of the enemy, where it burst in a shower of iron. Nothing like that had ever been known in Abyssinian warfare. The brave warriors of Theodore—for brave indeed they were—paused and wavered, when they were greeted by three hundred men of the fourth regiment with a volley from the Sniders.

Altogether we may congratulate the publishers of this illustrated history of the Abyssinian Expedition on having succeeded in effecting a difficult task. They have rendered a work which is intrinsically valuable in a literary point of view eminently fitted for popular reading. The engravings are carefully executed, and Mr. Acton has shown great ability, as well as industry, in his share of the work. That he has written well any reader can tell; that he has written honestly and judiciously those who were present with the Abyssinian army will be ready to acknowledge.

THE DOCTOR OF BEAUWEIR.*

It has often been said that a perfectly truthful autobiography, even by one who has appeared to lead the dullest and most uneventful life, would be more interesting than any purely fictitious history. But, if so, the biographer ought at least to have some knowledge of the craft and mystery of composition; some perception of the value and relative proportions of light and shade; and he should understand so much of the novelist's art as to know what ought to be detailed in full, what only skirted by and not clearly made out, and what suppressed altogether. A bald narrative of commonplace events would not fulfil the saying, which indeed holds good in a psychological rather than a dramatic sense; the interest of such a work being that which springs from an honest self-revelation much more than from the most accurate narrative of outside events. The Doctor of Beauweir is a book written apparently to test the truth of the autobiographical theory, in so far as it purports to be the faithful chronicle of an uneventful life; but it scarcely answers to the higher requirements of psychology, having very little to do with character and less with self-revelation, and basing all its claims to interest on the life-likeness of its story and the simplicity of its treatment. It is an exceedingly natural book, but natural in a flat and monotonous manner, reminding one of those carefully-painted landscapes made up of a stagnant river, a line of pollard dull green alders, and a stretch of greyish marsh beyond. The painting may be true to the life, but then the life is not worth painting. Without colour, without incident, without any central point of interest, it is a literal copy of a very dull bit of prose; and, as such, cannot give much pleasure. And while recognising both the fidelity and the industry employed on the rendering, we cannot but feel that the pains taken to repeat such a blank dead-alive scene have been lamentably misdirected.

There is very little story in the Doctor of Beauweir, and no plot, properly so called. And it is evident that this is intentional, falling in as it does with the design of the book, which is that of a compressed diary wherein the purchase of the family linen is made of very nearly equal importance with the death of the wife or the marriage of the daughter. From the outset care is taken to lay the plan undisguisedly before the reader. After stating that for several years every publisher to whom he had submitted his work had refused it with disdain, "the Doctor" goes on to confess that it could scarcely have been otherwise, since "the obscure position of a village doctor must have been exceedingly limited, and therefore little likely to interest a reading public, at present anxious only for tales of great excitement." Everything follows this lead, and is plain and commonplace. The autobiographer's person is ordinary; and though he says, as the only son of a widow in a novel, he ought to have been slim and handsome, with a fair complexion and blue eyes, he had neither the one nor the other; for his figure was rather short and stout, his eyes were dark, and his complexion commonplace. Commonplace, too, are his abilities, his character, his strength. As strong as, and no stronger than, the average; his learning consisting in "the rudiments of a tolerable education picked up at a respectable school in the neighbourhood"; his abilities not particularly shining, but quite equal to those of his schoolfellows; and his attention to his studies, if not exemplary, yet leaving little to be complained of—he may be taken as the very type of mediocrity in all things. He is just the average youth of average middle-class fortunes; and the whole book is written in harmony with this keynote. With such a beginning we are not surprised to hear that our Doctor falls in love with his master's daughter, nor that he eventually marries her; nor, again, that she is as commonplace as himself. She is tall, with bright auburn hair, good teeth, a sweet voice, and a pleasant smile; but she is by no means handsome, being deeply marked with the smallpox; and she is not particularly clever, but she is capable and affectionate. In fact she is a good average woman of the better half of the commonplace section. After a very mild time of trouble and uncertainty in their love, the Doctor and his Kate marry; and in due course fall into the hands of a certain unprincipled Dr. Goff of Beauweir, who swindles them in all sorts of petty ways, but by whose nefarious proceedings our doctor is established at Beauweir, which in the end turns out well for him. A great part of the book is now taken up with sketches of the Beauweir people, none of whom have anything very distinctive about them, but who are just such people as one meets with in country places, where every one's peculiarities are known for want of something better to study; and where, too, they have room to expand and become exaggerated for want of that wholesome friction with the world which keeps them down in larger communities. How poor the pictorial and dramatic interest of this part of the book is may be inferred from the incidents put forward. One is, that a certain Mrs. Heblate, the wife of the village attorney, "had no family, and, like many others similarly situated, considered herself of a very fragile constitution, and was an excellent patient." The Doctor then goes on to say that at first he tried to persuade his fanciful patient there was nothing the matter with her, but finding this would not answer, he then took to sending her from time to time sundry bottles of mixtures which could do her no harm, and which kept her amused; but that his conscience reproached him on account of Mr. Heblate, who was not overstocked with worldly goods; and yet what could he do? Another couple are mentioned, of whom the husband is "stout and hale, but somewhat predisposed to gout, and the wife, an amiable woman with several children, all of whom had a strumous tendency." The Dissenting minister again was "hearty-looking without any physical characteristics, with the exception of a strongly-marked arcus senilis in each eye. I do not think I ever met with it so strongly developed in any man of his age." But nothing comes of any of these points—the innocent mixtures, the predisposition to gout, the strumous children, or the arcus senilis. These are the little touches which give such a peculiarly natural and truthful air to the book, but which make it at the same time so peculiarly flat and tedious.

Then we come to an odd eulogium on "poor respectable old women," of whom the Doctor professes himself "an excessive admirer," for the beauty of their lives and characters. "There was hardly one among them in our village who could not relate, in perfect humility, simplicity, and truth, some episode in her existence of surpassing beauty, many in which romance and reality were mixed up together in the most surprising manner." There is no doubt that many a life passed in a miserable clay cottage, in the presence of ignorance, privation, and irksome toil, would afford first-rate material for a tragedy or for an epic poem; but the Doctor deals with his cases so drily that he lets all the romance fall away, and we get to a bare core as little likely to germinate into a drama or a poem as so much dried grain if sown for harvest. One of the most important circumstances related of these poor old women is the breaking of a green glass walking-stick, which her sailor son had given a certain Mrs. Evans. Nothing would convince her but that this foretold her son's death, and when the East Indian mail arrived, and for the first time brought no letter from her boy, she was too firmly persuaded that he was dead, to be reasoned with. "In short, she continued to sink, and at last died, the idea that she should soon again meet her husband and son banishing every particle of fear from her mind." She might have lived, for "singularly enough, about six weeks after her burial, a letter arrived from her son, stating that he was in perfect health, and hoping in a few months the ship would be ordered back to England." Where the wonderful singularity of this fact is we confess ourselves unable to discover. It would have been singular if he had died when the green glass walking-stick was broken; but that he did not, and that he wrote to his mother saying he hoped to be soon ordered home, seems to us the very reverse of singularity in every way.

The sensationalism of this book, if we can apply so strong a term to so mild a production, is supplied by the following circumstances. First, the discovery, by quite sudden and unexpected means, of a rightful heir, who ousts from his unlawful holding an ill-conditioned narrow-natured man who has set all Beauweir to wrongs; next, the perpetration of forgery by the spoilt son of the Beauweir rector, and the consequent misery and humiliation of his family, especially of his harsh-tempered iron-willed mother, whose injudicious training was primarily the cause of the boy's ruin; then the death of the old Doctor's favourite daughter, her disease being that kind of decline which is brought on by a cold caught after a love disappointment; and lastly, an evening full of apparitions to the Doctor himself, when he is left old, childless, and wifeless, at the end of the story. But we are bound to confess that the sensationalism is of a very mild character indeed, and also that the whole of the Drummond-Lydgate affair —the unexpected turning up of the rightful heir—is but bunglingly managed, and wants much more artistic manipulation to make it reasonably clear. Still, in the day of small things one is thankful for minor mercies, and anything like an exciting event tells in such a book as the Doctor of Beauweir, the real value of which is in the natural way in which every-day failings and occurrences are related, and the quiet truthful air of the little family jealousies and local annoyances with which it abounds. The more intellectual point of the book is to show the indestructible quality of memory, and how things once impressed on the mind may get overshadowed, but are never lost. A long chapter is devoted to a recapitulation of all sorts of unimportant events that had happened to the autobiographer when a child, and the remembrance of which is brought to him on his revisiting the spot where they took place. On which occasion he takes care to have his fling at the scientific men who hold the development theory, for whose arguments he says he has always had "an unqualified contempt"; though the manner in which he seems to found his chief objections on the score of memory—as if memory were exclusively a human faculty—is rather hazy. Dogs, horses, asses, elephants—to cite no more examples—all have memory in a very marked degree; so that to deduce the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, and the sentence to be passed on each man at the Day of Judgment, from the fact that we cannot forget what has once occurred, and that "the account man will have to render to the Almighty Judge at the last day is indelibly written on the brain or mind of the individual himself," is to fish in waters which may bring more to the angler's hook than he bargained for. It is strange how even clever men—and the author of the Doctor of Beauweir is clever—will go on committing that most fatal mistake in advocacy, building up what is perhaps a divine truth in itself on a perfectly unsound basis, and so giving occasion to the enemy to rejoice, and strengthening his position by the reason of their own weakness. The development theory may not be right, but it has not been given to the author of the Doctor of Beauweir to prove it wrong. Ne sutor ultra crepidam; nor should this writer venture beyond a quiet description of every-day life, flavoured with a little mild pathology to give more reality and life-likeness to his pages.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

THE second volume of Dr. Boynton's History of the American Navy * includes the greater part of the most critical period of the late civil war, during which the fleets of the North were most actively and effectively employed. The first was chiefly occupied with the history of the organization of the Department, and the preparations made for operations on that extensive scale which the Federal scheme of hostilities required, and it also contained an account of the measures which brought about the bombardment of Fort Sumter, and hurried the country into civil war. The narrative preserves no very perfect chronological order, and the present volume resumes the subject at this critical point, and rediscusses a dispute which seems to have arisen in the Federal Cabinet regarding the expedition to Charleston in April, 1861. The author does not attempt to contradict the statement of the Southern envoys—which indeed is so fully corroborated from various quarters as to leave no doubt of its accuracy—that the Secretary of State had distinctly pledged himself that no attempt should be made to relieve Fort Sumter without full notice to the Confederates; and that, even after the preparations for the expedition had come to their knowledge, he answered their remonstrances with the assurance—"Faith as to Sumter fully kept; wait and see." There can be no doubt, in the face of this fact, either that the South was forced into the war without any choice of her own, or that those who so forced her equally anticipated the decision and overpowered the reluctance of the North, which had seemed disposed to let the seceding States depart in peace until its passions were roused by the so-called "outrage on the flag" which is now known to have been simply an act of self-defence. The natural inference would be one highly discreditable to the Federal Government at large, and to the President in particular; but, if Dr. Boynton's statements are to be relied on, they appear to point to a different conclusion, and to justify a doubt whether the assurances given by Mr. Seward were ever sanctioned by Mr. Lincoln, or made known to his colleagues. From this point the author plunges at once into the history of the naval operations; and relates the steps taken to render effectual the blockade by which the Federal Government undertook to close every port on the Southern coast from the Chesapeake to the Rio Grande, and the exploits on the coast-line and on the rivers, which, though they won less attention than the achievements of the army, conduced perhaps even more to the final issue. The boastful tone of the historian, exaggerated and amusing as it often is, is not wholly without justification. It is true that the task assigned to the Navy Department was easier than it seemed. It was not necessary to find ships of war for all the duties devolving upon the Navy; and the swift packet-boats belonging to the various lines running from New York to Southern ports, being rendered useless by the war, were found very effective blockaders, as they were never to be opposed to an armed enemy. With unlimited resources at command, in a country of first-rate shipbuilders, it was not difficult for Secretary Welles in a few months to place several hundred vessels, of one kind or another, at sea. But the total absence of routine red-tape which the department displayed, the vigour, rapidity, and energy of its administration, and the thorough adaptation of its means to the ends immediately in view, were at once characteristic of the national spirit, and creditable to the capacity of those entrusted with these important duties. The last-mentioned feature of Mr. Welles's administration is somewhat obscured by Dr. Boynton's extravagant eulogy. By extolling the American vessels as superior to those of European Powers in every respect whatever, by boasting of the Kearsage's victory over the worn-out and worse-armed Alabama, and affirming that the Monitors would destroy the English navy in a single encounter, he provokes in the reader's mind a reaction which leads him to forget—as the author forgets—the essential fact that the South had no navy. Of this fact Mr. Welles never lost sight, and on this all his plans were based. His Monitors were not, ship for ship, equal to some of the roughly constructed ironclads of the South, and would have been very helpless in ocean warfare; but for service on the coast, in harbours and rivers, and against land-batteries, which was their destined service, they were admirably suited. The Kearsage, and other vessels of the same class, were not intended to fight the fleets of France or England, but to chase swift blockade-runners and light Southern cruisers; and for this service they, in their turn, were perfectly adapted. So, again, it seems somewhat ridiculous to hear so much boasting over victories achieved against an enemy without ships, short of gunpowder, with inferior artillery, and outnumbered at every point by two or three to one. But the author's exaggerations, or the exuberant triumph of his countrymen, should not blind us to the fact that the Federal navy had to engage in an entirely new species of warfare; to fight heavy-armed forts and batteries, and to force passages under the fire of a commanding artillery; and the ease with which success was ultimately achieved does not detract from the honour due to the courage which attempted these exploits, or the skill which discerned their feasibility. If the Americans of the North did not display, as their panegyrists pretend, either daring or strategy superior to those of English generals and soldiers, they certainly did give proof of a higher degree of invention and adaptability, a quicker genius for discerning and seizing the advantages of their position, than English Governments or commanders have usually shown. If Northern writers would do franker and fuller justice to the enemy they conquered, their national exultation would find more sympathy and tolerance with European readers.

In this respect Dr. Draper sets them an admirable example. His History of the Civil War*, of which the second volume is now before us, is not free from strong party and national prejudice —as may be seen in the manner in which he treats the notorious proclamation of General Butler. But its very title displays a better spirit than that of most Northern historians of the war; the Southerners are as a rule, spoken of, not as "rebels," but Confederates; and full justice is rendered to the bravery of the men, the virtue, patriotism, and patience of the women, and the heroism with which the entire people endured the horrors of war, the privations inflicted by the blockade upon a nation accustomed to derive so large a portion of the necessaries of life from abroad, the desolation carried into their homes by the slaughter of the very flower of their youth and manhood, and the other sufferings which he himself sums up in the emphatic phrase, that the South, during the war, was in a state of siege. But even Dr. Draper is not a trustworthy guide. The national vanity that cannot bear to own a failure, nor rest satisfied without trying to explain away a disgrace, leads him too far from sober truth, and even from reasonable probability. Thus, when he claims the campaign of Bull Run as a "political success" for the Federals, basing his argument upon the assertion of an aggressive purpose on the part of the South and a defensive one on that of the North —imputing to the former a design, with a force not half that of their enemy, to take Washington, and denying by implication the notorious expectation of the Federal Government and the entire North that the army of the Potomac would march straight on to Richmond, and capture the Confederate capital at a blow—he not only provokes a smile at the moment, but destroys all confidence in his impartiality and accuracy for the future. His present volume brings the history down to the close of 1862, and the issue of what its author described as "the Bull against the Comet"—Mr. Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation.

* History of the American Civil War. By John William Draper, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Physiology and Chemistry in the University of New York, &c. &c. 3 vols. Vol. II. Containing the Events from the Inauguration of President Lincoln to the Proclamation of the Emancipation of the Slaves. New York: Harper Brothers. London: Trübner & Co. 1868.

Don Ramon Paez—an eminent Venezuelan gentleman, now, if we mistake not, residing as an exile in the United States—publishes, under the title of *Travels in South and Central America, a volume which, intended to be the first of a series, merely relates his experiences in a visit to the llanos, or prairies of Venezuela. The introduction, however, describes the port of La Guaira, and the city of Caraccas, the capital of the State; and the glowing colours in which the author paints the climate, the skies, the scenery, the fruits and flowers of his native land, its boundless resources, its extraordinary cheapness, its overflowing abundance of every natural condition of wealth, health, and happiness, would lead the uninformed reader to wonder how it is that so little is heard of Venezuela, that its produce never figures in the market, that it attracts no emigrants, and is scarcely visited by travellers, did not a reluctant half-sentence here and there remind him that this Paradise, like the other Spanish-American States, is "inhabited by demons," the author himself having been a sufferer by its revolutionary convulsions. General Paez—who, so far as we can gather from the manner in which he is spoken of in different passages, is the writer's father—had been one of the principal leaders of the Republicans during the Colombian War of Independence, and, at the head of a force recruited entirely among the Llaneros, or people of the wild cattle-farms of Venezuela, had gained successes over the Spaniards which had deeply endeared him to his half-savage troops, and given him the highest opinion of their quality. He owned extensive herds of cattle on the llanos, and the greater part of this volume is occupied with the account of a visit paid to his numerous farms, if farms they can be called where there was no trace of cultivation or enclosure, and only a rude log-house and a corral for collecting and branding the cattle which ranged at will over the unlimited natural pastures of the prairies. Nothing could well be rougher, wilder, or more trying to the sinews, nerves, and habits of a civilized man than such an expedition, unless it were the daily life of a Llanero. The cattle were utterly wild, the horses of those whose task it was to chase and capture them almost equally so, until trained to their peculiar and very difficult duties; and the dangers and hardships of everyday work on the plains are such that those of war must seem almost trifling in comparison. The waters which periodically inundate the llaños are inhabited by creatures even more savage than those of the land, and certainly more strange to European ideas. The jaguar, or tiger, as he is here called, is less formidable than the crocodile or alligator of the rivers, and much less common. The presence of the gymnotii, or electric eels, makes many parts of the rivers impassable, even by the most skilful and daring swimmers, as their shocks are liable to paralyse both horse and man. Everywhere, moreover, swarm fish of smaller size and less terrible appearance, but even more dreaded. One creature, of no very alarming size, has teeth which cut a gash as clean and deep as could be inflicted by razor or knife; and the caribe, a little fish no bigger than a perch, bites so fearfully that men fly from it, even on land, as from a snake or a hornet. It is attracted by the sight and smell of blood, and a wounded animal in the water is sure to be destroyed; while the strongest tackle, and even the hook itself, is bitten through with ease by its terrible and sharklike teeth, small and insignificant as they seem. These fish, moreover, swim in shoals, and instead of avoiding man—as nearly all terrestrial creatures, unless attacked or exasperated, will do—assail him at once with a ferocity unequalled by beasts of prey. The Llanero will venture to meet the alligator, with no weapon but his knife; but he shrinks from the caribe. The natural historian would find on the llanos of Venezuela abundant occupation for years; and this little volume, brief and unscientific as its descriptions are, is full of interest for all who have the slightest curiosity regarding the characters, forms, and habits of the stranger and more out-of-the-way species of the animal creation. In short, there are few readers who will not peruse the narrative, from end to end, with pleasure and profit, and hope that Don Ramon will fulfil his promise, and relate his adventures in other parts of South America as simply and graphically as he has told the story of his experiences on the llanos.

A far inferior, but not uninteresting, work is Mr. Hammond's account of Hunting Adventures in the Northern Wilds †—in the woods, lakes, and hills of the north-western part of the State of New York. His expedition was, as we understand, undertaken some years back; and probably his descriptions would not apply in all respects to the actual state of the country. In those days game so abounded there that to kill more fish and venison than could possibly be eaten required very little exertion or trouble. The waters swarmed with trout of exquisite flavour and considerable size, and deer abounded in the woods. A single dog was sure in a short time to bring a buck or doe within reach of the sportsman's rifle, and the cast of a fly never failed to draw the trout to the surface as fast as the angler could make his throws. Mr. Hammond himself met with few remarkable adventures; and the best part of his book consists of the stories of the old woodsman or hunter who accompanied him, and whose quaint dialect, dry humour, and simple, stubborn, common-sense morality suggest that Cooper's well-known hero may probably have been drawn from the life.

* Travels and Adventures in South and Central America. First Series. Life in the Llanos of Venezuela. By Don Ramon Paez. New York: Scribner & Co. London: S. Low, Son, & Marston. 1868.

† Hunting Adventures in the Northern Wilds; or, a Tramp in the Chateaugay Woods. By J. H. Hammond. Philadelphia: J. E. Potter. London: S. Low, Son, & Marston. 1868.

A retired actor of thirty years' experience can hardly fail to have collected a store of reminiscences that would be exceedingly entertaining if only their possessor knew what to select, and how to tell his story. But when the author has travelled in all directions, and to all quarters, throughout such a country as the United States, has roamed from the Puritan North to the South in the palmy days of Southern society, and changed his quarters from great cities like Chicago to the log villages of the Far West, or the small towns of the half-settled portions of the cotton States, and been brought into contact with all the contrasts and all the eccentricities of a nation so widely scattered, so curiously compounded, and containing so many diversities of race, character, and circumstance, he must be a very dull fellow if he has not accumulated material for a very interesting autobiography. That of Mr. Sol. Smith * is somewhat too prolific, and slightly tinged with egotistic tediousness, and a certain sort of vulgarity, and would have been better if it had been only half as long; but, nevertheless, it will afford plenty of amusement to the reader who is not too conscientious to skip all that relates to the author's personal fortunes, and to pick only "the plums out of the pudding."

Orpheus C. Kerr seems to improve with experience. At least one-half his present book †—that in which he views through a moral medium of "smoked glass" the solar glories of the American nation, and reduces impeachment, reconstruction, the policy of Congress, the grandeur of the Presidential trial, and other objects of newspaper panegyric, to their natural dimensions and real meaning—is lively, amusing, and not too spiteful. The other half relies for the principal part of its fun on the poverty and distress of the conquered Southerners, and on the unconquerable spirit which contrasts so forcibly with their fallen condition—subjects of ridicule which might be differently regarded by readers of a more generous temper than the satirist.

A sensational work on the Thrilling Adventures of the Early Settlers ‡ may serve young America as a substitute for such works as Jack Sheppard and Dick Turpin. The stories have generally the advantage of being, if not strictly true, yet accepted as truth; and the Newgate Calendar could not furnish a list of crimes and horrors more ample than that contained in this small volume. The acts of frightful cruelty and deliberate wickedness, related with conventional notes of censure, but in a tone of moral indifference, which give zest to nearly half the stories in the book, render it unfit to be placed in the hands of boys, for whom an expurgated edition would possess great interest from the hairbreadth escapes, marvellous achievements, and deeds of desperate courage in which the narratives abound.

Western Border Life § is a story, written from a partisan point of view, of the experiences of a girl from the East who spends a few months as governess in Kansas and Missouri, during the disturbances in the former State. Stories of the Prairie ‖ is a selection from the works of Cooper, also confined to those which relate to the wild life of the Far West—a theme that seems to have charms for American readers, despite its triteness, if we may judge from the number of works on this subject that pass through our hands in the course of a year. A Few Friends ¶ is the title of a very lively, entertaining, and, we may add, useful little book. Its framework is simply a story of a small party or society of people, chiefly young, who meet at one another's houses from time to time to amuse themselves with games not absolutely childish; and in this way directions are given for playing a dozen or so of games very well suited to a large family party or Christmas gathering. There is also a clever example of a charade, to show with how little trouble and expense these can be acted, if a little ingenuity be exercised in adapting the scenes to the domestic "stage" and "properties." Many of the games are new to us, and all seem pleasant and appropriate.

Of a work on the Human Intellect  we cannot here pretend to tell our readers more than that it is written by a professor of metaphysics at one of the best American colleges, is very large, and somewhat closely printed. Professor Cooley's Text-Book of Natural Philosophy †† is a simple and elementary treatise on mechanics, optics, acoustics, &c., adapted for schools, or beginners in these studies. Mr. Brown's illustrations of five hundred mechanical movements *, or elementary forms of machinery, appear to be meant, not for the scholar, but for the practical artisan. Tim Bunker's Papers † on farming deal not only with American agriculture and farming operations, and other matters of serious interest to the great yeoman population of the North and West, but also with the habits and customs of the farming class, their solecisms of speech and manner, their peculiarities and perversities of behaviour—all treated in a pleasant and sensible spirit, and in a tone unlikely to irritate even those whose errors are gently ridiculed. Most of the papers assume the form of anecdotes of the imaginary writer's experiences, and are couched in the style and tone of a Connecticut yeoman writing to the editor of the journal in which they first appeared, as he might write to a distant friend.

We have two volumes of verse on our list. One, the Changed Cross ‡, is a collection of hymns, "principally waifs from magazines and newspapers," of which, as usual, some are good, some bad and most indifferent. Life Below, in Seven Poems §—as most readers will imagine from the title—belongs almost entirely to the last category.

POLITICS AS A PROFESSION.

THE Quarterly Review, in an article entitled "Politics as a "Profession," undertakes to show its readers that politics are no longer so good a profession as they used to be, and that, so far as they are worth following as a profession, it is more difficult and more degrading to follow them. An article dealing with current social facts more or less familiar to every one cannot fail to have some truth in it. More especially the Quarterly seems to us to be stating only what is incontestable when it points out that persons who take an interest in politics or in special political subjects have now, in an increasing degree, a power of influencing opinion and attaining their object through the periodical press, by writing books, or by lecturing, which makes it very doubtful whether they could do more or even so much by entering the House of Commons, and they gladly avail themselves of any reason for avoiding the expense, worry, and nuisance of a contested election. It is difficult to see what a man who can write when he pleases and what he pleases in a leading daily or weekly newspaper, who has all the society he cares for, who has a competence, but not the large fortune requisite for high office, and does not desire anything from Government, gains by going into the House of Commons. Those, too, who wish to carry any great social reform, to benefit the poor in any particular way, or to fertilize public thought with new ideas, now find that they can do more out of the House, with full liberty to say, write, and do what they please, than they could do in the House, where they must be generally condemned to silence and always to compromises. Far from thinking this, however, to be a loss to the nation, we think it a distinct gain. More people are usefully and happily employed than they would be if a seat in the House was the only way of keeping up an interest in political subjects, or of exercising some gentle kind of political influence. All representative assemblies, too, have inherent defects, such as the difficulty of getting good measures carried through them, which the House of Commons shares with the rest. In England it is only a strong Government, headed by resolute men, that can get Bills of any value passed; but at present there is no reason to think that we are particularly badly off. We have at least got a Government with a fair proportion of able and determined men in it, backed by quite as large a majority as can be held together. The present House, too, inherits some part of that load of electoral iniquity which its predecessors have transmitted to it. Bribery and intimidation have had much more to do with the composition of the House than they ought to have. There are also new evils which have sprung up lately, and in some measure from the extension of the franchise. The necessary and legitimate expenses of candidates are greatly increased by the expansion of the electoral body, and elections have in some places passed too much into the hands of wire-pullers, principally through the operation of the fanciful clause for giving members to minorities. But when all this is said, it remains to be asked what are the special complaints against the House of Commons which make it less worth while than formerly to pursue the profession of politics systematically. The complaints which the Quarterly makes are mainly these—that there is an increasing tendency to give power to the domination of cliques, that the best men get degraded by the necessities to which they find themselves subject, and that men with ideas but without means cannot find seats. If there is some truth in these complaints—and there never yet was a representative assembly in any age or country against which something of the sort might not be said—there is at present very much exaggeration in them. The cliques from which danger is alleged to be apprehended are the clique of railway directors and the clique of Irish members swayed by the Romish clergy. There are said to be 130 railway directors in the present House, and railway legislation may again be warped, as it has often been warped already, to suit the Companies rather than the public; and the particular form of danger which the Quarterly anticipates is that some great national question, such as peace or war, may eventually be determined by the refusal or agreement of the Government to buy a particular line. In the same way, it is supposed that the Irish priests may get under their control some day seventy Irish members, and that these seventy members may some day come to vote under direct orders from Rome. The Quarterly thinks this more likely to happen soon than it has been at any time since Catholic Emancipation. As this is only a speculation for the future, it is not worth much discussing. But the question to be decided is not whether some clique may not, under some unknown circumstances, exercise a pernicious power, but whether the chance of its doing so makes politics less worth following as a profession than formerly. In the days when politics are supposed to have been really worth following, there were cliques enough and to spare. O'CONNELL's tail was formed, wriggled vigorously behind him, and then fortunately melted away. Has the writer in the Quarterly forgotten how the clique of the landowners shouted and voted, under a kind of divine frenzy, when they thought their cows were in danger from the Cattle Plague? Selfish interests and the interests of classes too often in every assembly prevail against justice and wisdom, but a politician must be uncommonly fainthearted who will not enter on his profession for fear lest the English nation should be stopped by railway directors from making peace or war, or by Irish members from upholding religious freedom.

The next reason given for avoiding politics as a profession is that public men are now degraded by having to comply with the exigencies of their party or their constituencies. That there is something of this degradation now to be deplored seems only too probable, and that in past times there has been very much to deplore is certain; but the particular instances selected to show how this degradation tells on eminent men are unfortunate. The instances given are those of Mr. GLADSTONE, who stumped Lancashire, and of Mr. MILL, who patronized BRADLAUGH and BEALES. That Mr. GLADSTONE said a great many unwise and ill-considered things while he was stumping Lancashire, and that there was too much of his endless and passionate oratory at that time of excitement, few even of his admirers would dispute. The only wonder is that a man so sensitive and so excitable did not commit himself even more when he found himself opposed with such bitter hostility, with misrepresentations so flagrant, and by such high-handed domineering over dependents. That the Quarterly should be able to show that he used a phrase about Ireland which a judicious person would have guarded by a careful addition, and that he should have stated the fact that the Tories were frightened into a Reform Bill by the pulling down of the Hyde Park railings, without adding that it was of course wrong to pull them down, do not seem very unpardonable offences, considering that he was then fighting a hard fight in a county where the clerical friends of the Quarterly were furiously warning their parishioners that, if they voted for Mr. GLADSTONE, Protestant martyrs would soon be burnt again at Smithfield. But, anyhow, all this was entirely Mr. GLADSTONE's own doing. Nobody asked him to stump; he was not yielding to any fatal necessity imposed upon him by any one; the faults and the excellences he displayed were entirely his own. In the same way, whatever errors Mr. MILL committed were entirely voluntary. He sacrificed his seat, and alienated many of his supporters, because he would insist on his own crotchets and adhere to his special principles. He has always insisted on the duty of the supreme Legislature to uphold the rights of feeble and inferior races, and he carried this out by prosecuting Mr. EYRE, even after success in prosecuting him had become hopeless. He has always insisted, in his anxiety for the liberty of opinion, on the advantage of encouraging individuals to advance even the most outrageous beliefs, and he showed to what utter extremity he was prepared to follow this out by making a contribution to the expenses of Mr. BRADLAUGH. But if ever a man acted on his own judgment Mr. MILL did in both these cases. He offended his constituents, he frightened his party, he lost among the philosophical the credit of being a philosopher. In fact, he pleased himself; and a less apposite example of the degradation attending on political subserviency cannot be imagined. If the Quarterly wanted to give two instances, not of men who have been corrupted by political life into insincerity, but of men who have created an almost universal impression of their being unusually sincere in the world of politics, and adopting and advocating whatever opinion their reason or fancy may from time to time prompt them to entertain, it could not find better examples than those of Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. MILL.

That men with ideas and without means cannot now get into Parliament so easily as they once could, when rotten boroughs still existed, is a very familiar fact. We have long ago had to settle whether rotten boroughs should be allowed to continue for the object of providing such men with seats. But the advantage of rotten boroughs to men of this sort can only be properly estimated when we take into consideration the disadvantages to those same men which rotten boroughs entailed. The chief of these disadvantages was that they were led to look on themselves as articles of political value, to be bought by the first or the most willing purchaser. We have lately had lives published of Sir JAMES MACINTOSH, of Lord LYNDHURST, and Lord BROUGHAM, and it is quite evident that they all started in life as clever politicians, undetermined which side in politics they should take, until they knew which side would provide them with a seat. For many years the Whigs would not provide BROUGHAM with a seat, because they thought they were not sure of him. Now our young men with ideas and without means are at least in this respect born in happier days. They are not kept waiting to learn from the chances of a nomination to a rotten borough what their ideas are; and they may have the satisfaction of believing themselves honest. Whether men with ideas and without means are now, as a matter of fact, kept out of Parliament, it is difficult to say. The answer will depend on what we understand by ideas and means. There are several men of good education and position who have only a small fortune, who have very good abilities, and who would like to get into Parliament, but cannot get in. There are several hundreds of such men, many more than enough to fill the whole House of Commons. As the land, commerce, and the law must engross the vast majority of seats, and as of the few left a proportion ought properly to be held by men with special knowledge, such as that acquired in India or the colonies, the proper scheme of things would be thrown out of balance if more than a few seats were left for the men of ideas. If by ideas we mean the fair average ability of well-educated men, then several candidates possessing this qualification offered themselves at the last election. Some, whose defeat we much regret, were defeated, having in most instances stood on the spur of the moment for places where they had no chance; some succeeded, as if by a miracle, and were welcomed by constituencies the names of which they scarcely knew. Although Berkshire, or Clitheroe, or Chippenham, or Abingdon, or Woodstock, might have been wiser than they were, yet Frome, Dungarvan, the Border Burghs, and Perthshire were strangely kind. If we could have all our wishes gratified, we should certainly wish that the present House contained at least half a dozen more of these men, who may be spoken of as men of ideas, and half a dozen special representatives of the working-classes. If it were not quite so rich and quite so mediocre, it might be a better House, but we see no reason to despair of the present state of things being improved hereafter. That elections should cost less is a point greatly to be desired and earnestly to be striven for. The transfer of election petitions to the Judges promises to work strongly in this direction, and if corrupt local influences can be got rid of or abated, constituencies will begin to look out for men likely to do them credit. A man whom his friends pronounce to be amiable and clever will never be able to rely on dropping down suddenly on a constituency and carrying his election in a quiet gentlemanly way. But men who have real ability, and will count the cost, and are prepared to encounter many mortifications both before and after they are elected, may still hope to follow politics as a profession, and not find themselves more disappointed than they must be in a profession full of disagreeables, poorly rewarded, requiring very special gifts, and only to be recommended to men without means, if they are conscious of unusual powers or are sustained by a profound desire to do good.

BELGIUM.

An exaggerated importance has been attached to the death of the young Crown Prince of BELGIUM. Exceptional sympathy with the domestic griefs of conspicuous or Royal personages is perfectly natural, for indifference to the troubles of strangers proceeds chiefly from ignorance and want of attention, while the loss of a child who happened to be heir to a throne in some degree impresses the imagination; and a transient feeling of compassion unconsciously suggests a fear that some public interest is concerned in the event. The extinction of the Saxon dynasty in Belgium, even if it is not destined to survive the present generation, is still, it may be hoped, remote; nor can it be reasonably expected that thirty or forty years hence the fortunes of the nation will depend on the accident of hereditary succession. A similar period has elapsed since the crown was accepted by Prince LEOPOLD, then a middle-aged and childless widower. It is still probable that the reigning sovereign or his brother may leave male issue, and if the Belgians should, towards the end of the present century, be in search of a King, the COBURG family is not likely to have disappeared from Europe. Spain is at this moment engaged in the same operation under greater difficulties; for the candidate who may be chosen by the Cortes will be regarded by a part of the population as a usurper, and there will be two or three sets of Pretenders ready on every convenient occasion to question his title. To some Spanish politicians the choice of a dynasty seems so easy and ordinary a transaction that they think it desirable to appoint, in the person of ESPARTERO, a provisional occupant of the throne. No such fantastic scheme would be likely to find favour in Belgium, where there will be abundance of time for considering the nomination of a successor when it has become certain that the male line of the reigning House is about to become extinct. The danger which is really apprehended is, not that it will be impossible to find a King, but that the kingdom will be absorbed in the dominions of a powerful neighbour. The time has long passed when States, like private properties, derived their unity from their owners, or became by marriage and bequest parts of larger agglomerations of territory. It was in this way that Brabant and Flanders passed from their indigenous dynasty to Burgundy, from Burgundy, through Austria, to Spain, and ultimately again to Austria; but the precedent is wholly obsolete. The annexation of the Austrian Netherlands to the French Republic and Empire reminds Belgian patriots of a more urgent cause of anxiety.

It was only by a happy accident that the Earldom of Flanders escaped, at the close of the middle ages, from becoming a province of France. The power of the Dukes of BURGUNDY, and of the Spanish and German branches of the House of Austria, alone secured the separate existence which has since grown into permanent or temporary independence. The establishment of a powerful monarchy or republic in the Low Countries was unfortunately prevented in the first instance by the final adhesion, during the Dutch War of Independence, of the Flemish and Walloon districts to Spain and to Rome; and, two centuries and a half later, by the failure of the most hopeful experiment of the Congress of Vienna. The fault may perhaps have lain with the Dutch, or with the family of ORANGE; and it was undoubtedly difficult to mould into a single nation two races of different language and religion; but if Holland and Belgium could have been content to retain even a federal union with one another, there would have been no question of risk from the ambitious designs attributed to Prussia or to France. Both countries are free, wealthy, and industrious, nor are their interests in any way reciprocally antagonistic. Of late years they have both been disposed to abandon their ancient jealousies, and some Belgian politicians hold that the separation in 1830 was a mistake; but even if reunion were otherwise probable, it would be impracticable, because it would be forbidden by France. The small State of Belgium, with half its population speaking French, is easier to deal with than a Kingdom of the Netherlands, although there may be no direct or immediate intention of profiting by its inability to defend itself. The project of including Belgium within the French Customs' frontier was suggested by the renewal of the Zollverein after the establishment of the North German Confederation. Frenchmen are perhaps scarcely to be blamed for the mistaken belief that the German States have no closer bond of union than the ties of language, religion, and neighbourhood, which connect France with Belgium or with parts of Switzerland. All the changes which have occurred during ten years in Europe, although they are for the most part beneficial in themselves, endanger the independence of minor States. The notion of the equality of sovereigns among themselves, and the theory of the balance of power, have simultaneously gone out of fashion.

There is no reason to apprehend that, during the reign of NAPOLEON III., there will be any attempt to annex Belgium to France by main force; nor will the contrivance of universal suffrage be applied until there is plausible reason for assuming the consent of a large part of the population. The most imminent danger to Belgian independence is threatened by the dissensions of two parties which are almost equally balanced. In no other country except Ireland is the priesthood so fanatical, or so powerful among its own adherents, as in Belgium, while the not less numerous Liberal party is united in resistance to clerical pretensions and encroachments. Behind political differences there is often a common stock of opinions and of interests, which limits the field of contest; but ecclesiastical and secular predominance are incompatible, and a struggle between their respective advocates always tends to become internecine. Loyalty and patriotism are regarded by sacerdotal politicians as subordinate considerations; and, on the other hand, modern democracy affects a cosmopolitan character. Almost any French Government has opportunities and excuses for encouraging either party. As the eldest son of the Church, or as the heir and representative of the Revolution, a French Emperor may with equal facility assume the patronage of orthodoxy, or of anti-clerical Liberalism. The protector of Rome has sometimes been denounced as a new PONTIUS PILATE, and only a year ago he was publicly prayed at with unusual virulence by the POPE himself; but, since the defection of Austria and Spain, he is the most orthodox of European sovereigns in his relations to the Holy See. If the conflict of parties in Belgium at any time degenerates into civil strife, the defeated faction may probably invite foreign interference. Apostacy of this kind would be fatal to a disaffected minority in Spain, or even in Switzerland; but between France and Belgium there are neither Alps nor Pyrenees. In a not impossible contingency, French sentiment may perhaps demand compensation for the further aggrandizement of a neighbouring State which is already considered too powerful; and as the German provinces on the left bank of the Rhine are finally out of reach, popular covetousness will perhaps be directed to an easier acquisition, which, according to common report, was suggested in 1866 by the Prussian Minister to the Emperor NAPOLEON. The coincidence of excitement in France with an application for aid by the Clerical or Liberal party in Belgium might probably lead to decisive and lamentable results. The best chance for Belgian independence will be found in the adjournment of a crisis which may perhaps, in an altered state of circumstances, cease to be dangerous.

The continuance or expiration of the dynasty of LEOPOLD can scarcely affect the prospects of Belgium. A constitutional King could scarcely offer any serious impediment to annexation, and a casual vacancy of the throne would, according to modern notions, furnish but a feeble pretext for foreign encroachment. It has been oddly suggested that the future marriage of the EMPEROR'S son to a Belgian Princess might involve the absorption of Belgium into France; but the constituent legislators of 1830 prudently guarded against the danger by confining the right of succession exclusively to males. As a daughter of the present KING or of the Count of FLANDERS could make no claim to the Crown, it is evident that she could not convey any title to her husband. Great monarchies can afford to adopt any convenient rule of succession, and in England Queens regnant have been popular; but States which are in any degree liable to be annexed, or to be reduced to a condition of dependence, ought to abide rigorously by the Salic law. The Revolution which drove the male line from the Spanish throne enabled LOUIS PHILIPPE and M. GUIZOT to contrive their notorious plot for providing an Orleanist appanage and a new family alliance. No similar risk would be incurred even if the absurd system of premature betrothal were revived in the case of King LEOPOLD'S daughter. The KING himself, though he was formerly said to be too much under the influence of the priests, has hitherto not abandoned the impartiality on which his father's just reputation was mainly founded. The popularity of his name will, with prudent conduct, secure his throne as long as the people are satisfied with their actual form of government, and with their independent position; but the son of an elected ruler has no divine right which could be placed in competition with any general desire for revolutionary change. It may well happen that time will solve by some unexpected method the problems which perplex Belgian politicians.

EARL RUSSELL'S LAST LETTER.

EARL RUSSELL has his place in the great economy of English politics. His function certainly is not that of a pilot fish, as has been said, or of a pilot balloon either; at least we sincerely hope that he does not represent the policy, or want of policy, of the Government on the Irish Church question. His place is much more like that of a buoy showing the set of currents, and telling of the perilous rocks and shallows. Where Earl RUSSELL is, there is danger; and at just those spots where the surf breaks and the eddies boil round Earl RUSSELL, tossing and pitching at an uneasy anchorage, the ship of the State had better keep a clear offing. "Pembroke "Lodge, February 3, 1868." "Pembroke Lodge, January 18, "1869." "My dear FORTESCUE." Poor dear FORTESCUE indeed! What if he had been influenced, what if we had any of us been influenced—and, still worse, what if any of us are to be influenced—by the great epistolographer? Twelve months ago Earl RUSSELL proposed the disestablishment of the Protestant Episcopal Church, but maintained its claim for retaining an endowment to the amount of one-eighth of its present revenues. Moreover, he proposed the co-ordinate endowment of the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian communions out of funds to be obtained from the remaining seven-eighths of the Irish Church property. As everybody knows, this plan was no novelty, and it had just been recommended by Earl GREY, who inherited the principle of it from Mr. PITT. But in a few weeks Earl RUSSELL found that nobody would have this Eirenicon, sensible as it was; that to suggest it was now too late; moreover, that it was damaged because the Tory Government were likely to adopt it; and because, perhaps on this very account, Mr. GLADSTONE had declared for a policy which not only proclaimed disestablishment, but disendowment, and not only disendowment, but alienation of all Church funds from sectarian purposes, together with a withdrawal of the small alms and subsidies which had been given to the two non-established communions. That is to say, Mr. GLADSTONE hoisted the standard of Voluntaryism. Earl RUSSELL, while accepting Mr. GLADSTONE'S policy in a second letter to dear FORTESCUE, again explained, apologized for, eulogized, and all but proposed his old—or Lord GREY'S—plan. And now he is much, as it seems, where he was. He is all for Mr. GLADSTONE, and all for his own favourite scheme; all for himself and all for everybody else; he is for disestablishment, and even for disendowment, but for a disendowment which looks very like disendowment first and re-endowment afterwards. There is to be secularization, because it is a constitutional principle for the State to strip the old Church whenever the State pleases; and here the great principle by which Woburn Abbey is a Bedford estate is maintained. But then the State, like DORCAS, is to make up new coats and garments, not so large and cumbrous as the old ones, but warranted to fit well and suit the prevailing fashion; and the Episcopalian Protestants, after all, are not to be turned out to perish in the cold. Earl RUSSELL may well say that he cannot congratulate himself on being "precise as to disendow-"ment"; and when he complains that "there seems to have "been some confusion in the Resolutions of the House of "Commons on this subject," we are tempted to add that the fog and haze must have spread into the Upper House, and the confusion must have confused Earl RUSSELL himself.

But this is always the case. Confused and uncertain reasoners always accuse the intelligence of their hearers; and, because Earl RUSSELL has not made up his mind, he thinks that the majority of the House of Commons and the constituencies—and, as he addresses the Irish Secretary, perhaps the PREMIER and his colleagues—have not either. And his letter must be intended, if for anything, to assist the judgment of the Lower House, perhaps of Mr. GLADSTONE himself. No doubt it may have this effect, that from its pages may be culled, by every section of politicians, something to strengthen or to favour their conclusions. For it is not so much that Earl RUSSELL has not made up his mind on the great question of the day, but he has made up twenty minds on it. He is not to be charged with coming to a lame and impotent conclusion, since he has come to half a dozen conclusions, and not one of them lame and impotent. He is impartial; but only in the sense that he appears to agree with everybody, and to have a good word for everybody and everything. Black is black and very black; white unquestionably white; but both black and white have much to be said for them. This is reassuring, and full of political wisdom, when every party and section of politicians has come to the conclusion that the only alternative is black or white. However, the statesman who adopted the Appropriation Clause, entered office pledged to carry it, and contentedly remained in office without carrying it, may now be pardoned if, after more than thirty years of this sort of experience, he sees no inconsistency in advocating Mr. GLADSTONE's policy, and with the same breath recommending us—not without plausible, and to many people irrefragable, arguments—to accept that very ground which Mr. GLADSTONE has cut away from his own, Earl RUSSELL's, and everybody's feet.

Thus Earl RUSSELL insists on the policy of redistributing the Irish ecclesiastical revenues. The Regium Donum and the Maynooth endowments are to be reviewed, reappropriated, but by no means to be withdrawn. It is neither logical nor equitable, because the Irish Church is to be disestablished, that the Presbyterians and Romanists are to be robbed or impoverished; and why so? because the first duty of the State, according to my LORD MACAULAY, is to provide for the religious and moral wellbeing of the community. A pregnant and forcible principle by which—or we have misread every book and misconstrued every discussion on Church and State—endowments always, and establishments for the most part, have been vindicated. To provide for the religious wants of the people is a duty enforced by natural religion, and recommended apart from revelation. So Earl RUSSELL argues, and, after his wont, falls back upon his books. There is quite a catena of authorities on this head; to mention no others, PLATO, POLYBIUS, and CICERO, all Greek and all Roman philosophy. But religion is now Christian; therefore, with the full light of Christianity beaming upon us, we must take care that this light shines before men. Of this light the Churches of ROME and GENEVA, of LUTHER, CALVIN, and CRANMER, are all—and, Earl RUSSELL hardly seems to deny, equally—the candlesticks. This sacred light we must take care to kindle on every hill. Earl RUSSELL sees it glowing and blazing under the gorgeous dome of St. Peter's, and ennobling with as true a radiance the Scotch moorside where the persecuted Presbyterian worshipped without a roof over his head. This light is now obscured by the progress of sceptical opinions, and of a rationalism denounced equally by Bishop DUPANLOUP and Dr. MACLEOD. Here is our danger alike and our duty —our danger that "Christianity itself" runs the risk of being extinguished by sceptical opinions, our duty to see that it is not extinguished. Impressed with these sentiments —and they are shared in, or at any rate expressed quite as forcibly, if not with such eloquence, by Mr. DISRAELI and Lord CAIRNS as by Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE's correspondent —Earl RUSSELL "approaches the question of disendowment"; and then he elaborately broaches a complicated scheme for giving all the three communions funds and property and temporal means, which certainly look very like endowments, whatever they may be called. First, there is the claim on behalf of the present Establishment based on prescription. Prescription may have its bigoted side, and prescription might have been pleaded on behalf of the Druids; but prescription is not all bad. Indeed, the argument from prescription is a very bad argument as against leaving the present Establishment with its existing funds, but no argument at all against presenting the same body with new funds. This, if we understand it, is Earl RUSSELL's reasoning, and it seems to be very like BALAAM constrained to bless when he wanted to curse. And so far does Earl RUSSELL allow himself to be carried by his zealous recognition of the wrong which would be inflicted on the Irish Church by confiscation, that he frankly, in the very teeth of what he calls a hustings' chorus against the anomalies and the abuses of that Church, declares that "these "anomalies and abuses are in reality among the most useful "parts of the Establishment." And with a boldness, not to say audacity, which would surprise the world in anybody but Earl RUSSELL, he defends, and not only defends, but extols, the spectacle of a Protestant clergyman, with a congregation of two or ten or twenty persons, surrounded by a Roman Catholic population of four or five thousand. Such a clergyman is not without his use; his church ought not to fall to ruin; his glebe house is not to be emptied; he is not to be improved off the face of the earth as an anomaly, still less as an abuse.

Now we all know who rushes in where who fears to tread. We are not going to say a word about fools or angels. There is very little of fool, or angel, either about Earl RUSSELL or Mr. DISRAELI; but we much doubt whether this argument which Earl RUSSELL—who is for disendowment—offers will ever be urged by the most fervent champion of endowment. After this broad and expansive vindication of the principle of an endowed Establishment, applied to the most crucial and damaging instance, it is almost superfluous to go into Earl RUSSELL's details; or to note that he would consequently maintain all the churches and all the glebe-houses (and, we suppose, glebes too) of the disestablished Establishment, and would further supply the Romanist and Presbyterian communities with churches and parsonages out of the present ecclesiastical funds of Ireland. Earl RUSSELL would not only build these edifices, but would assign funds for their repairs and perpetual maintenance. This he would do as a statesman; and as a religious man he would maintain a clergyman with a flock of two, as a breakwater against the flood of sceptical opinions. Whether all this would be right and politic we are not now saying; but that it should be seriously put forward by a sincere advocate of Mr. GLADSTONE, can only be accounted for by the fact that Mr. GLADSTONE's advocate is Earl RUSSELL, and that we have had some experience of Earl RUSSELL's peculiar method of recommending his friends' and his own principles. It is but a trifling objection to this plan that it proposes for these purposes to assign to each of the three communions exactly the same sum —namely, 120,000*l.* a year—whereas the numbers of the three communions still stand at six-eighths, one-eighth, and one-eighth respectively. After having sponged up most of the ecclesiastical revenues for those strictly ecclesiastical purposes to which, as one believes—but of course one is wrong, or Earl RUSSELL is wrong, and for Earl RUSSELL to be wrong is an impossibility—Mr. GLADSTONE has pledged himself and his followers that they are not to be applied, it is poor work in Earl RUSSELL to be very precise and minute in doling out the crumbs and fragments that remain to some ideal aged couples basking in almshouses, or to the imaginary orphan babes and sucklings, the ideal and poetical children of involuntary poverty, who are at present in the workhouse.

Qualis ab incepto. Earl RUSSELL is Earl RUSSELL still. He thinks that he is the most practical of statesmen, while he is what the French call a mere idéologue. He affects to be original; which he may be, only that Earl GREY, Mr. BENCE JONES, Mr. TRENCH, and everybody else, has been before him. He reads them all, admires them all, admits what everybody says; and then considers himself to be very impartial, because he sees that everybody is right, and that the very opposite arguments to theirs are all right too. But then it is a question about Ireland; and Earl RUSSELL knows that, to solve an Irish difficulty, the best way is to make confusion worse confounded than ever. This Earl RUSSELL has done, and not for the first time; but his latest triumph in this curious art of statesmanship is assuredly his greatest.

THE TRIAL OF ELECTION PETITIONS.

PECULIAR constituencies require peculiar candidates. There is the constituency in which, time out of mind, an election has been an occasion for a general spree, when beer and whisky are drunk as freely as water might be drunk at all times, when every attorney is expected to put every friend up to something more or less good, and when the British elector can safely reckon on attaining that culminating glory of having first drunk himself very drunk with the liquor of both parties, and, having pocketed the half-sovereigns of both parties, staggers to the poll and blurts out the name that accident suggests to him. A constituency of this kind wants a candidate of a jovial, generous, confiding temperament. As the constituents put it, they like a gentleman as is a gentleman; and when their emissaries have got hold, as they think, of the man to suit them, they invite him to come down and see the place. The leading local attorney of the party welcomes him with delight, and the candidate shows his sense of what is due in return by placing a cheque for a sum—not large, but still of satisfactory amount—in the hands of his new friend. But he is most cautious and explicit in directing that the money is only to go for the most clearly legal purposes. He will have nothing to do with corrupt practices, and as to bribery, it must be most distinctly understood that not one farthing is to be spent in that way. An account must be rendered of the money advanced, and vouchers kept for everything paid, that he may be sure nothing wrong has been done. His only object in advancing the money is to show that he is in earnest in the good cause, and that he is sufficiently solvent to meet the legitimate expenses that must fall on him, including, of course, the bill of his attentive host. The attorney thoroughly enters into his views, promises obedience, and the two apostles of purity proceed to walk about the town. The candidate is introduced to every one, is most pleasant and civil, is willing to talk anywhere and on anything; and as many of his supporters are in the habit of frequenting public-houses, he cannot do better than go there to seek them. He talks most affably to them, and shows that he too has heard the chimes at midnight; but he says, with a fall in his voice, that the pleasure of paying for their beer is denied him, and that, as their future member, he cannot do what as a private gentleman he would have done with infinite satisfaction. The result is, if all has gone off well, that it is pronounced he will do. He is decreed to be the right man in the right place. Who it is that pronounces this decree no one can pretend to sa unless they know who is the dark abysmal person that keeps himself entirely out of sight and prominence, but really manages the election. The word goes forth. The candidate has been found in whom it is safe to speculate. Instantly beer begins to flow, every one is a committeeman or a friend of a committeeman, or wants to know something or say something, and naturally needs refreshment. Money circulates freely. Obscure attorneys' clerks, petty publicans, insolvent tradesmen, go about with pockets full of money. Any one who wishes for a job can be hired as a messenger or a watcher, or as a watcher to watch the other watchers. A profuse expenditure is evidently going on, but the candidate does not contribute a farthing towards it, nor does his agent, nor does any one of his own circle. He is elected, we will say, and a petition is presented against his return, and he comes forward with a clear conscience and swears, not only that he has not spent a halfpenny illegally, but that he most positively directed that not a halfpenny should be spent illegally on his behalf. His agent corroborates these assertions, and even if he loses his seat he is very properly complimented by the Judge on his own immunity from reproach. But most probably there is no petition, and he holds his seat undisturbed; or a petition may be presented, and the petitioner has to withdraw it, or fails because he can get no satisfactory evidence. All is serene, and possibly for a year or so he hears nothing more about the cost of the election. Then he receives an intimation that on fuller examination it appears that all accounts were not quite settled, that in point of fact two or three thousand pounds are wanting to make things square, and that probably he will agree in thinking it best to settle the thing quietly, to draw a cheque for a round sum, and to have no more trouble about the matter. The whole of the enthusiastic and lavish proceedings on his behalf have been conducted on the speculation that when the critical time comes he will draw this cheque, and things will be quietly squared. The speculators may have mistaken their man; he may turn round on them and refuse to give them a shilling, and then they have to bear the loss, and they set to work to find for the next election the ideal candidate, the absolutely heroic man, the free-handed gentleman who, when in due time he is asked to square up quietly, will give enough to square up, not only what has been done for him, but for his predecessor. If no such man can be found, and until he can be found, the speculators lose; but in their low way they are generally shrewd men, and are, it may be presumed, right sufficiently often to find the game a paying one.

Such a constituency was Bewdley, and such a candidate some of the naughty people of Bewdley evidently thought they had got in Sir RICHARD GLASS. He seemed exactly the right man for the place. He came down, gave an encouraging cheque to a friendly attorney, and perambulated the town in a gay, joyous, cheery manner. He showed himself to be one of those people who have the happy art of enlivening and animating the society in which they happen to find themselves. Satisfactory evidence was offered to show that he did not during his canvass sing "The Jolly Thieves," for there is no such song; but there were people at Bewdley perhaps, who, in their delight with his ways and turns of manner, fancied that if there had been such a song he would have sung it. The decree went forth that Sir RICHARD was to be trusted, and Bewdley was itself again. As Mr. Justice WILLES said, "Bewdley ran "with beer." Public-houses were opened on a scale of magnificent profusion which, in the poetic language of the judge, turned them from being mere places of refreshment into honey-pots to catch electoral flies. Hundreds of excellent, useful people were engaged as watchers. The election was all that an election ought to be, and the right man was returned triumphantly, and, what was most satisfactory, he was returned without having spent a shilling illegally. But unfortunately a petition was presented, and he has been unseated, and this time the speculators will find their speculation a bad one. Even if there had been no petition, the speculation would, we take for granted, have been equally bad. Sir RICHARD GLASS would have refused to square up the balance quietly, but that he would have been asked to do so he can no more doubt now, we presume, than any one else can doubt. He would have refused, but there was something in his gallant bearing and pleasant ways of going on that misled the Bewdley people, and made them risk their money as HARDIMENT risked his, when he drew 200*l.* just before the poll closed to return Sir HENRY STRACEY for Norwich. The whole plan of operations would succeed if the right men were selected as candidates, and if it were found possible to prevent some of the distributors of the good things given away from coming within the sweeping law of agency. The present system of trying election petitions undoubtedly tends to discourage schemes of the sort. The rapidity with which the judge lays down and applies the law, the facility with which an investigation on the spot is conducted, the possibility of strengthening a case by many witnesses when a few only could have been carried to London, and the knowledge that everything revealed is published in all the papers the next morning, and read all over the kingdom, must make unscrupulous agents pause. But we must not expect that the new system will do all that could be wished. There is a weak point in the scheme of checking bribery by petitions, which we now are beginning to perceive. Petition after petition is being withdrawn, because the petitioners cannot get evidence or cannot afford the expense. The expense of fighting a petition is very heavy, and in many cases the petition has been presented by persons whose chief object has been merely to attain a public good, and put down illegal practices at elections. But public spirit will not go beyond a certain point. People will subscribe a certain sum to have the truth made known without private advantage to themselves, but they will not double their subscriptions. If the money can be got, it is still sometimes impossible to get the necessary evidence; as a rule, it has to be bought, and the price is very high. A man will ask 50*l.* to come and swear that he took half-a-sovereign at the time of the election. He is considered something of a spy and a traitor; he is playing false to those whose bribes he took; and above all, he is proving himself a bad townsman, who is willing to let all the secrets of the borough be revealed, and have it exposed to odium, and perhaps to disfranchisement. For this loss of social position the man who peaches wishes to be paid, and 50*l.* appears to be the lowest for which an informer will agree to be held nefarious by a set of neighbours who see no harm whatever in taking a bribe. The petitioner cannot, speaking pecuniarily, lay out 50*l.* better than in buying the evidence of a man who can really prove bribery by an agent; but then the petitioner finds that most of those who will take the 50*l.* cannot give evidence that amounts nearly to this, and after infinite trouble and the unpleasantness of driving nasty bargains with the scum of society, he finds that he has got hold of the wrong people, and his petition is a failure.

That the terror of these trials by Judges was not sufficient beforehand to prevent things being done at some elections on the most magnificent scale is amply proved by the instances of Bradford and Dublin. Mr. RIPLEY, who was elected at Bradford, must be as nice a candidate in some ways as an attorney could wish. He did not pay any money, but he opened an unlimited credit at a bank in favour of a local lawyer, who drew what he pleased, and his drawings reached the handsome sum of upward of 7,000*l.* Of course all this went in what were considered legal expenses; but then Mr. RIPLEY was contesting Bradford under very peculiar circumstances, and had consequently to bear legal expenses of a very peculiar kind. There is a part of Bradford inhabited chiefly by Irish, and as the Irish were not quite satisfied with Mr. RIPLEY'S views, it was suspected that they would all vote against him. It was accordingly considered wise and necessary to form what were termed neutralizing committees, the object and duty of which should be to go among the Irish and persuade them to be at least neutral, and not to vote against Mr. RIPLEY even if they could not be induced to vote for him. But neutralizing Irishmen is dry work, and so a hundred and sixty-four public-houses were engaged and kept open in the most liberal manner as schools or centres of neutrality. Nor was there any of that invidious distinction between committeemen and others which so often creates jealousies and tends to interrupt the harmony of a public-house; for all danger of ill-feeling on this head was entirely avoided by the simple expedient of putting everybody on the committee. If it cannot be said of Dublin, as of Bewdley, that it ran beer, it may certainly be said metaphorically of Dublin that it ran porter. A strong current of extra stout flowed with all its fertilizing and animating properties through the constituency. It is only at Dublin that we have got back to the old days of men in the moon and mysterious strangers. Voters who were considered safe to swim with the tide of "GUINNESS" were supplied with a ticket cut out of an old book of unused railway foils, so that, if any one saw the ticket, it looked merely like a pass. This ticket was taken to a dingy room in a dingy house, and, as its holder traversed the room from one door to the other, an arm draped in black came out of a small side enclosure, and, while perfect silence was preserved, tendered an envelope. The voter opened his envelope when he got safely outside, and to his delight and surprise found it contained a 5*l.* note. And notes of this description were so plentiful, that they were apparently bestowed in many instances on people who had no notion of asking for them, and who would have voted as they did for nothing, or for one-twentieth of what they got. As judgment has not yet been pronounced in the Dublin case, it would be premature to discuss whether any means can be imagined to prevent the recurrence of doings so scandalous. But the Judges, as they gain experience, throw out hints of what they think would be improvements in the law, and their opinion will have great weight. Doing away with nominations is a small but an obvious improvement, and one that can be easily effected without loss to any one. It is said that it would be a loss to prevent the possibility of any one standing up to the last moment. But this is only a verbal objection. There must be a last moment sometime or other, and there is no advantage in fixing the hour when the returning-officer opens the proceedings on the day of nomination as the last moment, more than any hour a day or two days before. In fact the day of nomination is now practically the last moment now in large constituencies, for it would be impossible that voting-cards should be printed and distributed by the next morning. It has also evidently entered the minds of the Judges that the system of having paid canvassers is altogether bad and unnecessary, and that many of the worst evils of election flow from the meetings of paid canvassers of a humble order in public-houses. We must wait until the experience derived from the trial of the petitions yet to be heard furnishes ample material for discussion, but it is evident that the Act of last Session is destined to receive some very important alterations and additions.

NEW ZEALAND.

THE detailed accounts of the New Zealand disasters confirm the telegraphic summary. It is not certain whether the native insurrection on the west coast was connected with the murderous attack on the settlement at Poverty Bay, which is two hundred miles distance from the scene of the unsuccessful skirmish of the 7th of November. On the 9th of the same month several scattered houses in the Poverty Bay district were attacked before daybreak by the Maori convicts who had recently escaped from Chatham Island. Belonging to the fanatical sect of Hau-haus, the assailants killed men, women, and children indiscriminately, and they afterwards burned the homesteads of their victims. The whole district, which, notwithstanding its unpromising name, is said to be one of the finest in the Northern Island, is for the present utterly ruined; and it is almost a relief to find that the whole number of persons killed amounts only to thirty-seven, including nine friendly natives. A massacre by savages, however shocking, is neither surprising nor instructive, for wild men must be expected to act after their nature; and the only moral to be deduced from the misfortune is the necessity of vigilant self-defence. It is satisfactory to be informed that there have subsequently been two engagements at Poverty Bay, in which the rebels who were concerned in the massacre suffered severe loss. Similar collisions take place wherever barbarous tribes come into conflict with civilized colonists. The Indian territory of the United States is incessantly disturbed by attacks on settlers, alternating with acts of vengeance on the wrongdoers, or on others of the same colour. In Southern Africa the Dutch farmers carry on an incessant war with the Kaffirs, especially in the districts which have been abandoned by the English Government. The escaped convicts from Chatham Island were desperate from their first landing; and they may possibly have derived encouragement from the tidings of successful insurrection in the West. To the utmost of their power they have accelerated the inevitable extinction of their race; for angry colonists will be inclined to hold all Maoris, or at least all native insurgents, responsible for the Poverty Bay massacre. The adoption of a new-fangled and absurd religion by the so-called Hau-haus is another serious misfortune. When a European has occasion to kill a negro or an Indian, his conscience secures additional repose if he can persuade himself that the object of his antipathy has no claim to Christian privileges. It was on the pretext of Paganism, and not of blackness of skin, that Africans were first enslaved by the Portuguese; and long afterwards the Spanish clergy vainly insisted on the right of Christian converts to liberation. Politicians who might have been supposed to have relieved themselves of religious prejudices are constantly insisting on the iniquity of protecting Mahomedans against Christian encroachments; and, indeed, of allowing unbelieving Turks to protect themselves. The Poverty Bay massacre appears to have been somewhat more destructive than the unhappy outbreak of 1865 in Jamaica; and the purpose of the rebels was more deliberately formed. There is too much reason to fear that, although a large section of the Maori population is friendly to the colonists, the violence perpetrated at Poverty Bay will long serve as an excuse for indiscriminate hostility.

In the war which has commenced so inauspiciously, the prowess of the Maoris as usual commands respect. The estimates of the number of native combatants are seldom trustworthy, inasmuch as it is not the habit of New Zealand warriors to exhibit their strength in the open field. Their singular aptitude for the art of fortification, combined with their remarkable courage, has constantly enabled them to meet Volunteers, and even regular troops, on equal terms. The late defeat of the armed constabulary under Colonel WHITMORE was, according to custom, incurred in an attack on a pah, or Maori redoubt. There is no apparent reason to suspect the commanding officer of exceptional incapacity, or the colonial force of slackness; for the first line seems to have attacked the fortress with spirit and energy. The natives, taking due advantage of the cover which they had prepared for themselves, repelled the attack by a fire which threw the troops into confusion, and they even pursued the retreating enemy until they approached an earthwork which had been prudently thrown up to meet the contingency of a reverse. If some of the accounts may be trusted, the natives received large reinforcements in the midst of the skirmish; but, having effected their immediate object, they declined to await a second assault. Colonel WHITMORE afterwards occupied the deserted fortress without resistance, and all who have had experience of New Zealand warfare understand the barrenness of the triumph. It is not unlikely that the small colonial force will be dispirited by the misadventure, although the officers and men may console themselves by the recollection that English regular troops have often been equally unfortunate.

The local Government, having apparently found a difficulty in levying forces at home, has sent agents to some of the Australian colonies for the purpose of enlisting Volunteers; and at Melbourne the experiment has partially succeeded. The Government of Victoria suggested that one part of an Imperial regiment which happened to be stationed in the colony should be transferred to New Zealand; but the commanding officer could scarcely decide on such a movement without direct orders from England. As long as there was a strong garrison in New Zealand, successive Assemblies and Ministries were constantly in the habit of asserting their ability and willingness to protect themselves. The withdrawal of the troops was at last amicably arranged, and the policy of the Mother-country and of the colony could not be reversed without much inconvenience; nor does Lord GRANVILLE's language at St. James's Hall hold out any prospect that it will be reversed. European settlers in countries partly occupied by savage tribes are habitually jealous of the presence of a regular army, which, in consideration of the protection which it affords, naturally claims the right of regulating the conditions of border warfare. The English inhabitants of New Zealand have now entire discretion in conducting affairs of peace or war with the Maoris; nor can any failure be attributed to the unseasonable scruples or mistaken policy of the Colonial Office. Notwithstanding the checks which have been often experienced, it would be absurd to suppose that the colonists not able eventually to repress the disaffection of the natives, whom they already outnumber. Many of the Maoris are friendly or peaceable; and there is no difficulty in organizing native troops to aid in the suppression of insurrection. Uncivilized tribes have, fortunately, but a feeble sense of national unity; and hitherto there has been no general league against the English power. The most intelligent chiefs are well aware that the continued existence of their race will only rendered possible by the permanent establishment of friendly relations with the intruders; for it must long since have become evident that the actual settlers are too powerful to be extirpated, even if there were not beyond the sea an unknown multitude of possible immigrants to supply their places. The soreness which is caused by the spread of the English population into new districts is not aggravated, as in the Indian districts of North America, by injury to hunting grounds. The Maori, like the European, requires the possession of land only for pasture and cultivation.

In the accounts which have thus far been received from New Zealand, there is nothing to show that the war has assumed a formidable character. The Hau-hau fanatics are distrusted and disliked by the more enlightened portion of their own country-including all the genuine converts to Christianity. The leader who in the last war assumed the title of King has not yet taken a part in the present struggle, either because he disapproves of its objects, or through a reasonable doubt of its success. A repetition of military disasters might probably cause the rebellion to spread; but it may be hoped that experience will ultimately suggest to some capable officer the proper mode of dealing with a New Zealand fortress. The ships of war which have assembled on the coast will supply the colonists with competent advisers, and, if necessary, with the handiest of gunners. The most unpretending civilian cannot but conjecture that strongholds which almost always repel an assault might be shelled or surrounded, or otherwise rendered innocuous, without useless sacrifice of life and reputation.

If the disturbances prove to be comparatively insignificant, or if they are promptly suppressed, the success of the New Zealand Government will cause sincere gratification in England. No other colony is, for various reasons, regarded with a warmer interest, although it happens that New Zealand occupies almost the remotest portion of the globe. It may reasonably be expected that the English population of a group of islands in a temperate climate will enjoy a civilization and prosperity not unworthy of their descent and of their material advantages. Their progress would be still more satisfactory if it were found to be compatible with the existence and advancement of the native tribes. Although Englishmen have little tendency to amalgamate with alien races, the Maoris appear to be in many respects more open to improvement than any other uncivilized tribes.

FRANCE AND ITALY.

THE Yellow Book which annually puts the French Legislature in possession of such facts concerning the foreign policy of the Empire as it is thought expedient for it to know is on this occasion of less than usual interest. The only important negotiations in which France has been engaged during 1868 are those that preceded the meeting of the Conference, and even the excerpts from these which it will be ultimately thought safe to publish are necessarily withheld for the present. In the volume as it stands there is not a single document which can be said to give any information, since even the four despatches which constitute the published communications between Paris and Florence during the last twelve months reveal no new fact. They do, however, serve to foreshadow, in a vague and imperfect way, the course which the Imperial Government may be expected to take on the affairs of Rome. Throughout the past year the Governments of France and Italy have been in a state of intermittent correspondence upon the occupation of the Pontifical territory by French troops. It appears, from a despatch of General MENABREA, that as far back as the 19th of last January the EMPEROR recognised the necessity of extricating the Roman question from the precarious and dangerous condition in which it is now placed. Admissions of this kind are so often made to do duty for, rather than to usher in, any further action, that we are not surprised to find, from the despatch which closes the series, that up to the 31st of October M. DE MOUSTIER had not advanced beyond this point. The Yellow Book does not enable us to determine whether the more pronounced Italian sympathies of M. DE LAVALETTE have availed to invest the recognition of this fact with a more practical character, but in the absence of evidence it is pretty safe to assume that no such change has taken place. Nor is it likely that General MENABREA's declaration that in the then unexcited state of public feeling—he is speaking of January, 1868—a European Conference might profitably have been convened to give the Roman question a definitive and satisfactory solution was ever meant to be taken seriously. Something more than a mere quiet interval is needed to put the relations between Rome and Italy on a footing of lasting amity. So long as contradictory pretensions are maintained on both sides, the situation is beyond the scope of diplomacy. Accident or violence may bring about the absolute defeat of either party, but the compromise which seems to be the natural conclusion of the controversy can only become possible through a mutual change of attitude of which at present there is no indication.

Still the semblance of doing something had to be kept up on both sides, and in this first despatch General MENABREA replies to the French invitation that he should suggest a scheme for the amelioration of the existing relations between Italy and the Holy See by the establishment of a modus vivendi. The proposals of the Italian Minister were in effect that the Convention of the 15th of September, 1864, should be rehabilitated—that Italy should again undertake to prevent any attack on the Papal States from without, and should assume her share of the Pontifical debt, and that, in consideration of this engagement, France should forthwith withdraw her troops from the Roman territory. The French Government was further asked to use its influence with the POPE in order to obtain his consent to the conclusion of customs, postal, telegraphic, and extradition conventions, to the abolition of passports in favour of Italian subjects, to the passage of Italian troops through the Roman territory, and to the liberation of political prisoners belonging to the annexed provinces. M. DE MOUSTIER delayed his reply for two months. He then expressed great pleasure at the identity of view which appeared to exist between the French and Italian Governments, and magnified the September Convention as the only solution which, under present circumstances, the question could be held to admit of. It is a considerable step, however, from theory and sentiment to practice, and it turned out to be one which the French Minister was by no means prepared to take. He is willing to credit General MENABREA and his colleagues with the best possible intentions. That they are determined to protect the Papal frontier from invasion, and to do so in the most efficacious manner, he is fully persuaded. The one point on which he seeks for fuller information is, how they propose to carry out their purpose. It is not, he observes, "by "a mere tardy and incomplete surveillance of the frontier at "the moment of the crisis" that revolutionary attempts are to be checked. The mischief must be traced to its source. Clandestine enrolments and the storing of arms must be put a stop to, without waiting for their object to be made manifest by overt acts. Will the Italian Government state exactly what it proposes to do with respect to these points?

Of course the Italian Government was not in a position to state anything of the kind. International lawyers may argue for ever without convincing an average Italian that it is his duty to discourage all attempts at forcibly settling the Roman question by means of an invasion from without. On the contrary, he would insist upon so settling it to-morrow if he were but a little more confident of success, and he is consequently by no means inclined to look with any extraordinary severity upon those of his countrymen whose view of the situation is more sanguine. If the Emperor of the FRENCH were anxious to restore the September Convention, he would no doubt find the word of General MENABREA's Ministry a sufficient bond for the discharge of the obligations incurred by Italy. But there is no reason to suppose that the arrangement which pleased him in 1864 would please him equally now. The result of this change is that the French Foreign Office has become profoundly impressed with the difficulties which beset General MENABREA's path. It sorrowfully confesses that, after having been once disappointed, France cannot without ample reflection consent to expose herself to the possibility of being disappointed again. General MENABREA, M. DE MOUSTIER admits, has an incontestable title to the gratitude of all who understand the true interests of Italy. Order and good administration grew up beneath his hand, and the ties which unite his country to France are daily drawn closer by his wise and persevering policy. "Is it prudent," asks the French Minister, "to compromise these happy results by any hasty "measures?" The spirit which produced Mentana is not yet extinct, and the men who planned the Garibaldian invasion of 1867 might only see, in the withdrawal of the French troops, an encouragement to new aggressions. Besides, continues M. DE MOUSTIER, what chance would there be of the French Government being able to influence the POPE in the direction desired by General MENABREA, if HIS HOLINESS saw himself at the same time deserted by the protectors on whom he, in common with the whole Catholic world, now relies for safety?

The probability that French representations will do much for the establishment of a modus vivendi is so extremely small to start with, that no diminution of it could make the situation materially worse. But General MENABREA's apparent silence since the receipt of this despatch at the beginning of November, may perhaps be taken as an intimation that he is no more anxious than the Emperor of the FRENCH himself to see the French troops withdrawn from Civita Vecchia. The position of his Cabinet between a hostile sovereign and a suspicious populace is far from being an easy one, and his difficulties would be very greatly enhanced if a new attack upon the Papal territory were in course of preparation, and he were to be called on by the French Government to take immediate measures to prevent it. Whether he has the means to do so without additional legislation is at least doubtful, and an attempt to obtain the necessary powers might lead to a Ministerial crisis, the issue of which would depend upon considerations which it is quite impossible to forecast. The KING is supposed to alternate between a desire to save his crown and a desire to save his soul, and according as one or the other motive happened to possess him at the moment, he might identify himself with the popular feeling and form a Ministry from the Left, or recur to the design of a coup d'état, which, though since abandoned, was certainly entertained, if not determined on, two years ago. At that time, indeed, General MENABREA was currently regarded as the instrument by which this latter design was to be accomplished; but his career as a constitutional Minister may easily have indisposed him for playing so ungrateful a part, while it has at the same time made him sufficiently disliked at Rome to injure materially his chance of playing it with success.

There is little doubt, however, that the duration of the French occupation will be decided by considerations in which Italian politics will have but a small share. At present everything points to its continuance for an indefinite period. The evidence as to the state of French feeling on the subject, afforded by the debate in the Corps Législatif last year, was absolutely unmistakeable; and when NAPOLEON III. has satisfied himself that France wants something which it is in his power to give her without injury to the interests of his dynasty, he is not likely to throw away so useful an opportunity. In this case, too, there are very strong reasons to incline him in the same direction. It is to the Conservative element in French society that he naturally looks to secure his son's succession; and on this ground, if on no other, it is of great moment to have the clergy on his side. Again, to a man of the EMPEROR's somewhat visionary ambition, there may be an immense attraction in the thought of what the BONAPARTES might achieve in Europe if the Pontifical throne were occupied by a Pope who would view things from their standpoint—perhaps even by a BONAPARTE himself. Wild as these dreams may be, there can be nothing lost by indulgence in them when the practical interests of the hour lead to the same conclusion. It will not, we imagine, be a slight inducement that will withdraw the French from the Pontifical territory before the next Conclave has met and voted.

THE MANCHESTER BALLOT.

THE sudden death of Mr. ERNEST JONES has given an accidental and melancholy interest to the Manchester Ballot experiment. An honest and earnest advocate of extreme and dangerous opinions, Mr. JONES obtained the enthusiastic admiration of devoted followers, and to a certain extent the respect of his adversaries. His personal honour was beyond question, nor was it at any time suspected that his motives were tainted with vulgar corruption. It is impossible to judge how far an advocate of revolutionary measures is consciously or unconsciously influenced by the ambition which would necessarily be gratified by the success of his projects; nor, indeed, is the cultivation of ambitious hopes more degrading to an agitator than to a statesman. The qualified praise which can alone be applied to Mr. JONES's public character does not extend to the wisdom of his policy or the moderation of his methods. During the Chartist agitation he incurred a sentence of imprisonment which must be supposed to have been just, although the law, then as now, took no cognizance of opinions unless they were expressed in a manner dangerous to the public peace. In his maturer years Mr. ERNEST JONES confined himself to legitimate modes of controversy, but the theories which he maintained were incompatible with the existing order of society. His merits as a politician are mainly to be estimated with reference to the question whether he was right or wrong. Subversive doctrines are not universally objectionable, but there is a strong presumption against their soundness. Only comprehensive inquiry and deep conviction can justify revolutionary proposals. Mr. JONES was profoundly convinced of the truth of his opinions, but he was nevertheless responsible if he was mistaken. A year or two since he expounded to an audience of enthusiastic artisans a plan for relieving the supposed pressure of surplus labour in the manufacturing districts, by transplanting a million operatives to agricultural freeholds. Although he disclaimed any purpose of confiscation, it was difficult to understand how his scheme could be reconciled with the rights of property; and economists discerned innumerable objections to the proposition that the establishment of cottage farms would improve the condition of the industrial classes in towns. It was for the promotion of similar changes that Mr. JONES sought to enter Parliament. A belief that his political activity would be inoperative or mischievous is not incompatible with due respect and tenderness to his memory. It must never be forgotten that in politics or religion it is not enough that a leader should be sincere. In both departments fanaticism and violence have done at least as much harm as hypocrisy.

If Mr. JONES had lived, his hopes of representing Manchester would probably have been disappointed. The ultra-Liberal party has apparently acted injudiciously in giving its members an extraordinary opportunity of expressing their opinions. Out of a constituency of about thirty thousand voters, only a fourth of the number have announced their preference for an extreme or democratic candidate. There can be little doubt that the scheme of a trial by ballot was chiefly favoured by Mr. JONES's party, and that his supporters were more fully represented than the adherents of Mr. GIBSON. If an election had taken place, Mr. JONES must have relied on the seven or eight thousand thoroughgoing partisans who voted for him at the ballot, and on that section of Mr. GIBSON's friends which might think itself bound to abide, according to the American custom, by the results of a preliminary vote. The eleven thousand electors who took the trouble to deposit their suffrages were outnumbered even by Mr. BIRLEY's supporters at the general election; nor is there any reason to suppose that the entire body would have voted for Mr. JONES. The invitation was addressed to the eighteen thousand electors who voted for Mr. BAZLEY, Mr. JACOB BRIGHT, and Mr. JONES, or rather for any two of the three coalesced candidates. The abstention of seven thousand extreme Liberals from the ballot shows that many of them either thought the experiment unseasonable or were disinclined to support either Mr. MILNER GIBSON or Mr. ERNEST JONES. In a single-handed contest a considerable portion of the dissentients would not improbably decline to vote; and with the aid of the Conservatives, the moderate Liberals could, as on several former occasions, elect a member. Mr. EDWARD JAMES, a lukewarm politician with little connexion with Manchester, was returned at the head of the poll in 1865. Since that time the strength of the ultra-Liberals has been greatly increased by the accession of the newly enfranchised voters; but the middle classes are almost unanimous in their distaste for the revolutionary doctrines of Mr. JONES. The minority which supported Mr. MILNER GIBSON had the best reason for believing that their candidate would not make use of a Parliamentary position to overthrow the institutions of the country, or to alarm quiet proprietors and traders. Mr. MILNER GIBSON is an undoubted Liberal, but he is eminently safe. For many years he has been exempt from any imputation of violence, except, indeed, in his last year's opposition to the Bill for establishing a foreign cattle market in London.

In Manchester and elsewhere thoughtful men are probably beginning to perceive that the essential differences between a supporter of Mr. MILNER GIBSON and a supporter of Mr. BIRLEY are trivial in comparison with the gulf which separates a moderate Liberal from a believer in the doctrines of Mr. ERNEST JONES. It is perfectly true that, for the immediate purpose of an election, the two great parties correspond with the divisions of opinion on the questions which will occupy the immediate attention of Parliament. All the Conservatives will vote against the abolition of the Irish Establishment, while Whigs and Radicals will, on pain of political excommunication, unanimously support Mr. GLADSTONE. It will be well if three or four further questions lying comparatively near the surface intervene between the present tranquil season and the more stirring conflicts of the future; but, sooner or later, those who wish England to remain as it is will necessarily come into collision with the promoters of revolutionary change. It is highly probable that the apportionment of taxation will be one of the first grounds of a dissension which will entirely remodel the present divisions of parties. When at some remote time Mr. DISRAELI retires from public life, it will become easier for moderate men to readjust their political alliances in conformity with altered circumstances. In the meantime judicious Liberals will, if possible, discourage violent theories, if only for the object of postponing the disruption of their party. The Irish Church affords an invaluable opportunity of dealing with an abuse which may be removed to the equal satisfaction of those who think with Mr. LOWE, and of those who sympathized with the eloquent tirades of Mr. ERNEST JONES.

The exultation of the special advocates of the Ballot at the discovery that the inside of a closed box is invisible excites a natural feeling of amusement. On the other hand, opponents of the Ballot sometimes occupy themselves in devising elaborate contrivances for introducing fraud into one of the simplest of mechanical operations. The most effective plan which has been practically tried was devised some years since in California by a gang of horsedealers and gamblers, who had secured the complicity of a sheriff, or returning officer. To the surprise of the legitimate voters the candidates whom they had unanimously rejected were elected by a majority largely exceeding the entire number of votes in the district. When the sheriff was shortly afterwards lynched, it appeared that the ballot-box had been provided with a slide which prevented any of the genuine tickets from falling into the proper receptacle; and the sheriff and his confederates had, before the commencement of the election, deposited a sufficient number of votes at the bottom of the bag to secure the election of one of their gang. There is not the least reason to apprehend any similar misadventure if the Ballot should at any time be introduced into England. Once for all, it may be admitted that secret voting is practicable and easy, if only the electors desire to conceal their votes. The question whether it is expedient has nothing to do with the mechanism of any ballot-box. It oddly happened that the Manchester experiment was so contrived as to throw no light whatever on the merits or disadvantages of secrecy, for the voters who were invited to take part in the operation were already known as open supporters of the Liberal party. It is highly improbable that any one of Mr. JONES'S supporters would have concealed his intention from any person who had been curious enough to make an inquiry, or that the result would have been affected if the votes had been taken in the ordinary manner. Yet it is barely possible that some persons may believe that an argument in favour of the Ballot has been furnished by the exhibition of a score of ballot-boxes.

MR. EDWARD WATKIN EDWARDS.

FAR be it from us to anticipate, or even to speculate on, the result of the trial of the six mercantile notables, distinguished among the most distinguished of our merchants, bankers, and traders, who were committed by the LORD MAYOR on Wednesday for trial on a charge of conspiracy and fraud. Not only have we before our eyes the wholesome terrors of the law, vindicated recently in the person of a contemporary; but a sense of propriety, to say nothing of the futility of anticipating the freaks of justice as administered by a British jury, compels a prudent reserve. We may, however, deal with the facts of contemporaneous history. Mr. EDWARDS, Official Assignee of the great Bankruptcy Court in London, is a fact. At least we suppose so. Internal evidence would, to be sure, suggest that he is only a myth, and a very extravagant and improbable one —just one of those wild and, as they say, sensational characters which an inventive novelist with a strong sense of caricature might, in the exuberance of a playful or perhaps cynical humour, suggest. But the external proof is overwhelming. There are three Commissioners in Bankruptcy, and to each Commissioner is attached an Official Assignee, much as a priest has his deacon or acolyte. Attached to Mr. Commissioner HOLROYD is, so says the Law List, Mr. Assignee EDWARDS, whose honorarium, as a public servant, is, we believe, only a poor 1,500*l.* a year. What is an official assignee? Probably a functionary entrusted with the discharge of official-assignatorial duties. Obscurum per obscurius. And yet what but such a "Dodonean" definition—to use the characteristic language of Mr. EDWARDS'S Hellenic friend, Mr. STEFANOS XENOS—can describe an official assignee such as in practice we find him? One would have thought that to realize and receive and be accountable for the assets and estates of one-third of all those great London firms who find themselves compelled to breathe the air of Basinghall Street, and to keep all the accounts of one in every three of all the London bankrupts, would task any one man's energies, and exhaust any one man's time and talents. But we are mistaken. It seems that to Mr. EDWARDS this trifling burden of official duties is a mere perfunctory episode in his active and energetic life. To an official assignee of his capacities for work and work's worth, the hours from ten to four are the mere horæ subsecivæ of the working day. Mr. EDWARDS is—we are not quite sure about the tense—an official assignee; but, while official assignee, he was half a hundred things besides. He was at the same time "partner in the firm of "EDWARDS and O'BEIRNE," "a financial firm." He was at the same time "Director of the Atlantic Royal Mail Steamer Com-"pany," and took fees as Director. He had at the same time a good deal to do with Mr. LEVER in the way of business, and the "Anglo-Luso Company"—the significant name seems to be the only joke about this concern. Also at the same time he had to do something for Mr. THOMAS HOWARD. He had also, apparently when a salaried public servant, been an accountant and partner with Mr. TURQUAND. But above and beyond all this, though some of these matters look as if they must have interfered with his public functions, he was appointed by the great house of OVEREND and GURNEY their referee and adviser-general and oracle in ordinary. He was "Friend EDWARDS," without whom the great house "did not see how it could get on." We hardly know how to describe Mr. EDWARDS'S sublime functions in connexion with this sublime institution. To go down to vulgar fiction, just as in the famous Anglo-Bengalee Company of which Mr. TIGG MONTAGUE was Managing Director, the porter, a wonderful and very mysterious being, guaranteed the solvency of the whole concern by his superb and awful waistcoat, so the house of OVEREND and GURNEY hired the great EDWARDSIAN presence, because it was a presence. EDWARDS was this to the bill-discounting house—not a man, but a presence, an influence, a principle, an idea, a permeating essence and life; we can hardly conceive him in the concrete. His function was spiritual rather than material; his it was to advise, to suggest, to inspire, to regulate, to originate, to interpose. Providence alone supplies the antitype to the great EDWARDSIAN function, for we hesitate to speak of him as a mere EDWARD WATKIN. When OVEREND, GURNEY, and Co. had secured EDWARDS, they could defy fate and the Bank rate of interest; they had got competence, stability, certainty, the Destinies, and Fates, all in one.

Every man has his price in another sense than WALPOLE thought, and the price of such an interposition as EDWARDS was enormous. Indeed, being something more than man, his salary was superhuman. He was rewarded much as CRŒSUS rewarded Delphian APOLLO for an opinion which turned out to be about as valuable as that for which EDWARDS was himself subsidized. Mr. EDWARDS received 5,000*l.* a year for consenting to act for OVEREND and GURNEY in all matters in which those simple and guileless folk, unskilled in the naughty world of discount and finance, might ask for his advice and assistance. The value of these unknown and hypothetical and only probable services can be reckoned by the known purchasing powers of 5,000*l.* a year in the ordinary concerns of life. 5,000*l.* a year purchases in the open English market a Bishop, a Judge, a Prime Minister, a Speaker of the House of Commons, a Secretary of State. 5,000*l.* a year hires these small functionaries, body and soul, mind and tongue and pen, for every day, and all day long. But 5,000*l.* a year could only buy a fraction of EDWARDS, the mere hours of idleness of his mighty mind; what was left of EDWARDS after he had spent his day from ten to four in the Bankruptcy Court was gladly snatched at and bought up at 5,000*l.* a year. After six hours of official business came the cannie hour at e'en of EDWARDS, equal in value to a whole day's work of such poor creatures as Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. DISRAELI. But there was something left of EDWARDS marketable even after Basinghall Street and Lombard Street had taken their fill and fling out of him. Mr. STEFANOS XENOS thought the very snips and parings of EDWARDS, after serving HER MAJESTY and the great discount house, worth five hundred a year, and a present of a steam yacht. Mr. EDWARDS also believes that, in addition to all these pickings, he was auditor to the Galway Steam Packet Company; he owns that, while hired to drive close bargains with the customers of GURNEY, he not only received an annual 500*l.* from STEFANOS XENOS, one of their customers, but 2,000*l.* from another, a Mr. PEARSON; also 300*l.* for acting as umpire between LASCARIDI and LEVER on the one part, and GURNEYS on the other, from whom he was at the same moment taking the aforesaid 5,000*l.* a year; and he will not swear that he did not get something—it might be odd hundreds or thousands—from the Milwall Iron Company under precisely similar circumstances.

But we have no more seen the last or the whole of Mr. EDWARDS than we can exhaust or fathom time, space, eternity, or any other immeasurable and imponderable essence. Like the poet's "stupendous whole," our EDWARDS

> Lives through all life, extends through all extent, > Spreads undivided, operates unspent.

Or rather, like KEHAMA,

> . . . Self-multiplied
> The dreadful one appears on every side:
> In the same indivisible point of time
> At the eight gates he stood at once.

Even thus the omnipresent EDWARDS absorbs into one at least eight separate personalities in his various but co-ordinate and contemporaneous forms of being, as official assignee, accountant and financier on his own account, universal conscience, prescience, and general and particular providence on GURNEY'S account, referee and friend in council on XENOS' account, umpire on LASCARIDI and LEVER'S account, referee on PEARSON'S account, auditor, director, and manager on Atlantic Steam Packet account and Galway Packet account, and possibly a secret and beneficial, but not unsalaried, influence on MARE'S Milwall account. To run with the hare and hunt with the hounds, to take briefs and retaining fees both from plaintiff and defendant, to be at once death and the doctor, to eat the oyster and to get paid for both empty shells, to get a commission from the vendor for selling goods dear and a percentage from the purchaser for buying the same goods cheap—these are no mean triumphs. And Mr. EDWARDS enjoys them. But this is not all. He takes a salary from a firm, and lends, not to them, but to one of them, their own money at a good interest, and this, as they say, all unbeknown to his other masters. It appears that Mr. EDWARDS lent to Mr. CHAPMAN—one of the former partners in the house of GURNEY, whose name turns up not for the first time in those little matters at the Mansion House—privately the whole salary which he received from the firm openly and collectively. That is, he tries to play a partner against the firm and the firm against a partner, just as in other matters, in concluding any single bargain, he had sweated every sovereign on both sides and took a bribe—we mean a douceur—for making every transaction both dear and cheap to buyer and seller, and on either side profitable to himself.

This is Financing in excelsis; the very triumph and crown of the great discovery of the age. At present Mr. EDWARDS is without a parallel. There is no knowing what we may know. There may yet be commercial histories which will beat this. The Crédits Foncier and Mobilier yet await their THOM and their LEWIS. Not only did brave men live before AGAMEMNON, but DAVIDSON and GORDON preceded OVEREND and GURNEY, and the case of the spelter warrants was before this fabulous indebtedness of four millions. And as epic poetry did not die with HOMER, so perhaps is the wondrous tale of London financing not quite exhausted and concluded with the adventures of Mr. CHAPMAN and his client alike and patron, his guide, philosopher, and friend, Mr. EDWARD WATKIN EDWARDS. To finish up this portrait, it remains to remark that the gentleman in whom OVEREND and GURNEY invested at such a frightful premium does not look like so very valuable a commodity. Since the evidence given by MAJOCCHI, never was human memory so uncertain, treacherous, and leaky as Mr. EDWARDS'. Dates, facts, particulars, details, all slide and glide away from Mr. EDWARDS in the witness-box. He has a very bad memory as to dates; it entirely fails him on every point of business worth remembering; he really would be candid were it not for this sad infirmity of faculty; whether he was debtor or creditor, whether he paid or received, what he disbursed or the reverse; whether it was a hundred thousand or so on this side or on the other; whether he was acting for somebody or somebody else; when, if ever, he was himself, or whether he was always an alter ego, and if so, an alter ego of whom; whether he was GURNEY against XENOS, or XENOS against GURNEY; whether he was an official assignee, or an Atlantic Steam Packet Company, or an Anglo-Luso, or a Millwall ironsmith, accountant, bill-broker, money-lender, or yachtsman, whether he was acting for any body, or for two bodies, or only for himself; he really does not know. Nor do we. Mr. XENOS, who calls himself a dove, says that Mr. EDWARDS is a hawk, and he is going to write a book about the dove and hawk; and though Mr. XENOS is a Greek, we are not aware that he was born in Crete, and therefore we may expect his forthcoming revelations of Mr. EDWARDS to be true. Meanwhile, as we are dealing with an accountant and official assignee, we trust that Mr. XENOS will furnish some items which will enable us to strike a balance in that great account which is at present open, and may be stated, in official assignee form, thus:—

DR.	CR.
Mr. EDWARDS in account with	HUMAN NATURE.

DOGMATIC DISBELIEF.

THERE are many words, originally intended to bear a good sense, which have come to be used in a sense precisely the reverse, from a change of opinion either about the quality described or about the persons who claim to possess it. The word "Jesuit," to which we referred the other day, is a good instance of the latter kind of metamorphosis. It was meant to be an honourable title, describing likeness to Christ; but it has come to be used as synonymous with knave or hypocrite, not from any change of view as to the type of character etymologically denoted, but because an impression has grown up, whether reasonably or not, very damaging to those who actually bear the name. Meekness, on the other hand, which in the New Testament is recommended as a virtue, is much oftener used in our own day as a term of contempt; partly because many people think, though they generally avoid saying so, that the New Testament ideal is faulty, partly because meekness has been associated in men's minds with the Uriah Heap type of character. The term "dogmatic" may be said to occupy a middle position, in this respect, between the two already named. In an age when supreme importance was universally attached to orthodoxy it was used almost exclusively in a good sense, and it is often so used still. Since the Gorham controversy first shook the traditional quiescence of the Church of England in its official capacity, we have been deluged with books and sermons and pamphlets on the imperative necessity of a dogmatic Church and a dogmatic faith. At the same time the epithet "dogmatic" is widely, and perhaps increasingly, used in ordinary parlance, even by those who would be the most strenuous in upholding the claims of theological dogma, in a more or less opprobrious sense. When we say that a man or his book is "dogmatic," we usually mean that he is offensively positive and dictatorial as a writer or in private life. But this need not at all necessarily refer to his treatment of religious questions, though it often does. Still less does it necessarily involve any disparagement of a dogmatic creed. Yet the growing tendency to apply the term as a reproach must have arisen from a prevalent, though sometimes unconscious, antipathy to dogma as such.

What, however, we wish just now to insist upon is that the dogmatic temper, in the derivative sense of the word, in dealing with religious controversy, is by no means confined, as is often assumed, to the adherents of a dogmatic faith. The credulity of unbelievers has not unfrequently served to point the moral of Christian apologists, and the champions of authority might with equal justice retort on its assailants their favourite charge of dogmatism. The fool who says "There is no God" shows himself as well aware as the theist of the necessity for a dogmatic basis of his creed. And the most vehement impugners of authoritative beliefs are often the readiest to substitute authoritative denial for argumentative disproof. We do not say that they are never justified in taking such a course. Opinions have been promulgated before now under the shelter of venerable sanctions, to which incredulus odi is the best as well as the shortest reply. Dr. Wolff tells us, in his autobiography, that, when he was arguing in a college at Rome against burning heretics, one of his fellow-students (we are not sure that it was not the present Pope) observed, "Seventeen Popes have done it." "Then," answered Wolff, to the amazement of his perplexed audience, "seventeen Popes did wrong." No better reply could have been made. But such cases are exceptional. Those who attack the conscientious beliefs of their neighbours should condescend, as a rule, to argue against their truth, and not to assume that they are false. And they should also take care, as they often do not, to understand the opinions they are contending against. When they are too impatient to master their adversary's position, and too self-confident to examine the objections to their own, they may fairly be charged with dogmatism, and they have no right to be surprised if the victims of their contemptuous onslaught decline to accept sneers for evidence and statements instead of proof. If we wish to convince a Mussulman or a Brahmin, he may fairly expect that we shall pay his present faith the compliment of a refutation. Illustrations of this dogmatic temper among the enemies of dogma are never far to seek. Nor would it serve any useful purpose to dwell on the more extravagant examples of it. When a modern evangelist of Atheism applies foul and ribald comparisons to the Deity in whom the immense majority of his countrymen believe, he may be left to the silent disgust of all right-minded men. It is precisely in its less glaring, and therefore less offensive, exhibitions that this habit of fighting dogmatists with the least honourable of their own weapons requires to be exposed. And the fact that it is always difficult, especially to persons of an unimaginative turn of mind, to put themselves in the position of those whose opinions they dislike, makes it all the more needful to insist on their absolute obligation to do so if they choose to enter the lists at all. If half the disputes in the world arise, as is sometimes said, from the want of defining terms, the other half end where they began from neither party taking the trouble to apprehend the point of an adversary's argument.

We have before us at this moment an anonymous pamphlet, decidedly above the average, by a writer who is clever and evidently sincere, but who is constantly falling into the fault in question. His favourite method is to lay down certain alternatives, one of which must be true, and then to proceed by an exhaustive process to ascertain which of them is true, while he invariably ignores other equally conceivable alternatives, on some one of which most probably an opponent would rest his case. He seldom even manages to explain accurately what is the belief of those whom he is trying to refute, though he is always ostentatiously certain that he knows all about it. It will be worth while to give a few specimens of his method of arguing, and in doing so we are expressing no opinion on the particular conclusions, affirmative or negative, that he has arrived at, but simply on his manner of advocating them. Nor is there any need to name the publication, as we are not reviewing it, but only using it in illustration of our thesis. The writer's main position is, that no doctrines are of any real importance except those which, whether revealed or not, can be proved independently of revelation, so that "each man's personal experience can be made the test of their truth"; and he comes forward with the modest aim of correcting the "current theories of the Christian Churches," which wrongly hold many other doctrines to be necessary also. On this principle he asserts theism and the future life to be "articles of positive knowledge," and devotes a few pages to proving each. The circumstance that some of the greatest thinkers, ancient and modern, judging independently of revelation, have doubted or denied both these "articles" does not trouble him for a moment; he gives indeed no indication of being aware of it. Among the tenets of "the Christian Churches" which he specifically objects to as unnecessary or untrue, are the doctrines of eternal punishment and the atone-

And, with characteristic incapacity for understanding opinions which he dislikes, he defines the former doctrine to be "that the greater part of mankind are destined to endless misery," which may be a common belief, but is not "held in theory" by any single Church or sect in Christendom. This doctrine, he proceeds to observe, cannot possibly from its very nature be capable of proof, because any revelation that contained it would destroy our confidence in the Divine veracity, and, moreover, it is grounded by those who hold it "solely" on certain doubtful texts of the New Testament. The first argument may have its force; but as it has been urged and replied to again and again, from the times of Leibnitz downwards, a writer less confident of being always in the right would have thought it worth while to take some notice of the replies that have been made. The pamphleteer, however, seems to think that the argument is his own discovery, and is loftily unconscious of any one having suggested, or any one having answered it, before. His second argument is as inexact as his account of the doctrine he is criticizing. Most of those who hold it base their belief on the traditions of the last eighteen centuries quite as much as on any particular text. He is just as inaccurate again in his description of the doctrine of the atonement, and still less happy in his way of dealing with it. The only grounds for thinking such a belief of any practical value, he tells us, are, that it rouses in the mind a lively feeling of gratitude, love, and confidence towards God, and a deep conviction of sin. And all these feelings may be just as easily "kindled in the highest degree" without it. Perhaps so; but it would have been desirable to explain why they have never, except in a few individual cases, here and there, existed in any high degree without it. We do not say at all that this proves the doctrine to be true; we merely say that it proves the worthlessness of the particular argument here urged to show that, whether true or not, it is unimportant. We will give one more somewhat amusing example of the same dogmatic temper, as shown in the writer's careless neglect to acquaint himself with the terms of the discussion. He is complaining of churches, and especially of the Church of England, for "dogmatizing" about their sacraments. And he treats us to the following notable piece of reasoning on the subject. "No Protestant Church believes in the necessity of its own sacraments. The twilight phrase which describes them as 'generally' necessary means always, when driven to the light, that they are necessary to those who think them so." The blunder of supposing "generally necessary" in the Church Catechism to mean usually necessary would be a natural, and is probably a common, one in the "twilight" intellectual atmosphere of a rural Sunday school, though even the intelligence of the juvenile rustic might be expected to be proof against the marvellous gloss here put upon the words. But what shall we say of a writer who volunteers the benevolent enterprise of putting all "the Christian Churches" right on the fundamental errors of their teaching, without having even taken the trouble to understand the mere language of the formularies of the Church with which he seems most familiar, and to which he probably belongs? Can it be necessary to remind any scholar that generaliter and fere do not mean the same thing, and that generally necessary means universally necessary? A writer rather less impatient of any considerations that do not happen to tell on his own side would have observed that the very structure of the sentence from which he so ignorantly quotes—which points to the distinction of two sacraments, universally necessary, from other ordinances which the Church of England does not consider necessary for all—contradicts his careless misinterpretation of it.

We have purposely taken our illustrations from a work of more than average ability, and manifesting no desire to be uncandid. It is precisely the same dogmatic temper which, under one set of influences, finds its dearest solace in the most literal enunciation of the "damnatory clauses" of the Athanasian Creed; and, under opposite convictions, rejoices, if we may be pardoned the expression, in unequivocally damning all the advocates of damnation. When St. Bernard had collected a synod of Bishops at Sens to sit in judgment on the errors of Abelard, we are told that, after each proposition, they exclaimed "damnamus," till at length, being overcome with drowsiness, for the session lasted through a long summer's day, they feebly muttered "namus" till the catalogue of heresies was exhausted. In this day orthodoxy is apt to be as unpopular as heterodoxy was in the time of St. Bernard, and the dogmatists of free thought are not unfrequently content with muttering an instinctive "namus" at every assertion of a dogmatic faith. Sometimes they seem hardly less willing than St. Bernard and his Council of Bishops to invoke the secular arm for the suppression, not of too little, but of too much, belief. Everybody has heard the famous definition of orthodoxy as "my doxy" and heterodoxy as "your doxy." And people are apt to regard their own opinions, as Aristotle says authors regard their books, with the affection of parents for their children. We need not blame them for that. But if dogmatizing be a reproach, it is equally a reproach to the friends or to the enemies of dogma. The Cavaliers were taunted with being ready to fight "for every thread of the surplice and every letter of the rubric"; but old Mucklewrath turned the hands of the clock to hasten Morton's execution, when he caught a whisper of the petitions of the Anglican Prayer-book from the lips of the doomed man. Perhaps we may go a step further. The dogmatic temper—we say nothing of dogmatic creeds—is sufficiently odious wherever it is found, but it is peculiarly ungraceful, because it is so glaringly incongruous, in the assailants of all positive belief. It is the crowning triumph of toleration to tolerate intolerance, so long, of course, as it is not allowed to exercise any oppression over others. But there is something as graceless as it is grotesque in the illiberality of Liberals. "The infallibility of the intellect" is just as much the watchword of one theological party as the infallibility of the Church or of the Bible is of another, and its advocates seem quite as much bent as their opponents, not on obtaining toleration for all forms of opinion, but on securing the active domination of their own. We have nothing to say against liberty of thought and speech in itself, but in the mouths of many it is a convenient euphemism for liberty to put down those who will not think and speak liberally—that is, who disagree with them. It is no paradox to say that there is a party in the National Church who are straining every nerve to convert it into an engine for the dogmatic teaching of the nonexistence of dogma. We may be permitted to doubt if the prefix of a formal negative would be any great improvement to the creeds.

SPASMODIC VIRTUE.

Vice is suffering at present from a rather violent spasm of morality, and is naturally anxious about its future, but we do not think it has much cause for uneasiness. On the contrary, to all seeming, its prospects generally were never fairer or more promising than at this moment. It may be that morality may exact a few more victims, and send a few more scapegoats penniless to the prison or the workhouse, bearing on their shoulders all the sins and scandals of their fellows. But, as we read it, the lesson of all this is, not that vice is doomed, but only that it must move with the age. It is hopeless to overcome individual prejudices, and the Legislature and Executive may weakly truckle to them from time to time; but then the whole tone of feeling in society is in favour of vice, and this must prevail in the long run. If the police have been fussily obtrusive and the magistrates officiously demonstrative of late, yet it will be remarked that they have confined themselves to clearing out certain half-forgotten reservoirs where the backflow of our moral sewage has been stagnating for years—to abating old standing nuisances that have been familiar to our active and intelligent officers for generations. There can be no doubt that for the moment the scavenger is abroad, for the odour of the fetid abominations he has at last made up his mind to disturb comes to your nostrils with overpowering strength from the columns of every paper you take in your hand. There is the notorious Judge and Jury Club, for example, on whose misadventure in the Police Court we commented the other day. In an unlucky hour the eye of some man in authority, as he mused on possible fields for the display of a new-born zeal, lighted on a placard that must have daily stared him in the face since he was first enrolled in the force. Its programme of the nocturnal proceedings of the unholy Vehme that held its grimy tribunal under the presidency of Mr. Brooks was habitually published to the world by walking posters, and at the corners of the streets. At length advertising gained it more publicity than it had aspired to, and, in spite of its claims as having nursed the chaste eloquence of the tribune of Clerkenwell, it was rudely pulled up and savagely denounced. Looking at the matter from the judicial point of view, that is as perfect a case for reform as the authorities can ever hope to see fall to their lot. It clears away what our theoretical ethics would characterize as a mass of filth; it vindicates beyond cavil the energy of our censors of morals, and entitles them to repose on their brooms, and for months to come to point back to it with a proud complacency as proof of the value of their services. It is no difficult task to remove with a shovel a deposit of mud when it has settled down, but it is quite another thing to enter on the slow and thankless process of purifying the whole stream of society, and filtering it from the endless abominations it holds in solution. Mr. Brooks was an anachronism; behind the age, deaf to its warnings, and blind to read the signs of the times. It was quite inevitable that he should go. He might have foreseen his fate in the desultory efforts made at scouring the pavements of the Haymarket, and whitewashing its taverns and divans. The old school that used to swagger in the face of decent hypocrisy is fast becoming a thing of the past. It is following the six-bottle men who were in the habit of coming reeling from their potations into the drawing-rooms of the upper ten. What we insist on now is a certain refinement in our vice, and surely we are not unreasonable; for, to make things as pleasant and easy for it as we can, respectability meets it more than half way. We don't look for reform, strictly so called, but we will have progress. Our modern version of the moral law expects that vice shall wear a mask and a robe of some sort, although the one may be as transparent, and the other as diaphanous, as the tissue that wraps the limbs of an Indian nautch-girl. And although it is always painful to change old habits, vice must see that we are only coercing it for its own good. When it consents to pay an illusory tribute to decency, we let it go very much where it will, and do very much what it pleases. If poor Mr. Brooks had only called his clever little entertainment a school of art and oratory, it need not have been blotted from the list of those refined pleasures of the town that elevate the tastes of young men from the country. The police would have felt bound to accept his definition of it in preference to the evidence of their senses, for surely he must know the nature of his own entertainment best. Look at our "anatomical museums." Every one knows generally what their contents are like, and what are the ulterior objects for which their beneficent proprietors keep them up. But

Mr. Brooks is dragged into daylight from the modest retirement of his little back court, while the anatomists are suffered to parade, in our most crowded thoroughfares, collections that are at least as curious as delicate.

As we said, vice may very well entrust its interests to the generous consideration of society. It is true that we have never heard the voice of society, in its recognised organs in the press, more unanimously, more impressively, or more eloquently virtuous. The other day, for example, the new Government, falling into the fashion of the hour, issued the edict that is to save their civil servants from their own imprudence and the claws of the usurers. Forthwith the press, to a journal we believe, preached us enthusiastic sermons on that text, pregnant with the loftiest wisdom. As we read, we felt the deepest admiration for their costly self-abnegation. We turned with interest and pity to the advertising columns to see what filled the blank where, paragraph after paragraph, the fowlers used to spread their snares. We found, to our shame, that our fanciful ideas about consistency had duped us; for there in the old place, and by way of comment on the admirable leader, were the rival biddings of the benevolent capitalists who offer you anything from 10*l.* to 10,000*l.* on your note of hand, sent by cheque or Post-office order. We know no more austere moralist than the journal that opens its hospitable columns as the chosen organ of the maisons d'accouchement et avortement; of the model baby-farms where the air is as deadly as in the Pontine marshes. The grim austerity of its virtue is only equalled by the blaze of gorgeous word-painting and the wealth of Oriental imagery with which it inculcates it. Its backbiters may liken it to Satan in the robes of a friar, or to Dr. Dodd with the forged bills in his pockets, drawing tears from the eyes of his rapt congregation. What is certain is that preachers of this sort are in admirable keeping with their flocks, and that pastor and people thoroughly understand each other. On their pedestals of virtue, readers shudder pleasantly at the dramatic picture of nightly orgies in the Haymarket, worked up with a thousand prurient touches. They chorus their bluff British indignation in response to the manly outburst of the worthy magistrate who characterized Mr. Brooks' little entertainment as odious "bestiality." And on the same evening the family is to be seen filling a box at the theatre—the British Cornelia surrounded by her jewels—children from the nursery, girls from the schoolroom, débutantes in the first freshness of their youth; while a sprinkling of men—brothers, lovers, or acquaintances—are grouped in the background. If the young ladies and the boys do not pluck some fruit from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil—rather more evil than good perhaps—it is not the fault of the mother who takes them there. To say nothing of the ballets, where the poetry of art elevates your soul above the gross suggestions of the senses, the manager relies for his effects on the female form, tastefully disposed in every conceivable combination; its nudity just sufficiently relieved by dress and veiled by drapery to leave it fascinatingly suggestive instead of repellingly coarse. "Startling effects," indeed, as the play-bills advertise them, would they have been to the last generation. Nowadays these things are taken as matters of course, although it would puzzle an intelligent Fiji islander to know why we should scout as barbarous the costume of the ladies in his family, whose simple toilets of bead necklaces and shell girdles are sanctioned by climate and immemorial custom, while our own women are encouraged to undrape themselves for show and not for comfort. Probably the breadth of the anomaly will narrow itself in time. Sensible girls cannot help reflecting that, if there is no impropriety in the freest display of the leg on the stage, it is absurd to be prudish about their ancles in private; and the argument, if good for so much, is good for more. Indeed, reasonable parents begin to admit this; and the present excessively décolleté fashion of their daughters' dresses marks a decided step in the inevitable direction. Then there can be no better school for sharpening the faculties than bringing your daughters to hear the doubles entendres that salt so plentifully many of our most successful plays. It gives them all the excitement of guessing conundrums for prizes of forbidden fruits. La glace se fond vite au Palais Royal, we recollect hearing in a piece played at that genial theatre, and certainly the sensuous atmosphere of a London playhouse is just the temperature in which the forbidding coldness of virgin purity is likely to warm and dissolve. But if innocent girls may see and hear things like these, and take no harm, why be so hard on poor Mr. Brooks and his initiated clients? Are you afraid of taking the down off the peach or breathing on the purity of the country hawbuck who indulges his spiritual love of the beautiful by a contemplation of poses plastiques at the "Judge and Jury"? Vice, like poverty, must be always with us, as we know, and, like a practical people, as we pride ourselves on being, we have made up our minds to conceal what we cannot eradicate. It is idle as well as painful to try to level up; it is easy as well as pleasant to level down.

We have succeeded so far already that we may defy the most experienced roué to judge us by appearances. In other days there was something so distinctive in the dress and manner of the lorette that it was impossible for the goats to huddle themselves unobserved among the sheep. Now the whole young-lady world may be equally proper, or improper, for anything you can say to the contrary. Take a man about town of a few years ago, and wake him up from a Rip Van Winkle slumber in a fashionable church, lighted for afternoon service. Let his eyes wander over the wilderness of faded and badly-matched chignons and the indescribable cut of those dresses that display the form in a gross harshness of outline, and, were it not that the devotees had got prayer-books instead of tea-cups in their hands, his first impression would be that he had got into a midnight meeting of Magdalens. A study of the pews would confirm him in the idea that half-repentant St. John's Wood had fled for excitement from the Argyle to the Altar. Go to the Crystal Palace on a Saturday afternoon, and you find that the delicate good taste of our ladies has nearly succeeded in putting their erring sisters quite at their ease. It is impossible for uncharitable virtue to take to throwing stones, for, as far as exteriors go, it may unawares be stoning incarnate propriety as it masquerades in the trappings of the Haymarket. Much unpleasantness is thus spared to families, for you cannot be expected to know all the acquaintances your son has made, and the ladies he is escorting must certainly be assumed to be all they ought to be, for in dress and demeanour they are the very counterparts of his sisters. You do occasionally see a hideous dowdy from the country, with her own hair simply done, neither docked, nor frizzled, nor plastered, nor supplemented; her cheeks fresh from the bath instead of the powder-box, and her figure draped in the exploded graces of the dresses of a few years back. She has no sort of manner; instead of giggling or shrieking, she talks in a subdued tone; she blushes, as well she may, and she has at least the grace to be conscious of the absurd appearance she makes, for she drops her eyes to the critical stare of the amateur, instead of ogling him in defiant challenge in return. But even in the most select places of entertainment it is hopeless altogether to exclude improper characters, and the sight of an occasional object of pity and disgust—the reflection of a horrible past—is useful as indicating the progress we have made, and as stimulating us to persevere in the path we are pursuing. No; notwithstanding the disagreeable episode of the "Judge and Jury," and the persistent persecution of the night-houses in the Haymarket, let vice be of good courage. Even the polite, and certainly not premature, remonstrance said (we hope truly) to have been issued by the Lord Chamberlain against "the impropriety of costume of the ladies in the pantomimes, burlesques, &c." will not perhaps prove a very crushing blow to the cause of indecorum. The sympathies of the public are really all in its favour and, with the exercise of a very moderate amount of the "discretion and good taste" with which managers are obligingly credited, and to which it is announced that these matters "ought properly to be left," the prospects of impropriety were never more brilliant than in this advanced and enlightened age.

MR. GREG ON PEN-MENDING.

WE have arrived at an epoch of economy which would have rejoiced the very heart of Mr. Joseph Hume. The French Empire is going to establish an equilibrium between expenditure and income, after raising at most a loan or two more. General Grant's invariable reply to everybody who asks him, on any pretence, to authorise national expenditure, is to be couched in the remarkable two words with which he once answered a request for a speech, "No, Sir." And in England our clerks are to mend their pens before throwing them finally aside. As Mr. Greg justly argues, in an official letter which we have no authority for regarding as a hoax, pens, "if good to begin with, will bear being recut four or five times, and on each occasion become as serviceable as at first." This plan, he says, he always follows himself, and it has for some time been acted upon both by the House of Commons and the Treasury. If, then, the new system be conscientiously adopted, the nation will require only one quarter as many pens as have hitherto been thought necessary. We are unfortunately left without any means of calculating the probable saving that will be effected. If we assume, for the sake of argument, that it will amount to a thousand pounds, and take the whole revenue at seventy millions, it will follow that a gentleman who pays seventy pounds in taxes will save annually about the thousandth part of a pound, or rather less than a farthing. In four years, therefore, allowing something for interest, he will have saved a penny, and in less than a quarter of a century he will be able to treat himself to a cigar out of the money which has been saved by Mr. Greg's economy. These periods may easily be shortened in proportion to the number of thousands saved. Mr. Greg is of course perfectly right in effecting a saving, however trifling in amount, and we should only be inclined to ask whether it might not be carried further. Would not a more radical reform be effected if clerks were directed to use steel pens, instead of indulging in the luxury of quills? Or it might be possible to insist upon their writing a hand which would increase the average number of words in a page; there may even be cases in which a slate might be used instead of paper, if proper precautions were adopted against creaking pencils; and it is not inconceivable that in other cases we should be all the better served if they were to cease writing altogether. We are, however, getting into matters which are beyond Mr. Greg's competence, and certainly beyond our own. We can only wish that he had a chance of exercising his talents in a larger sphere, and cutting off extravagant practices of more dangerous consequence than recklessness in the matter of pens. This economical measure, however, opens a wider and not uninteresting question. What is the value of that kind of economy generally known as cheeseparing? How much good did Joseph Hume effect by constantly cavilling at every questionable item of expenditure? Is the danger of financial dis-

(less likely to be permanently staved off, or even made sensibly less imminent, by measures of reform in quill pens? The great Chatham, we know, roused the spirit of a nation by the energy of his single will, and in a few months changed general despondency into boundless self-confidence. Will it be the fortune of Mr. Gladstone to stimulate a wasteful population into all the virtues of economy, and fire us with a noble zeal to preserve candle-ends, and have our old clothes turned before buying new ones? The whole people may be inoculated with the spirit of the good old misers of former days, who would drive a mile round to avoid a turnpike, and may perhaps adopt for its standing motto the weighty aphorism—appropriate enough to a nation of shopkeepers—Look after the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves. We are tolerably familiar with these paroxysms of economical virtue in individual cases. A gentleman discovers, at the end of the year, that he has spent a hundred pounds or so beyond his income. He resolves to cut down his cabs, and ride more frequently in omnibuses; he saves something on groceries by going to the Civil Service Co-operative Store; and, by way of impressing his virtuous resolutions upon his own mind, he buys an account-book, and puts down the smallest items with extreme accuracy for several days. The worst of it is that such measures generally lead to the accumulation of an amount of self-complacency which produces a relapse into more than the former extravagance, and that at the end of the year the result is about the same as before. He has merely thrown a temporary sop to his conscience. Probably the economist discovers that his only chance is to cut down his establishment and retire into a smaller house in a cheaper quarter of the town. The analogy in the case of a nation is obvious. By cutting off a few superfluous clerks and saving the stumps of a number of quill pens, we shall perhaps effect a saving distinctly visible to the naked eye; Ministers will be able to go to their constituents and flourish the spoils of their pen-knives and pruning-knives before the eyes of assembled multitudes; and we shall grow so proud of our virtue, that we shall be ready to throw away a few millions on the next return of the pendulum. It seems to be a law that fits of speculation and of enforced cautiousness follow each other at regular intervals in the commercial world; and we may set up a similar alternation between the hot and cold fits of administrative economy. If we could make up our mind to cut down our establishment, the results might be different. We might, for example, turn all our colonies adrift, sell Gibraltar to the Spaniards, set up Malta to auction, and resolve to be an island instead of an empire; we should then be able to discharge half our army and save a sensible fraction of our expenditure. As the public mind does not seem quite prepared for such a course at present, it is invited to be content with the cheeseparing system; we are to adopt a plan similar to that which dealers in light money applied to guineas; the different departments are to be "sweated," and if the amount saved in each case is trivial it will come to something in the aggregate.

It is perhaps ungrateful to grumble at any method by which money is saved, considering the amount of trouble which this system imposes upon public officials, and the courage necessary for encountering the grumbling of the victims to economy. Yet we should wish to be clear on one or two points, before we can feel satisfied that any really valuable result has been obtained. Mr. Greg's reform in the matter of quill pens is obviously a sound one so far as it goes. If a pen is mended twice, it will do the duty of two pens. There will be a saving and no loss of efficiency. But how are we to be certain that this will always be the result of an indiscriminate tightening of the screw? Is it not possible that if we treat our civil servants with more rigour, and insult them with these petty and suspicious cavillings at their supposed extravagance, they will contrive to diminish the value of their services in an equal or a greater proportion? If they are to be treated as criminals to be kept in bondage, perhaps they will do badly in proportion to their discontent. The economy which pares away fragments of real utility is just as easy as the economy which removes superfluities; and there is no guarantee that our fit of enthusiasm will secure one more than the other. Human nature is not altered by the excitement of a sudden revival; after a time the converts relapse into their former carelessness, and the new toy is laid aside till some fresh combination of circumstances brings it into notice again. In a few months we may probably be crying out as loudly against a false system of economy as we are now against extravagance; and the huge vis inertiæ composed of the idleness and indifference of people employed on business which is not their own will cause the machinery to slip back into its old ruts. In short, the true way of turning our spasms of virtue to good account is by reorganizing any defective parts of our system; there is undoubtedly room enough for reforms in this sense, and, if wisely carried out, the effect may be permanent. If a manufacturer confines himself to occasional outbursts against the wastefulness of his subordinates, they will most likely indemnify themselves for their annoyance by falling into their old habits as soon as his back is turned, or some new object calls away his attention. If he introduces new and more scientific methods of applying force, he may effect a permanent improvement. The cheeseparing system may make as much noise, and serve as well for texts to stump oratory; but the real merit of the Government must be measured, not by the number of quill pens saved, but by the substantial improvements introduced into the organization of the different departments. The precipitate mode of cutting down expenses at random has not only a tendency to provoke a reaction, but prevents any proposal which involves a temporary expenditure, even if it promises to be essentially reproductive. It is a pity to see good enthusiasm wasted in merely producing one of those temporary panics which seem to be almost a national characteristic. We are always in a state of excitement about something or other—the growth of pauperism, or the state of the national defences, or the ignorance of the lower orders, or the extravagance of the upper classes. Too often it cools down, and everything sinks back to its former condition. A genuine statesman might secure some tangible result from each of these spasmodic outbursts, which would remain when the zeal had died away; and it is to be hoped that the present desire for economy will be turned to some permanent account; only we must look for some better symptoms than general exhortations to saving and a frittering away of energy upon quill pens and superfluous clerks.

Meanwhile, as we are trying to save money, perhaps our statesmen will remember that there is another commodity of proverbially equal value. The House of Commons will of course applaud the zeal of its leaders for judicious frugality. If it shows an equal regard for time it will set an excellent example. Are we to listen to nothing else for perhaps two Sessions than endless discussions upon the Irish Church? or will Parliament remember that, however important that subject may be, and whatever new floods of light its eloquence may cast upon the whole question, there are one or two little matters which would be the better for a share of its attention? The waste of public money is bad enough, but the waste of the whole legislative energy of the country upon a single topic, however important, allows evils to remain and to grow up which cost far more even in money than the most rigorous economy of administration would save in the course of years. It would be a melancholy caricature of genuine economy which should spend its force upon cheeseparing, and allow the working power of the Legislature to be diverted from the substantial improvements which alone can give any security for the maximum of efficiency in our expenditure.

MR. GLADSTONE'S "RETREAT" HARASSED.

THE famous Chapter of Autobiography was dismissed by all serious politicians with a melancholy smile, half sympathy and half contempt. As the great majority of people accepted Mr. Gladstone's conclusion that the Irish Church must go, they were serenely indifferent to the pangs of conscience which Mr. Gladstone must, according to his own account, have undergone in painfully elaborating his premisses. Confessions and autobiographies and mental diaries are extremely interesting to people of a certain class of mind—to those, that is, who compose such works, and to the narrow intelligences which delight in prying into other people's concerns. Experience has proved that it is only in the less robust mental organizations that confession is adopted as an indispensable means of grace; and, beyond the feminine sex, spiritual confessors and directors of conscience are generally dispensed with. If, however, a man publishes the secret records of his inner life, and takes the public into the confidence of his soul, he cannot complain if his self-revelations are treated as roughly and coarsely as any other alleged facts of history. When Mr. Gladstone published his Chapter of Autobiography he ought to have counted the cost. He has been taken at his word; and in a somewhat remarkable pamphlet, The Retreat of Mr. Gladstone, a Mr. Bazely accepts Mr. Gladstone's vindication of himself, and criticizes it on Mr. Gladstone's own grounds. Mr. Bazely was, we believe, a very distinguished Oxford resident some thirty years ago. Formerly Fellow and Tutor of Brasenose, a first-class man, and subsequently rector of a large London parish, he has of late years retired into private life, but his interest in public matters does not seem to have been extinguished. Probably—though we have not verified this matter—he was one of Mr. Gladstone's supporters in his early contests at Oxford. But, be this as it may, in character, reputation, candour, and abilities he is a very favourable specimen of those who have withdrawn their support from the Premier. Mr. Bazely is no bigot; he considers it a fair and open question whether the Irish Church might not acquiesce in separation from the State. So far, therefore, we and Mr. Bazely have not many points of difference. We believe that the ascendency of the Irish Establishment is an injustice to Ireland; that to remove that ascendency is a plain duty; and that there is only one way of redressing the wrong. It is very immaterial how, when, or why this conviction has forced itself upon us. Nor would Mr. Bazely care to inquire. We have not—and the people of England generally have not—felt called upon to compose a chapter of national or personal autobiography. Mr. Bazely, therefore, has no dispute—or, if he has a dispute, he does not feel himself bound to pursue it—with the general verdict of the nation against the Irish Church. But Mr. Gladstone stands on very different grounds. We may be very inconsistent. With Earl Russell and Sir George Grey we may ever and over again have denounced disestablishment as confiscation in principle and a blunder in policy. But we have never claimed to be consistent. We have never vindicated, or excused, or apologized for ourselves. We may be, as Mr. Gladstone says, rash, precipitate, fickle, and all the rest of it. But we have had the sense—or cunning, as the Scotch say, in that well-worn apophthegm—to let that flee stick to the wall. Not so Mr. Gladstone. He feels the force of the personal taunt which glances off our pachydermatous conscience, and is at vast pains to show its injustice and falsity. Here Mr. Bazely joins issue. Mr. Gladstone ventures on a strictly and specially personal apology; Mr. Bazely tries to show that the apology fails, and that it fails in every particular.

It is plain that as bystanders we may be interested in this personal and literary gladiatorship without siding either with Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Bazely in their private dispute. The great issue of the Irish Church question is untouched by it; and the public interest involved is only how far Mr. Gladstone's defeat and refutation on his own chosen ground—if Mr. Bazely has defeated Mr. Gladstone on this particular point—affects the confidence which the country ought to place in the political capacity, general moral judgment, and prudence of the statesman who is confuted (if he is confuted) on those very pleas which he has ostentatiously selected for his vindication in a matter which, had he been wise with that worldly wisdom which we want in a statesman, he had much better have left alone. Mr. Gladstone's apology, stripped of its tautology and amplification, amounts to this:—That the existence of the Irish Establishment is a gross injustice, wrong, and insult; that this, his conclusion in 1868, was arrived at naturally and gradually, and by sensible and definite stages; and that he never consciously concealed the gradual growth of his convictions. Mr. Bazely replies that Mr. Gladstone's offence is not that in 1841 he recommended the maintenance of an Establishment which he now abandons, but that he never, up to the spring of 1868, avowed this conviction; and further, that he never could have entertained it till the very hour of its avowal. Practically this comes to a distinct charge on Mr. Bazely's part, and it is a serious one, that the Chapter of Autobiography is a mere self-illusion, and nothing better than an ex post facto enumeration or invention of successive states of mind and gradual growths of sensible and definite convictions extending over twenty-seven years, which are mere phantoms of the imagination, and never had any real existence until they were developed by the self-consciousness of the spring of 1868. The ground of civil justice and political right was never entertained, and never could have been entertained, Mr. Bazely argues, till 1868. It, says Mr. Bazely, Mr. Gladstone had long ago taken up this ground, he must bear the reproach of having been year after year a silent and unprotesting party to a crying injustice, which he long felt to be one, but never ventured to denounce. If, on the other hand, his conviction on this argument—the only one on which he now rests his case—was very sudden and recent, the whole of the Chapter of Autobiography is beside the point, and, quite irrelevant to that, the only issue. The charge against Mr. Gladstone, reduced to its simplest elements, is that either his conviction of the injustice of the Irish Church Establishment was sudden and precipitate—inspired by the fact that he was in opposition, not in power—or that he had for a long time culpably concealed his conviction of this flagrant injustice, and suffered others who trusted in him to be deceived. If the former alternative is true, then the apology is quite valueless, because it deals with a non-existent issue; if the latter, then it deals with a false issue—that is, is directly untrue. It is to this last point that Mr. Bazely addresses himself, and he employs himself with the proof, elaborated with great logical skill, as was to be expected from his Oxford reputation—and this proof derived from Mr. Gladstone's own account of his own retreat, or education, or whatever he pleases to call it—that the political injustice of the Establishment never was in his thoughts up to 1868. Or, if it were, to have arrived at such a conclusion, and to have carefully suppressed and concealed it, was "dishonour."

We shall not take upon ourselves to pronounce on the force of this argument, as for other reasons, so because for all practical purposes it is of very little consequence to outsiders. Mr. Bazely and Mr. Gladstone may well be left to argue the matter out; and Mr. Bazely is no mean opponent. For ourselves, we do not—though of course he would not himself admit it—think that Mr. Gladstone is so very seriously to be blamed, even could it be proved, which it cannot, that he took a mere party advantage of a political emergency when he uttered his famous declaration of last spring against the Irish Establishment. And, on the other hand, we are by no means prepared to admit that Mr. Gladstone is to be charged with conscious and personal dishonesty for concealing his convictions—whichever of Mr. Bazely's merciless alternatives we are called upon to accept. If Mr. Gladstone had long been convinced that the Irish Establishment must be sacrificed, even though he abstained from proclaiming this conviction, he was not necessarily guilty of a culpable suppression of his convictions; and again, if he was in fact convinced all of a sudden, either by Mr. Maguire's book, or by the aspect of Fenianism, or by the intolerable spectacle of Mr. Disraeli on the Treasury Bench as Premier, is he to be charged with conscious and criminal unveracity, even though he says that his convictions had very long been ripening, and had long been ripe?

But this last question leads us to a final observation, which is, what a very great mistake these mental—and we may say as much of spiritual—Autobiographies, Experiences, Confessions, and Apologies are. We are not saying, as has been said, that Mr. Gladstone in publishing his Chapter was fired by a vain emulation of the unapproachable Apologia pro Vitâ Suâ of one ten times greater intellectually than Mr. Gladstone. If so, the reception of the two books must have, profitably perhaps, disillusionized the imitator. But we do say this, that the greatest mistakes are committed by these publications. In surveying their past selves, they think they thought thoughts which they never did think: but in so thinking they are but unconsciously mistaking their past selves. Take St. Augustine—Rousseau—Dr. Newman—Mr. Gladstone. Dr. Newman's is the only one of them all which is satisfactory, simply because Dr. Newman's is a mind which occurs only once in ten centuries; and further, because Dr. Newman's account of his change could be proved by documents, facts, and contemporaneous evidence. Mr. Gladstone's cannot. Nothing is so delusive as these mental retrospects. Unconsciously, and this is where we differ from Mr. Bazely, we all of us—and Mr. Gladstone is in our eyes, though not in his brother's, human—interpolate into the past imaginary trains of reasoning, fictitious and probable and plausible mental attitudes and processes, and invest them with a personality and distinctness which they never really had, but which we attribute to them only when, for some very pressing and recent reason, we have, very late in the day, and quite independently of all these fancied processes, come to a conclusion which these figments might have led to, but did not, simply because they were not. When a man engaged with this hazy work of introspection thinks that in bygone days he might have thought so and so, the process is not difficult, and certainly not dishonest, by which he persuades himself that he had actually done so. And this is why we all suspect "Confessions." A conversion and change of opinion is a fact, and a fact hard and tangible; but the gradual, subtle, unconscious secret processes by which it comes about none of us know, and the attempt to describe them is only illusory in most cases. We often mistake the force of passing mental and intellectual processes, and at a distance we attribute undue importance to what really was transient and evanescent. The only thoroughly trustworthy conversions are those in which the supernatural element is admitted. St. Paul never gave an apology or chapter of autobiography. In St. Augustine's case there was always, backing the whole history of struggles and experiences, the irresistible influence of Divine Grace. Even in Dr. Newman's case, the weird saying of four Latin words "kept ringing in his ears"; they "struck him with a power never felt before"; they were as "the familiar 'Turn again, Whittington.'" That is, they were to a certain extent supernatural; they acted as a spell. Therefore even his conversion is tinged by the mysterious and supernatural; and in all such cases the great revolution of mind can dispense with all argumentative justification. Had Mr. Gladstone told us that his conversion was in this way, supramundane, instantaneous, and with power, of whatever other faculty we might have questioned his possession, he could not have laid himself open to the kind of retort which he has met with from Mr. Bazely.

THE VOLUNTEERS AND THE CAPITATION GRANT.

THERE is no doubt that Volunteer affairs have arrived at a sort of crisis, not from internal so much as from external causes. The strength and efficiency of the civilian army (and, in spite of the gross and altogether exceptional misconduct of one or two battalions at the Windsor Review last year, we will add its discipline also) have improved every year, and not least in the year last past, the ninth since its first establishment. But the Volunteers, though they have many friends, are not without a few enemies, who at first predicted that the movement would wear itself out in a year or two, and die of inanition, and are now found representing that men who have half their expenses paid by the State have no right to call themselves Volunteers, and ought to be ranked as paid soldiers of little or no value. It is quite true that those who affect this tone are not very numerous; but they are very industrious in making their voices heard. The Times of Thursday contained a letter from one of them—perhaps a distinguished cavalry officer—who signs himself "Hippophylax," in which he makes or implies the following assertions:—

1. That the Volunteers are of no value for offensive operations, and that these alone decide the fortune of war.

2. That the money spent upon the Volunteers could be better invested in regular soldiers.

3. That the Volunteers could never be called out for permanent service, because they have no transport, commissariat, or hospitals of their own.

4. That the acceptance of a capitation grant in payment of part of their necessary expenses constitutes them paid soldiers.

The inevitable inference from the first two of these propositions, if true, would be that the Volunteer movement was a blunder, and that the whole force ought to be instantly disbanded. The cost to the nation of 170,000 Volunteers is something like 250,000*l.*; that is, enough to maintain two or three battalions of regular troops. If "Hippophylax" is right, two or three such battalions therefore would be of more service in holding the forts and keeping the field against an enemy than 170,000 imperfectly trained Volunteers. We have a proper national faith in the power of one British soldier to thrash three Frenchmen, but seventy or eighty Volunteers does seem rather long odds for the stoutest of guardsmen to be matched against. Indeed, if "Hippophylax's" assertion is not rank absurdity, all the general officers, from the Commander-in-Chief downwards, who have handled and inspected Volunteers on hundreds of occasions, must have been wilfully and grossly deceiving the country again and again for the last nine years; and we prefer the authority of competent judges who have made themselves acquainted both with the capabilities and the defects of the Volunteers to of "Hippophylax," whoever he may be. are not, and have never pretended to be, regular soldiers; but for all that, 170,000 of them, drilled as they now are, with their knowledge of musketry and great gun-practice, and with abundant capacity for improvement, when called out for continuous service, must, on the most modest estimate, be a shade more powerful than 2,000 or 3,000 of the finest troops in the world.

The third objection which "Hippophylax" states to the Volunteer army is the want of transport, commissariat, and hospital organization. "Hippophylax" can scarcely be ignorant that the transport staff, the commissariat staff, and the hospital staff are, in the main, as much external to any regiment of the Line engaged in active service as to a regiment of Volunteers. At a time when the commissariat was, if not perfect, certainly less inefficient than it now is, it was a purely civilian body under the Treasury; and though it has been transferred to the War Office, and reorganized—or disorganized—it is not the less external to the combatant portion of the army. Volunteers, if called out, would have the same right to its services as if they were regular soldiers, and if it be said that its strength is not sufficient for an army of more than 50,000 men, the obvious remedy, if more force is needed, is to increase the commissariat, and not to reduce the combatant force. The argument, so far as it proves anything, is an argument against any increase of force, and not at all against the Volunteers as distinguished from other defenders of the country. No administrator in his senses would dream of establishing one commissariat corps for the supply of regular soldiers, and an entirely distinct corps to minister to the wants of Volunteers who might be encamped by their side. This and all other supply services ought to be so organized as to be capable of providing for the whole British forces in the field, whether they called themselves regulars, militia, or Volunteers.

The last proposition of our anti-Volunteer, to which all the others seem intended to lead up, is neither more nor less than a gross perversion of fact. It would be quite logical for a man who thought Volunteers in any number utterly useless, to say that the trifling sums expended by the country on their equipment and armament are thrown away. If we thought Volunteers useless, we should say the same. But it is inexcusable, even in the most prejudiced of cavalry officers, to say that a Volunteer becomes a paid soldier because he is only (say) 2*l.* or 3*l.* a-year out of pocket instead of 4*l.* or 5*l.*, as he might be if Government did nothing towards the supply of his arms and other requirements. It is quite open to any one to object to the principle of Government assistance in paying adjutants and sergeants, and contributing to the cost of arms, clothing, and head-quarter establishments; but nobody has a right to call this contribution pay, or to refuse the title of Volunteers to men every one of whom gives both time and money to the cause, and some of whom are mulcted to the extent of hundreds of pounds a year for the honour of being what "Hippophylax" calls paid soldiers. Statements such as those we have referred to would be of little importance, were it not that unfounded assertions on any subject do leave a mark upon the minds of men who have not taken the trouble to think about it, which it is not always easy to rub out.

It is satisfactory to find that neither Mr. Cardwell nor any other Minister, nor, so far as we know, any single officer of repute in the army (unless "Hippophylax" be one), has ever committed himself to the views on which we have commented; and, with this consensus of opinion to back us, we shall continue to believe that Volunteer artillerymen and riflemen have some considerable value, and that, after every allowance for the superior efficiency of regularly trained soldiers, they give incomparably more strength for the money which they cost than any other force which an equal outlay, or indeed ten times the outlay, would support.

Mr. Cardwell, though he did his best to rebuff the Volunteer deputation that lately waited upon him, so far from taking up the position assumed by "Hippophylax," frankly acknowledged that he highly valued the Volunteers as a means of defence, and that he thought they ought not to be called upon for pecuniary sacrifices in addition to the devotion of their time and energy to the service of the country. It might be quite possible to maintain a Volunteer force on an insignificant scale wholly self-supporting, without the slightest fragment of Government aid. One or two such corps existed before the general movement commenced. The well-known Victorias, for example, found their own rifles and accoutrements, maintained their own establishment complete, kept up a splendid band, and paid every expense of range and head-quarters, at an average annual cost for officers and privates which we believe we underrate at 20*l.* A few such corps might of course be supported, but they must necessarily be composed of comparatively rich men. When it was determined to make the Volunteers into a national force, it was seen at once that the scheme would prove a chimera if it involved any considerable expenditure on the part of the men who volunteered to give their services, but not their money. At first Government supplied rifles and little else, and all other expenses were defrayed out of funds contributed, not by the Volunteers, the bulk of whom were poor men, but by wealthy supporters of the movement, who associated themselves as honorary members with the various corps. The enthusiasm of the men who gave their time and labour has never flagged; but the enthusiasm of those who only gave their money soon began to wane; and then the Government stepped in, and by the capitation grant partially filled up the void which was left. The sort of eleemosynary aid of honorary members went on declining in amount, while necessary expenses could not be curtailed, and by degrees the honour of a commission in a Volunteer corps came to imply the duty of supplementing its finances by very heavy annual payments. So long as competent officers were to be found willing to pay this tax, no great harm was done; but it is now notorious that the expensiveness of a commission narrows the field of selection to a comparatively small class of wealthy men, and that in many instances vacancies in the commissioned ranks cannot be filled up at all, simply because the men who are competent and willing are unable to bear the expense. Lord Elcho put the case very temperately and very fairly before the Minister, and Mr. Cardwell frankly declared his opinion that the Volunteers were a most valuable body, and that while they gave their services gratuitously they ought not to be called upon to contribute a shilling towards the necessary expenses of their establishment. In dealing with a deputation it is always safe for the moment to dispute a fact, because detailed proof cannot be instantly produced; and Mr. Cardwell, true to official instincts, while he admitted that the Government ought to provide all necessaries, denied that any needful expenditure was thrown upon the Volunteers themselves. If Mr. Cardwell seriously believed this, he must have had advisers as well informed as "Hippophylax"; and unless he was insincere (which we will not believe) in accepting the principle that the Volunteers should be asked for work only and not for money, he cannot well refuse an inquiry into the question which he has himself raised, whether the Government allowances are, or are not, sufficient to cover all necessary expenses.

According to the rules laid down by the Government some years ago, necessary expenses include uniforms, ranges, conveyance to drill and practice, expenses of arms, and the support of orderly rooms, armouries, and the like. The first of these items is sufficient to absorb the whole capitation grant of 1*l.* per efficient. The extra 10*s.* for musketry is far more than consumed by the expenses incidental to ranges, including often a large amount of ammunition beyond the scanty Government supply, and all the rest of the acknowledged necessaries are left to be purchased by the Volunteers themselves. In the richer corps, of course, the men find their own uniforms and accoutrements, and pay for a number of other requirements; and even the poorest Volunteers (with few exceptions) pay some sort of subscription, though they leave the weight of the burden to fall upon their officers. That these are the facts Mr. Cardwell will learn if he inquires, and when he has discovered them, we shall be curious to find on what principle he can reject a request for the supply of necessaries the cost of which he admits ought not to be thrown on the Volunteers.

THE BIRCH IN THE BOUDOIR.

ANOTHER step has been taken in the onward march of feminine aggression. On all sides the fortress in which masculine presumption has so long been entrenched is now assailed, and one by one the outworks are falling. That hideous old superstition of the supremacy of man having once been denied, and his claims to an exclusive use of any virile properties, from brains to breeches, having once been vitiated, it is astonishing to see how rapidly the whole social and political fabric which has been constructed on that foundation is tumbling to pieces. Man's monopoly of cigars, of clubs, of the pulpit, of the liberal professions, of sports, of academical life, and of the franchise having each of them been more or less successfully infringed, one might almost have been inclined to fancy that there was little else left which woman could grudge him; that he had been stripped of every shred of his ancient encroachments, and that, except the trifling and accidental distinctions of sex and of bodily strength, there was now really no property and no quality left undisputed which might be said to differentiate the male from the female Briton. But such a conclusion would be premature. There is at least, it seems, one more great privilege, one more time-honoured custom, which the male inhabitants of this country have been used to arrogate to themselves, and of the exercise of which there are divers notorious emblems and instruments. The male inhabitants of Great Britain have been hitherto distinguished from their female compatriots, as from the inhabitants of most other countries, by the peculiar insular privilege of receiving corporal chastisement at certain stages and in certain conditions of their existence; and indeed, until very recently, it would not have been an inaccurate account of the difference between Englishmen and Englishwomen which described the former as that portion of the community which is, and the latter as that which is not, flogged. It was not likely that women, in their present mood of self-assertion, would long allow such an invidious distinction to remain unchallenged. If the young Englishwoman is to be trained to be in all respects as like as possible to what the young Englishman has been, it is clear that means of discipline and correction similar to those which have been in force among men must be brought to bear upon the girls. It was to be expected that before long that should occur which has now, it seems, in fact occurred; that man's monopoly of the birch and the cane, as instruments of training or education, should be attacked in the same way as his monopoly of the academy, the pulpit, and the franchise; that a sect of Female Flagellants would arise to swell the numbers of those who are assailing man's empire; and that to the women who wish to preach, the women who wish to graduate, and the women who wish to vote, would shortly be added the women who wish to flog.

That in the year 1869 there should be living in England, and in London, a considerable number of women, moving apparently in good society, and some of them titled, who are in the regular habit of stripping and flogging with birches, apple-twigs, or leather straps, their daughters of thirteen years old and upwards, must appear to foreigners simply incredible, and to most Englishmen very queer. Yet that such is the case is amply proved by a correspondence in the Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine, on the subject of "Flogging Girls," which commenced in August of last year, and which, after having lasted six months, and having handled the details of corporal punishment in a style which certainly did not err on the side of too much reserve or delicacy, has at last apparently been brought to a conclusion by a summing up from the conductor of the magazine favourable on the whole to the cause of the flagellants. This correspondence, or "conversazione," as the ladies' periodicals affect to call their agglomerations of rambling queries and epistles on any topic which happens to interest their patrons, from best methods of education to best methods of removing superfluous hair, shows that there are in England many women—some of them declared by the conductor of the Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine to be "ladies of title, and well worthy of attention"—who make it a regular practice, "for certain faults," to strip their grown-up girls, and, either by their own hands or by the hands of governesses, to inflict upon them severe floggings. Nor is this all. Some of these ladies are downright enthusiasts for the birch and the taws. They seem to glory in the privilege of thrashing their girls. They give faithful representations, carefully drawn from the life, of their own pet mode of conducting the operation. The preliminaries, the place of execution—sometimes a bedroom, sometimes a boudoir—the instrument of torture, the behaviour of the victim before, during, and after the infliction of the flogging, in short the most minute details of the entire process, are described with that graphic force which some women exhibit when writing on a subject which powerfully interests and excites them. These writers do not even take the line of apologizing for the inhumanity, or of endeavouring to palliate the shame, which must be involved in the process of stripping and flogging a girl of fifteen or sixteen years old. On the contrary, some of them, who seem to have a sort of mission for propagating the doctrine of flogging girls, are most keen in recommending means whereby the pain may be made as severe and the shame as overwhelming to the sufferer as possible. Thus, for example, a "Mother of a Family" who evidently belongs to this class of enthusiasts, who says that she was herself flogged "until she was fully fourteen years old," and who, in describing her experiences, occasionally employs a phraseology which is a little too highly spiced to be quoted here, writes:—

> I have my girls' fullest love and confidence; yet I never omit the punishment for certain faults. At the same time it causes hardly an hour's intermission of our happy intercourse. It is of course inflicted in strict privacy, and without anger or scolding. A short while ago I tested both plans in the case of a niece, a girl of thirteen, who was placed under my control in my house. She had been reared on the "moral force" plan, and was as bold and disobedient a child as could be met with. For a month I tried the moral plan, but in vain. At length I resolved to see what the rod would do; and so, taking her with me one day after gross misconduct into a secluded room, I lectured her kindly and gently on her behaviour, and finished by telling her that, as all other means had failed, I would now give her a sound whipping. She was much dismayed, as you may guess; but seeing how calm and determined I was, she quietly submitted, and I gave her what some American friends call "a spanking," sharp, short, and effectual. From that day the greatest change has been visible in her; and though four months have elapsed, I have found it necessary to repeat the operation only twice.

Only twice! and does this enthusiastic flagellant, in whom the disposition to flog appears to be a congenital or inherited habit, really think that three floggings in the course of four months are a small allowance for a young lady in her fourteenth year? Would a Harrow boy of the same age consider it a small allowance? What would a Wykehamist in the Fifth Book think of being "bibled" or "scrubbed" at the rate of nine times a year? But then Wykehamists and Harrovians are not, if we may judge from the lamentations and complaints of parents and teachers in the Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine, so unruly, so insubordinate, and so generally incorrigible as young ladies aged from thirteen to eighteen. Thus one poor parent, after describing the failure of an attempt to educate girls under the "no-personal-chastisement system," says:—

> Their progress was so unsatisfactory, and their general conduct so insubordinate and unladylike, that I yielded to the reiterated solicitations of the governess, and consented to her introducing the rod. One was accordingly procured, and at her suggestion it was made of soft pliable leather, cut into long narrow thongs at one end, which she assured me produced intense pain with little or no injury to the person. I directed the governess to inflict upon each of them a most severe whipping, which was arranged to take place in her boudoir immediately after evening prayer. The eldest was first taken to her dressing-room and prepared for the rod, and then conveyed to the boudoir by the governess, who at once administered the discipline. The younger one was then prepared, and received a wholesome flagellation. These whippings were administered supra dorsum nudum (sic), the delinquents being tightly strapped to an ottoman during the castigation; at the conclusion of which they had to kiss the rod and thank the governess, when they were permitted to retire. Since then there has been a most marked improvement in their behaviour, and the progress made in their studies has been truly gratifying. It is now nearly nine months since one had to be corrected in the boudoir, although the rod is yet occasionally applied to the palms of their hands when they are negligent.

At the commencement of this discussion on the art and mystery of flagellation, it appeared that there was a large number of fair aspirants to initiation in the mystery who were extremely ignorant of its most elementary details. Very numerous and very various inquiries as to the best instrument, as to the best means of making or procuring it, and as to the best mode of applying it when procured, appear to have poured in upon the editor such as it might have perplexed even Orbilius himself to have answered satisfactorily. But the editor was equal to the occasion. He availed himself of the assistance of some persons of his own sex, who had experience of the flogging of boys; and their teachings, backed by the extreme keenness and eagerness to learn which the patronesses of the magazine exhibited, have caused a most rapid and astonishing advance in the development of the doctrine and discipline of this new Society for the Whipping of Young Women. The following six principles may be said to be definitely adopted by the Society:—1. So long as girls are under their parents' protection there is practically no limit of age, short of twenty-one years, beyond which they may not be profitably flogged. "Even at the age of eighteen," cries one enthusiastic mother, "I will administer corporal chastisement"; while another says that she inflicts this discipline "regardless of the age of the offender, who, if she behaves like a child, must expect to be treated as one." 2. The flogging of a girl should always be effective; and it is so in proportion as it produces shame and pain. 3. With the view of producing shame, it is desirable that the sufferer's sisters should be present at the operation. 4. For similar reasons, and also in order to obviate resistance, it may be well to summon the attendance of the servants:—

> On the first occasion [says a lady who signs herself a "Lover of the Rod"] on which your girls show disobedience and want of respect for their mother, order all three up to your bedroom, to wait till you come. I would keep them all three waiting in suspense, as not comprehending your intentions. Then I would provide myself with a good birch rod or cane (a cane is very severe), go up stairs, shut the doors, and at once tell the eldest one you are going to give her a flogging. Doubtless she will feel much astonished, and very indignant; but if you are firm, and threaten to call in the servants to help you, she will submit. There must be shame as well as pain in this; but she has deserved both, in my opinion; and one such punishment in the presence of her two sisters will do everything.

5. With the view of producing pain the sufferer must be unflinchingly stripped. This principle was, after some hesitation, finally settled in the last number of the magazine, on the authority of an old gentleman who affirmed that "during his school career it was his duty, as junior King's Scholar, to purchase and apply all the birch rods of the college," who says that in choosing the instrument "salutary care must be taken to purchase rods with good buds, the handles being about the thickness of the wrist," and who "warns perplexed mothers that any interposition of underclothing materially interferes with the efficiency of the operation." The sixth rule states how and where the rod is to be applied. The discussion of this question does not appear to have presented the least difficulty to the conductors or the contributors of this magazine. They have treated the topic with a freedom and fearlessness of expression which is justified by one correspondent on the ground that "the Englishwoman's Magazine is written for women only," and which we may therefore suppose represents, in the opinion of that correspondent, the genuine esoteric or after-dinner style of ladies' conversation. The reader is not likely to feel much desire to intrude into the mysteries of such a conversation; and, besides, enough has already been said to show how rapid a progress has been made since the summer by this new sect of female flagellants in the organization and propagation of their doctrines.

The French Commissioners who recently reported to the Emperor on our Public Schools express their astonishment that our great Head-Masters, with their huge salaries, their extensive learning, their high reputation, their dignified social position, and their good prospects of seats in the House of Lords, should condescend to use the birch; and they declare their conviction that the custom will soon die out. It seems plain, from what has been written during the last six months in the Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine, that if the English Head-Masters do abandon the custom of flogging, it will be enthusiastically maintained by English mothers and their governesses. Is it possible that before long the only creatures in Europe, besides cattle, that are flogged will be English criminals and English girls? Or is the whole of this amazing correspondence fictitious? Is it nothing more than an elaborate and vulgar hoax? Have "Materfamilias," the "Marchioness," the "Perplexed Mother," and the other "Lovers of the Rod" no existence out of the fertile brain of the conductor of the Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine? One of these two hypotheses must be true; and it is hard to say which of them is the more preposterous.

THE CESSION OF GIBRALTAR.

NOTHING could more forcibly illustrate the progress we have made in that spurious kind of Liberalism which consists in being always ready to sacrifice national interests to political sentiment, than the effort to imagine a proposal for the cession of Gibraltar to Spain as coming from two of Nelson's admirals. The old Rock made glorious by its capture and its defence was to our grandfathers a sacred spot, and to the sailors of their generation doubly sacred as a splendid trophy and an impregnable refuge. It is hardly too much to say that the admiral of the Nelsonian period would as soon have thought of proposing the surrender of Dover to France, as of Gibraltar to Spain. Its value has been enhanced rather than diminished by the facts that our fleets are now composed, not of sailing vessels, but of steam-ships absolutely dependent on secure coaling stations, and that since our supremacy on the seas is no longer undisputed, it is more than ever necessary to hold fast to every point that may give us an advantage against a naval foe. But such reasons are all too slight to avert the tampering propensities of sham Liberalism. The question which has, in consequence, been for weeks before the public, here and in Spain, is discussed by us with far less of warmth or interest than the fancies of particular clergymen for embellishing their persons and their churches, or the claim of somebody who was never heard of before, and will never be heard of again, to enjoy a seat in the Legislature.

People of average reasoning powers, even if they know nothing of Gibraltar, must have detected some weak points in the arguments that have been adduced for the abandonment of the fortress. They must have failed to perceive, for instance, how we could entitle ourselves to the gratitude of Spain by giving up to her a naval station which is carefully branded as indefensible and worthless; or how we should display a fine sentiment of justice by holding forcible possession of a piece of the territory of one friendly Power in place of a piece of the territory of another. It may also have occurred to them that, if we are to abandon dominions because our presence there is disagreeable to other claimants, we shall have to begin much nearer home than the Mediterranean. Indeed, seeing how obvious all this is, it would scarcely have been necessary for those who have some regard for our ancient possession to say any more on the subject, if the controversy that has ensued had not unluckily arrived at the dignity of a public discussion, and reached a stage where opinion may possibly ripen into action. In these days of sentimental policy it would be unsafe to consider any crotchet, having about it that high flavour of magnanimous self-sacrifice so attractive to minds of a particular order, as too wild to find advocates and executors. The discussion itself gives ample proof that there are irresponsible politicians among us quite ready to perform, on behalf of the public, the most disinterested acts. The late elections have given us a number of legislators who, as their speeches show, have, along with a great desire to make a figure, a very limited acquaintance with public affairs or with the national interests, and who are therefore in the condition most favourable to the reception of such ideas as may lead by the shortest cuts to personal distinction. At the head of the departments of War and the Navy we have officials whose opinions on the subject of naval fortresses, being quite free from the bias of professional knowledge, are about equally valuable. And at the head of the Government we have a Minister still engaged in a process of self-education which may conduct him to conclusions unknown to himself or to others, and which certainly will not be rejected because they happen to conflict with received prejudices or opinions. Under these circumstances the common sense of the country, always somewhat supine in its self-reliance, may some day wake up to find that the only part left to it in the matter is to make the best of a bad bargain.

The argument especially likely to weigh with sentimental statesmen, volunteer or official, is that the Spaniards are aggrieved at the sight of our flag floating on the Rock, and would be grateful to see it peacefully replaced with their own. If by "the Spaniards" is meant the inhabitants of the neighbouring parts of Andalusia, who are more immediately interested in the matter than any other portion of the Spanish population, the fact is that they by no means object to us as neighbours. To assume that in the course of more than a century and a half so philosophical a people should not have learned to accommodate themselves to an ever-present fact, but should have gone on transmitting hatred for the Union Jack through so many generations, is to give them much less credit for good sense than their established character entitles them to claim. And, in fact, the assumption is not only contradicted by the good understanding that exists between the people and the garrison, but by obvious considerations of self-interest. The presence of a large foreign population is very important to the prosperity of the adjoining part of Spain, insomuch that, on those occasions when their old-fashioned quarantine laws have proscribed all communication with the garrison, the town and neighbourhood of San Roque have suffered extreme distress. The city of Gibraltar is crowded with a population which —Spanish by descent, but English by adoption—forms a close connecting link between the foreign elements, facilitating the intercourse of the English with Spain, familiarizing each race with the good that lies beneath a surface of prejudice or reserve, and softening the collision of national ideas and habits which are in many respects so different. But it is said that the facilities for smuggling which Gibraltar offers form a grave cause of offence. Not certainly to the Andalusians, who can scarcely be supposed to be indignant at illegalities which they so largely encourage. The men of Kent and Sussex were not used to regard with especial rancour the French ports from whence, in the old days of prohibitory duties, issued the brandy, silks, gloves, and laces surreptitiously landed on their coasts, to gladden their own hearts, and the hearts of their wives and daughters. Nor have the Andalusians, forced by the detestable policy of the Bourbon Government to smoke abominable tobacco, to drink vile spirits, and to wear dear and bad clothing, regarded in a hostile light that port whence come those comforts which their rulers have denied them. That the Spanish Government should dislike to see Gibraltar in our hands was only natural, for the contraband trade caused reductions in a revenue which was in a large measure dependent on the adulteration of some commodities and the prohibition of others. The Governor of Algeçiras, too, numbering among his chief duties that of preventing smuggling, must always have regarded with haughty displeasure the neighbouring fortress which caused to him and his subordinates so much trouble and anxiety. But what a time is this, for those who have kept their notions on the subject to themselves for so many years, to propose to exchange a British port, fortress, and town for the ephemeral gratitude of a Prim or a Serrano, who may be heaven knows what, and have vanished heaven knows where, before the ink is dry in which the preliminaries of exchange are written. And when a permanent Government is established in the Peninsula, if it be such as England can regard with sympathy, it will be one that, by giving Spain freer institutions, and removing vexatious restrictions on commerce, will remove also the only tangible ground of complaint.

We affirm, therefore, that the inhabitants of the Spanish province most nearly concerned in our occupation of Gibraltar do not object to it, and that the desire to propitiate the Government was never so inadmissible as it is now, as an element in the question. The Spanish population of the Rock would assuredly witness our departure with sincere regret. But there is still another interest to be considered, and one hitherto strangely left out of the discussion—that of the British Governor and troops who hold the fortress. Gibraltar is a real military possession. It is not, like Canada, a colony where the advantage is all on the side of the colonists. It does not, like our home fortresses, form a garrison where our troops only play at being soldiers. It is a spot guarded with the jealous care due to its vast importance, and not a house is held on the Rock except by a tenure subject to the exigencies of defence. A real military station, where guards that mount in sight of the Spanish sentries have a practical meaning, where the forms of war are not make-believe, where military authority is of necessity paramount, and which thus forms a better school of actual war than any home garrison can possibly be, exists on a spot of earth peculiarly favoured by nature. The Rock is no barren crust like Malta; it is clothed with a lavish and beautiful vegetation. The streets present the most picturesque variety of costume to be found perhaps in the world; British troops, Andalusian peasants, Moors, Jews, and Genoese all mingling in rich diversity of array. It is covered with valuable public buildings, libraries, hospitals, barracks, and official residences, and is furnished with such extensive works as lines of defence, artificial harbours, and modern artillery imply. For many months of the year the climate is delicious, and the irksomeness of garrison duty is relieved by the facility of exploring close at hand one of the most interesting and romantic regions in Europe. No wonder that it is the most popular foreign quarter now left to our troops. And this place we are asked to exchange for the barren isthmus of a barren and savage territory, where the garrison would be cut off from all civilized intercourse, except by sea, and surrounded by a population not merely barbarous, but hostile, who would come down then, as now, with their long guns to fire on the sentries as a matter of exhilarating amusement. Involved in perpetual disputes, we should be told by the ruler of Morocco, as we have been told before, when complaining of outrages committed by his subjects, that he could not control them, and would be only too glad if we would chastise them for ourselves. Such is the agreeable prospect offered to the British taxpayer, and such the tempting exchange of gold for brass which Admiral Grey chooses this particular juncture of Spanish affairs to propose. We will answer for it that, if Ceuta ever does become a British station, the names of the promoters of the cession will never be mentioned there without execration.

We have purposely abstained from the professional view of this question; because a public discussion on such grounds can seldom be satisfactory or convincing, and because nothing has been advanced by the advocates of the cession which has not been controverted by at least equal authority. Nothing but ordinary common sense is needed to show that a signal station 1,400 feet above the sea must be of infinite advantage to a naval fortress and port; and that an isolated rock with lofty and powerful batteries looking to sea and land, possesses incalculable superiority for defence over an isthmus commanded by neighbouring ground and open on all sides to attack. We trust that there may soon be an end of a discussion that cannot be other than mischievous. We trust that the one condition on which our old Mediterranean watch-tower will be surrendered to Spain will be that offered by Heathfield—that she will come and take it. If it were given up, one of our first efforts in a war with Spain would be for its recapture; and if in such a case Admirals Grey and Sullivan, who are so confident of its weakness, were placed in the front of the battle, they might perhaps find reason to change their opinion. But we prefer to hope that no such contingency is possible; that in war it may continue to be to us a tower of strength, and that in peace it may become a great and valued storehouse of British products, for commerce with a better-governed Spain. And we hope that the preliminary measure which has been indiscreetly suggested, of causing official inspections and reports of the works of Ceuta to be made, will not be resorted to. It would be a pity to foster a belief that we could possibly intend to pay Cervantes such a compliment as he never dreamed of, by adopting towards his country a policy that might seem to be inspired by his immortal hero.

AN ITALIAN DUEL.

THERE is a story, familiar among lawyers, which tells how an Old Bailey barrister was challenged by a learned friend in consequence of a dispute in court; and, being unable to muster resolution either to fight or to refuse to fight, he invented the expedient of leaving the letter of challenge on the table of a room which he quitted as his wife entered it. Returning hastily, he picked up the letter, and hoped that his wife had not read it. "Yes," she answered, "I have, and you must fight." We believe that this particular duel did not come off; but, if barristers behaved to one another in court in the last century as they do now, duels after court must have occurred frequently. It may be, however, that they behaved differently, for undoubtedly many excesses of the tongue were restrained by the ever-impending liability to answer for them with sword or pistol. Duelling, as an enthusiastic Frenchman says, preserved civilization from the inroads of brutal vulgarity. Men abstained from abuse and fisticuffs, and resorted to genteel murder. "Let us appeal," says this same Frenchman, "to our conscience; and can we affirm that pugilism would not have been introduced into our senate had not duelling, as master of the ceremonies of civilization, protected it from brutality?" Sir Lucius O'Trigger recommended a fight to prevent misunderstanding, and it is more polite to stab a man to the heart than to give him a broken head or a bloody nose. Duelling, says our Frenchman, is an essential accompaniment of representative institutions; and it turns out that he is right, for pugilism has been almost introduced into the Italian Chamber of Deputies, and that Chamber has only been "protected from brutality" by two of its members becoming targets to one another for upwards of an hour.

A correspondent of the Morning Post lately informed us that the chief Parliamentary business of the week at Florence had been a duel between Deputy Morelli and Commendatore Paternostro. He does not, of course, mean that this duel took place on the floor of the House, or that the functionaries corresponding to Government and Opposition whips loaded the pistols, or that the Italian substitute for Mr. Speaker gave the word to fire; but a quarrel arose out of a political discussion, and one of the disputants threatened, and the other actually struck, a blow, whereupon, as our French friend would say, "the master of the ceremonies of civilization" intervened; or, in other words, a hostile meeting was publicly arranged. We don't find that the Chamber of Deputies adjourned to the field of combat; and, indeed, observing the erratic courses of bullets, they were a good deal safer in their own House. But a procès verbal of the transaction was drawn up and published in the Nazione, and the proceeding seems to have been as regular as a debate in the Chamber or a judicial trial. The parties proceeded to the ground accompanied by four seconds and two surgeons. While the seconds were making their preparations the parties waited in separate rooms, each accompanied by a doctor—an arrangement admirably contrived to produce calmness and confidence at the trying moment. It is not stated whether the doctors put before their possible patients the alternative of being pickled and sent home or of lying snugly in some adjacent cemetery, or whether they conversed cheerfully and pleasantly about the quantity and quality of powder necessary to send a ball through a moderately thick gentleman, without allowing it to stick where it could not be conveniently extracted. The "ceremonies of civilization" performed by the seconds were rather more complicated than was usual among ourselves in the days when duels protected us from brutality. A piece of ground was measured, and divided into three parts. The centre part measured twenty paces, and the two ends were of equal length, and measured, as we understand, ten paces. The combatants were placed at the extremities of this piece of ground, and thus they would be at a distance of forty paces from one another. On a given signal they were to advance. Each might advance ten paces, but no more, so that they would always be separated by twenty paces at least. But either party might give fire without completing his advance, provided that after firing he must stand still to receive the fire of his opponent. These are the usual conditions of what is called the duel à volonté, and we presume that they were observed on this occasion. "After everything had been fixed," and lots had been drawn for places, and lots had been again drawn for pistols, and all the other ceremonies of civilization had been performed, and MM. Morelli and Paternostro had been allowed ample opportunity both of conversing with the doctors and of communing with their own souls, then at last the duel began. It continued almost an hour. Each party fired five times, and there was a premature discharge and a miss-fire, making up the full allowance of six shots upon each side. We are happy to state that nobody was hurt. We should think that the seconds were in greater danger than the principals; but they kept their places courageously, and they seem to have waited for the moment when the balls began to pass anywhere near the supposed object of their aim, and then to have stopped the duel. As the procès verbal has it, "the last shots especially passed very close," and Deputy Morelli was stained with the earth thrown up by a projectile which fell close to his foot. This was all the damage actually done; but, considering that one of the combatants was able at the sixth attempt to drop a bullet at his opponent's feet, there was no saying that they might not have got to killing or wounding after another hour's practice. It is difficult to understand how the first hour was consumed, but we take for granted that the "ceremonies of civilization" are not performed with a breech-loading pistol. Indeed, an old-fashioned duellist would probably regard a breech-loader as an unsuitable weapon for a gentleman. It is true that in America breech-loaders would be preferred, but in that country we fear the "ceremonies of civilization" are disregarded, and almost the only regulation that prevails as to duels is that, unless the provocation is unusual, a combatant should only cut, and should abstain from stabbing, with a bowie-knife.

If eloquent applause is the highest encouragement to deeds of valour, the authors of this procès verbal will be the cause of many duels in the capital of Italy. The seconds, having all signed the document, are entitled to divide among them the honour of this heroical composition. We are happy to observe that they differ entirely in character from that Irish gentleman who having, as second to a challenger, received, to his great disappointment, an apology from the challenged, resorted, for fear there should be no fighting, to the expedient of quarrelling with his own principal, who had remarked that apology was not the mode of spelling usually adopted in polite society. The Italian seconds are well pleased with the conduct of their principals and of themselves. "Considering," they say, "that the two adversaries had exhibited a sangfroid superior to all enconium," especially when the last shots began to pass very close—and they might have added, if modesty had not forbidden, that the seconds showed almost equally admirable composure when the first shots were wandering about—"considering," they say again, "that the intrepidity thus displayed for nearly an hour before an adverse pistol's mouth, charged six times successively, is a thing reflecting honour upon any gentleman" (particularly, as they might have gone on to say, when no degree of unskilfulness in the use of a pistol can ensure its missing every time it is fired), "considering," once more, "that the object of going out is to elevate dignity, and not at all hazards to perpetrate revenge" (which latter object, they might have remarked, was very unlikely to be attained by gentlemen who seemed wholly incapable of taking aim), considering all these things, and perhaps considering also that this serio-comic drama had now occupied an hour, and that performers and spectators were becoming tired and hungry, it was declared that honour was satisfied, and that firing should cease. It would be unkind criticism to remark that if the combatants really desired to perpetrate revenge they would have done well to lay aside their pistols, and resort to the "brutality" of pugilism, or to some sort of fighting by which they might expect ultimately to succeed in doing one another mischief. There is a familiar saying that no man knows what he can do until he tries. We hope that this procès verbal will be preserved among the records of famous duels, for the demonstration it affords that no man knows what he can not do until he tries. A great writer upon duelling remarks that "rather erroneous notions have prevailed respecting the probabilities of the results." In England, whenever it was reported that a man was about to fight a duel, people imagined that he must be killed; but abroad the matter was treated more lightly. "They know from experience that the risk of being killed is trifling." We believe that the art of fighting duels with the small sword, without giving or receiving mortal thrusts, has been studied with success in France, and the same kind of result seems now to be attained in Italy with the pistol.* This is surely a triumph of civilization which ought to receive high honours at the next International Exposition. It is evident that, with the most humane intention, two unpractised duellists cannot be regarded as entirely secure against the risk of hitting one another. We should like to be informed how MM. Morelli and Paternostro acquired that "sangfroid superior to encomium," and that "intrepidity reflecting honour upon any gentleman," which enabled them to discharge six shots apiece without doing any injury which a clothes-brush could not repair. They must necessarily have assumed an appearance of what would be called, by brutal Englishmen addicted to pugilism, "meaning business," because, if a duellist manifestly "delopes," as the learned call it, or fires into the air, the duel thereupon, according to law, terminates. But if an unpractised marksman pretends to try to hit a mark, he may by accident go nearer to it than either he or the mark desired. Writers upon duelling warn their readers that great proficiency in a shooting-gallery may come to little in the field. The sensation of being fired at may disturb unpractised nerves, and an unerring shot at an inanimate target may miss a man who is shooting at the same moment. It would probably be quite as true to say that a man who could be trusted to miss a lifeless mark might, if he possessed less sangfroid and intrepidity than an Italian deputy, be liable to hit a living man. A high authority states that he has known persons who required some months' practice before they could overcome the nervous sensation produced by being fired at. There is an invention worthy of international honour which assists to overcome this nervousness. It consists of the figure of a man holding a pistol loaded with powder only, and placed close to the target fired at. A string attached to the trigger of this pistol has its other end attached to the waistband of the trousers of the person firing at the target. That person, by stepping slightly backwards at the moment of discharging the pistol which he holds in his own hand, produces an answering discharge from the figure which confronts him beside the target, and thus accustoms himself to receive an antagonist's fire without feeling nervous or uneasy. The invention thus described is evidently capable of improvement by the mechanical resources of our age, and the skill of various artists might combine to make the attitude and expression of the figure holding the pistol as terrible as possible, and to suggest to the imagination of the person firing at it that it possesses unerring skill and unpitying heart, that it cares not about elevating dignity, and is resolved to perpetrate revenge. No man can imagine, until he makes the experiment, what will be his feelings when stationed in front of an antagonist. He may miss the man whom he expected to hit. He may hit the man whom he desired to miss. Therefore, we say that an invention for accustoming the nerves to the sensation of being fired at deserves international recognition.

It is true that, after all the resources of science have been exhausted, the representation is not equal to the reality. The Ballot, as we know, has been proposed as a prevention against bribery and intimidation, and the Ballot has just been tried at Manchester with a result which would have been entirely satisfactory and conclusive if it were not for the circumstance that nobody desired to bribe, and nobody attempted to intimidate. So, perhaps, a man's confidence in his nerves derived from firing at a lay figure might be impaired by the consideration that the supposed antagonist did not fire ball. Nevertheless, we regard the success of these Italian duellists, who were able to fire at one another for an hour without hitting, as a clearly marked step in the progress of civilization; and if duels are necessary, as we are told they are, to the working of representative institutions, we are at least justified in expecting that many of these duels will terminate in a declaration that honour is satisfied, and that breakfast for all parties is ready at a tavern adjacent to the field of bloodless combat.

REVIEWS.

NAPOLEON AND PIUS VII.*

M. DE HAUSSONVILLE continues his history of the quarrel between Napoleon and Pius VII. The vast changes and successful wars of the French Revolution had given fresh energy and consciousness of force to secular government; the progress of ideas had enlarged its sphere of action, and the range in which it might assert its right to organize and control. The claims of the State were not likely to be underrated by a man like Napoleon. At first his policy had been to conciliate the Church, which the Revolution had terrified and despoiled, and, by the bait of great and manifest advantages, to tempt it to give its countenance, and even sympathy, to his daring political designs. He partly succeeded; but he asked too much, and the incurable coarseness and vulgarity of the man, which even his clear and large intellect could not counteract or veil, had turned a great negotiation into a common sharper's game, and had diminished the value of important concessions by insisting on conditions incredibly pitiful and vexatious. This was the first stage of the eventful debate, and M. de Haussonville has related it in his first two volumes. But Napoleon could not be satisfied with having won the Church, and laid it under great obligations, unless he could also show it to the world as his degraded and obsequious instrument. The Pope had stooped so low as to consent to crown him, but this was not enough; the Head of universal Christendom, the representative on earth of the Redeemer of mankind, must have as his enemies all who were the Emperor's enemies. Except that the Papacy had passed through crises as bad before, it might have been said that on the decision of Pius VII. hung the fate of his Church, and that, had he yielded, mankind would never have endured it more. But matters did not come to this test. Pius VII. had reached the point where he could yield no further; he stood firm, and General Miollis marched into Rome, and seized the last remains of the Pope's dominions.

If a romancer had wished to imagine an ideal struggle between force and right—between unscrupulous power, utterly contemptuous of all moral restraints, on the one side, and helpless weakness with nothing but conviction to support it, and the belief in the intrinsic strength of justice, on the other—he could hardly have improved on the facts of this trial of strength between Napoleon and Pius VII. A romancer would scarcely have ventured to invent an oppressor, of Napoleon's height of intellect and conscious strength, so senselessly and meanly brutal; he could not have imagined meek nobleness and dignity and self-respect, without ostentation and without discouragement, of a loftier and more genuine sort than was really shown by the Pope—a man naturally but too ready, wherever he could, to compromise and please—when once he made up his mind that he could yield no more, and must face the worst.

The bearing of all these proceedings on the common argument for the Pope's temporal power is worth noting. The great reason given for the existence of an ecclesiastical State different from all others in its conditions is the necessity that the Head of the Catholic Church should be independent; and the possession of sovereign rights and power is supposed to secure this independence. Under Napoleon this was tested; tested, no doubt, in a very rude and extreme way, but yet not beyond the conditions which the advocates of the temporal power must suppose. For if the temporal power fails just when it is wanted, in a time of trial and of danger to the Pope's spiritual freedom, it cannot be of much worth as a guarantee of independence. There was, of course, unscrupulous and overmastering oppression, of an exceptional kind; but against such oppression a Pope with a weak temporal power, or a Pope without any temporal power at all, would be equally defenceless. In such a case the temporal power could not save him; but at the same time he would have been no worse off without any temporal power. But what was the effect of the Pope's claiming to be a temporal sovereign, with the rights, and also the liabilities, of such a position? It was this, that it gave Napoleon his most plausible ground for requiring that the Pope should bend to his will. When Napoleon insisted that the Pope should take part with him against his enemies, close his ports against the English, and banish his Neapolitan Cardinals, he meant, of course, that the world should understand that all this was done by the Head of the Church; but he demanded it of the Pope as a temporal sovereign, and demanded only what belligerent nations, when they are strong enough, have often demanded. He made the demand because the Pope had certain territory which, unless it was in his own hands and under his control, would give great advantage to the enemies of France, and be very inconvenient to his military plans. Great nations with a serious war to carry on are apt to be high-handed. We seized the Danish fleet; in the Crimean war we put garrisons in Athens. We are not at all sure that the Duke of Wellington would have respected the independence of the Papal States if he had found them hampering his communications in an anxious campaign, and, under colour of an ambiguous neutrality, giving an opening to an enemy into the midst of his own lines. In a great struggle, States which are not strong enough to assert their neutrality are liable to be compelled to take a side. It was the Pope's claim to be a prince, like the Grand Duke of Tuscany or the Republic of Venice, which gave a handle to Napoleon, in a great European war, to attack the independence of the ecclesiastical and spiritual chief.

The temporal power only forced the Pope, who was indeed fighting for his religious independence, into a false position. With the history of the last three centuries behind him, and the traditions of Roman policy and diplomacy notorious to all the world, it was not easy to find an answer to the allegation of the clerical partisans of the Emperor, like the Legate Caprara, when they said that "a policy of alliance with France against the English had nothing in it contrary to the duties of the common Father of the faithful, or to the traditions of the Roman Court." Dealing with that Court as with a foreign and unfriendly Government, Napoleon might say, "If the Pope refuses to enter into the Italian Confederation, the reason is that he means war: the first result of war is conquest, and the final result of conquest is change of Government." And the grounds on which he decreed the annexation of the Legations, just before starting for Bayonne, are neither better nor worse than those on which he rested the measures which he ordinarily used towards those who attempted to thwart his political or military schemes:—

> Considering, he said, that the donation by Charlemagne, our illustrious predecessor, of the countries forming the States of the Pope, was made for the benefit of Christendom, and not for the advantage of the enemies of our holy religion; considering that the present sovereign of Rome has persistently refused to make war on the English, and to join with the Kings of Italy and Naples for the defence of the Italian peninsula; considering that the interests of the two kingdoms, and of the armies of Italy and Naples, require that their communications should not be interrupted by a hostile power—(and so forth).

These were the arguments, not altogether without speciousness, which the temporal power put into the mouth of the aggressor; while the Pope, in defending the temporal power, not satisfied with putting it on the common ground of public right and justice between nations, was tempted to raise his claims to a level which none but his own partisans could accept, and to embarrass his quarrel for his spiritual rights with assertions and pretensions such as no other temporal prince, under the stress of extreme necessity, would feel himself authorized to make. Unable to protect his subjects from the French invaders, he yet imposed on them, as Pope, on peril of the loss of their souls, the obligation to refuse to recognise the authority of masters whom they could not resist. He forbade them, on pain not merely of treason but of sacrilege, to take the oath of temporal allegiance which their conquerors were sure to require. Every one felt this to be a false move. M. de Haussonville says:—

> Après avoir établi que les droits de la souveraineté pontificale étaient d'une essence unique en son genre et supérieure à ceux de toutes les autres souverainetés, Pie VII parlait avec une réprobation toute nouvelle dans sa bouche de ce gouvernement français qu'il s'agissait de substituer au gouvernement de l'Eglise. C'était,—s'écriait-il dans des termes à tout le moins un peu extraordinaires de la part de celui qui avait signé avec tant de satisfaction le concordat, et qui naguère encore, il y avait deux mois à peine, avait été sur le point de s'allier avec Napoléon contre l'Angleterre—c'était un gouvernement notoirement envahisseur de la puissance spirituelle et protecteur de toutes les sectes et de tous les cultes. La formule de ses serments, ses constitutions, son code, ses lois, ses actes, respirent l'indifférence pour toutes les religions, sans en excepter la religion juive, cette ennemie implacable de J.-C. . . . . La protection jurée et si vantée du souverain des Français pour tous les cultes n'était donc autre chose qu'un prétexte et une couleur pour autoriser la puissance séculière à s'immiscer dans les affaires spirituelles, puisqu'en montrant tant de respect pour toutes les sectes, le gouvernement français ne respectait en effet aucun droit, aucune institution, aucune loi de la religion catholique. . . . . Il résultait de là . . . . qu'il n'était pas permis aux sujets du souverain pontife, tant ecclésiastiques que laïques, de prêter jamais à ce gouvernement intrus serment de fidélité. . . . serment d'un scandale grave qui favoriserait un fait qui ne pouvait tourner qu'au détriment de la foi et à la perte des âmes, serment répréhensible, injuste et sacrilége.

The Legations were thrown into perplexity and disquiet, threatening a vain resistance which would have been quelled with merciless severity. The Foreign Ministers—ill-pleased, M. de Haussonville suggests, at seeing the first example of opposition to Napoleon given by so feeble a Power—were scandalized at the Pope's imprudence; M. de Lebzeltern especially, the Austrian Minister, enlarged to Count Stadion on the unhappy and impolitic departure of the Pope's letter from the course recommended by the "lights of the age," and on its opposition to the principles professed by pious princes zealous for the interests of Catholicism. M. de Haussonville cannot resist the opportunity of reminding us, with sly amusement, how little M. de Lebzeltern, when he talked so wisely, knew of what was going on behind the scenes:—

M. de Lebzeltern avait sans doute raison quand il blâmait l'imprudence [illegible]

[illegible] de Lebzeltern ignorait tout à fait les préparatifs de sa cour en vue d'une guerre prochaine avec l'empereur; quand il prenait résolûment parti contre le pape en faveur des souverains si pieux et si zélés pour le catholicisme qui avaient eu le mérite d'établir la tolérance dans leurs États, il était loin de soupçonner l'alliance à peu près formée déjà, moyennant de gros subsides, entre l'Autriche et l'Angleterre, lorsqu'en termes pleines de tristesse il déplorait le manque fâcheux d'accord entre Rome et Paris.

But the mistakes of the Pope are as nothing when we read of them in the middle of a narrative such as M. de Haussonville has put together in this volume, drawn from the most authentic sources—the letters of the Emperor and his agents—and written with a calm and temperate soberness which befits the subject. Any attempt at giving a rhetorical colouring to the facts which he has to tell would be simply insufferable. It was no life and death struggle, in which hard measures are palliated by necessity. The Pope's neutrality was an inconvenience which Napoleon could well afford to bear. It was not stress of danger which drove the Emperor to violence, but irritation at not being able to have his way, and the determination at all costs to bend a will which he despised to his own. At all costs—the cost of sparing no stupid and spiteful outrage, of accumulating one act of ruffianism on another against an old man bearing, and bearing worthily, the most sacred dignity in the civilized world, of stooping to invent lie after lie even more ridiculous than they were impudent, and of displaying before Europe and his own subjects that after all he was baffled. It is impossible to doubt M. de Haussonville; yet we are continually tempted to rub our eyes, as he takes us, step by step, through these incredible events.

When Napoleon found that the occupation of Rome by the French troops under General Miollis produced no effect, his next step was to deprive the Pope of his natural Council, the Cardinals, most of whom were summarily—and, in some instances, by main force—driven from Rome. The immediate result was to force the Pope to take as his minister Cardinal Pacca, a man much less inclined to yield than Consalvi, and whom the Pope would not willingly have chosen for his chief adviser. But he could not help himself:—

Il était avant tout homme d'ancien régime; non pas, tant s'en faut, qu'il fût un prêtre rigide, altier et un caractère intraitable; tout au contraire, il était aimable, enjoué, plus versé qu'aucun de ses confrères du sacré collége dans la société romaine, s'y plaisant assez et y plaisant beaucoup, très-vif dans la conversation, très-prompt à la riposte, fort arrêté dans ses idées, peu différentes de celles que le comte Joseph de Maistre défendait alors avec tant de verve dans les salons de St.-Pétersbourg, mais ne craignant pas non plus d'examiner toutes choses sous leurs divers points de vue, facile à émouvoir comme la plupart de ses compatriotes, et cependant intrépide, allégre même en face du danger. Tel était alors le nouveau ministre qu'au mois de juin 1808 Pie VII venait d'appeler près de soi, et tel encore nous l'avons connu à Rome vingt ans plus tard dans son alerte vieillesse, l'un des chefs les plus actifs du parti absolutiste, demeuré malgré ses quatre-vingts ans un intrépide causeur, médisant volontiers de la France et rappelant toujours avec la plus évidente satisfaction les années qu'il y avait passées presque toujours en captivité, affectant de mépriser beaucoup les idées libérales et recherchant de préférence les hommes qui les professaient avec le plus d'éclat.

Pacca, courteous and conciliatory in the extreme in his behaviour to Miollis, was not the less resolute in his unflinching opposition. Miollis at length ordered him to quit Rome in twenty-four hours. All that he gained by it was the following scene:—

Pacca n'était pas homme à se troubler pour si peu. Il répondit qu'il n'avait d'ordre à recevoir chez lui de qui que ce fût, et qu'il allait prendre ceux de son souverain. Le major piémontais lui dit alors qu'il ne sortirait pas de la pièce où il était, et que son compagnon était chargé de l'y garder à vue. Le secrétaire d'État demanda la permission d'écrire à S. S., puisqu'on lui interdisait de se rendre en personne auprès d'elle. Le major y consentit, et, se retirant, laissa le cardinal sous la surveillance de son camarade.

Quelques minutes après, pendant que le secrétaire d'État causait avec son gardien de choses indifférentes, la porte de son cabinet s'ouvrit avec fracas; c'était Pie VII qui entrait. "Je fus alors témoin, raconte Pacca, d'un phénomène dont j'avais entendu parler, l'horripilation. Dans un accès de puissante colère, il arrive parfois que les cheveux se hérissent et que la vue est entièrement troublée. L'excellent pontife était dans cet état, et, quoique je fusse vêtu en cardinal, il ne me reconnut pas. Qui est là? s'écria-t-il, d'une voix forte.—Je suis le cardinal, lui répondis-je, en lui baisant la main.—Où est l'officier? reprit le saint père, et je le lui montrai près de moi dans une attitude respectueuse. Alors le pape se tournant vers lui:—Allez, dit-il, annoncer à votre général que je suis las de souffrir tant d'insultes et d'outrages de la part d'un homme qui ose encore se dire catholique. . . ."

He proceeded to forbid Pacca to obey the order, and warned the General that he must break the Pope's doors to get at him; and after the astonished French officer, who had not understood a word of all that the Pope had said, had asked Pacca to translate the message for him, the Pope led Pacca away with him, lodged him in an apartment next his own, and gave orders that no one in a French uniform was to be allowed on any consideration to enter the Quirinal Palace.

Napoleon's proceedings at Rome were influenced by the course which events took in Spain and Germany. He hesitated to go to extremities with the Pope, when the Spanish business began to be unexpectedly troublesome. "Évidemment," writes M. de Haussonville, "la parole était aux événements de la guerre." But Napoleon, who, as he says, "had the gift of thinking of everything," had yet time in Spain to think of even puerile ways of making himself personally disagreeable to the Pope. He wrote a despatch to M. de Champagny, his Foreign Minister, to say that neither he nor the King of Naples, nor any of the princes of his family, would have the wax tapers which the Pope was accustomed to distribute on Candlemas Day:—

M. de Champagny, le pape est dans l'usage de donner des cierges aux différentes puissances. Vous écrivez à mon agent à Rome que je n'en veux pas. Le roi d'Espagne n'en veut pas non plus. Écrivez à Naples et en Hollande pour qu'on les refuse . . . mon chargé-d'affaires fera connaître que le jour de la Chandeleur je reçois des cierges bénits par mon curé, que ce n'est ni la pompe ni la puissance qui donnent de valeur à ces sortes de choses. Il peut y avoir en enfer des papes comme des curés: ainsi le cierge béni par mon curé peut être une chose aussi sainte que celui du pape. Je ne veux pas recevoir ceux que donne le pape, et tous les princes de ma famille doivent en faire autant. (Benavente, Jan. 1, 1809.)

But at length the time seemed come. Napoleon appeared to have conquered in Spain; he had certainly conquered in Germany, and at Schönbrunn he signed the decree for the extinction of the Pope's temporal power. On the 10th of June, 1809, with a curious amount of cautious preparation, the decree was promulgated in Rome, and the tricolour was hoisted at St. Angelo under a salute of cannon. The Pope's answer was not unlooked for:—"The French want to force us to speak Latin; well, we will then"; and the Bull of excommunication, in spite of the vigilance of the French police, was posted up the same day in the usual places. The Pope seems to have hesitated, as he well might, at the feeble violence and clumsy accusations of the draughtsmen of his Chancery, and also at the risk to Pacca himself; but Pacca insisted, and the Bull, destined to be the source of infinite annoyance and vague disquiet to Napoleon, went forth. M. de Haussonville points out its inadequacy, and the anomalies attending it; one of the greatest being that the Pope himself appeared subsequently to make so little account of its having been pronounced. But it is satisfactory to think that, just because it seemed what Napoleon would have called a coup de théâtre, it touched a weak and sensitive place in the great despiser of right and truth—his imagination, and his fear what the world would say.

The Pope's arrest soon followed. M. de Haussonville gives a curious and minute account of it, in which he has used two reports from the agent employed in the work, the General of Gendarmerie, Radet. The first of these is his despatch to his superior officer at the time; the second is an apologetic and exculpatory memoir addressed, after 1814, to Pius himself. Each is a check on the other, and M. de Haussonville is not insensible to the occasional contrast in tone and language between them. To seize the Pope in the Quirinal is represented as a service of risk, and required as much dexterity and precision of combination as the attack of a fortress. But the only obstacle was in locked doors and rambling passages; and Baron Radet and his gendarmes, after much breaking of locks and panels, found themselves suddenly in the presence of their victim, and were at first as much disconcerted as the Gauls with Brennus at the first appearance of the senators. But they soon recovered themselves. Two hours for preparation were refused. The Pope was hurried off in a close carriage, without servants, without money, carrying nothing away with him but his breviary and his crucifix; and, with scarcely an interval of rest, his journey continued till he was lodged in the Préfecture at Grenoble. But Napoleon did not like having him in France; and, with throngs of people crowding for his blessing at every halting-place, he was transferred to Savona.

The coarse brutality which marked the whole business had probably no parallel even in Napoleon's career; but what was yet more characteristic was the fabric of lies with which it was attempted to be hidden from the public knowledge. Napoleon denied that he had ordered the arrest; not thinking, says M. de Haussonville, that his correspondence would one day be published, though not without gaps, by another Napoleon. His orders to Fouché to prevent any mention in the papers of what had passed at Rome were reiterated, and carried even to fussiness. He did secure for the time, says M. de Haussonville, that nothing was known in France, or at any rate that not a word was breathed there on the subject; and when he had to speak, as later at the National Council, this is the way in which the matter was put in a paper written for him by M. Daunou:—

Voici textuellement ce que nous y lisons, écrit avec force ratures de la main de M. Daunou, à propos de l'enlèvement du saint-père au Quirinal: "Le pape avait tout fait pour que sa présence à Rome devînt inutile, et quelques-uns de ses partisans pouvaient, malgré lui, la rendre dangereuse. Il en sortit le 6 juillet, à l'insu de l'empereur, et vint à Savone, où S. M. le fit recevoir, traiter, établir avec tous les égards dus au malheur."

Fouché could not resist the temptation, as he had to lie, of having his bad joke at the public which he kept in order:—

Au moment où la curiosité des nouvellistes de la capitale était le plus excitée, alors que chacun était avide de savoir comment le Moniteur prendrait sur lui de s'expliquer sur les [illegible] du saint-père, le ministre [illegible]

[illegible] était précisément le jour où, sur les ordres venus du ministère de la police, Pie VII avait été, au grand désappointement des habitants de la cité dauphinoise, brusquement transporté hors de leurs murs. En voyant la date de cette lettre, et le nom de la ville d'où elle était écrite, les lecteurs assidus de la feuille officielle s'imaginèrent sans doute qu'ils allaient enfin apprendre quelque chose sur le grand événement auquel chacun s'intéressait autour d'eux. Quelle ne dut pas être la surprise de tous et l'indignation de quelques-uns, quand tombèrent sous leurs yeux les lignes que voici: "Les esprits sont ici très-préoccupés du passage, dans la commune de Bornin (commune traversée par le pape lors de son arrivée à Grenoble), d'un animal inconnu, que les traces qu'il a laissées font présumer être un reptile d'une grosseur extraordinaire." Suivaient pendant une demi-page les détails les plus circonstanciés sur le chemin parcouru par le reptile, qui après avoir occupé à un si haut degré l'attention publique, avait fini, au dire de la feuille officielle, par s'aller perdre dans un torrent.

Then followed the divorce, the Emperor's dream of a sort of religious caliphate, his wild thought of an Œcumenical Council called by himself at Paris, and the more practical questions of filling up vacant sees, and transacting the current ecclesiastical business of the whole Roman Catholic world. He found, of course, that he only got deeper and deeper into inextricable difficulty. Here he was on ground where it was no question of temporal power, but purely of conscience and religion. And he was baffled. Obsequious as the higher French clergy for the most part were, he found even Cardinal Fesch troubled with scruples when Napoleon wanted by his own authority to make an Archbishop of Paris. The Pope, too, found means to make known his canonical prohibitions. Napoleon lost all patience, and in letters which are not included in the recent publication of his correspondence he ordered his agents at Savona to treat the Pope as if he were a conspirator and a traitor:—

Les ordres de l'Empereur furent exécutés à la lettre. . . . Ce fut dans la nuit du 8 janvier que le préfet de Montenotte se rendit au palais de l'évêque de Savone pour saisir la correspondance et les papiers du saint-père. "Tout le monde, écrit-il, était encore enseveli dans le sommeil; rien n'a pu échapper aux recherches." Les recherches dont parle le préfet de Montenotte furent pratiquées avec un soin extrême par des hommes envoyés exprès de Paris et qui savaient leur métier. On visita tous les appartements, on ouvrit, ou l'on força tous les tiroirs. On prit soin de découdre les vêtements de chacun, voire même ceux du pape. Ce que ne dit pas M. de Chabrol, et qu'il ignora peut-être, on crocheta, un peu plus tard, le secrétaire de Pie VII pendant qu'il était descendu se promener dans le petit jardin de l'évêché. Tous les livres trouvés pendant cette perquisition minutieuse furent mis de côté, et l'on enleva au S.-P. son écritoire, ses plumes, jusqu'à son bréviaire, jusqu'à un petit office de la Vierge qu'il portait presque toujours avec lui ainsi qu'une bourse en peau qui contenait un certain nombre de pièces d'or, et que l'on trouva dans l'appartement de Mgr. Doria. "Passe pour la bourse, dit Pie VII, mais que pourront-ils faire de mon bréviaire, et de l'office de la Vierge?" . . . Pour plus de sûreté, et sans doute afin de faire quelque chose qui fût particulièrement pénible à Pie VII, on fit partir pour Fenestrelle les serviteurs obscurs qui paraissaient jouir plus particulièrement de sa confiance. C'est ainsi qu'on lui enleva, à sa grande surprise, jusqu'au vieux valet de chambre qui lui servait de barbier. Dans les papiers compulsés avec soin, on ne découvrit rien que de très-insignifiant. Les pièces d'or trouvées chez Mgr. Doria étaient le produit d'une collecte que de pieux catholiques avaient faite pour subvenir aux besoins du S.-P. Dans la liste de donataires, que Mgr. Doria avait gardée et qui fut envoyée à Paris, l'empereur eut le désagrément de lire les noms de plus d'une personne appartenant à son gouvernement et même à sa cour.

That was not enough. The anti-climax was not complete. Napoleon, the master of the Continent, could not be easy till the poor old man whom he treated as a crushed enemy had been deprived of a ring, the "Ring of the Fisherman":—

L'Empereur, qui songeait à tout, se garda bien d'oublier de faire enlever au saint-père son humble anneau du pêcheur. C'était de sa part une idée fixe. Déjà il avait écrit à plusieurs reprises à Rome pour qu'on recherchât partout cet anneau, et qu'on l'envoyât à Paris, mais on ne l'avait pas trouvé. Cette fois on espérait être plus heureux. Nouvelle déception; l'anneau du pêcheur avait été renfermé par Pie VII dans le sac de peau où Mgr. Doria avait mis l'argent provenant du denier de S. Pierre. On avait rendu, sans y regarder, et le sac et l'argent, et par conséquent l'anneau à Pie VII. Quand le prince Borghèse s'aperçut de sa fâcheuse méprise, il donna les ordres nécessaires pour que l'on se procurât à tout prix cet anneau, sans toutefois employer la violence s'il se trouvait dans les mains du Pape. Mais Pie VII ne le portait pas à son doigt; on ne l'avait vu nulle part. Le capitaine de gendarmerie La Gorse se décida alors à le demander tout simplement au saint-père. Jusque-là Pie VII n'avait pas montré la moindre apparence de mauvaise humeur. . . . Mais à la réquisition du capitaine La Gorse, Pie VII, jusque-là inébranlable, se sentit profondément ému. Était-ce ressentiment de ce dernier et incompréhensible affront? Était-ce la crainte qu'on ne fît un usage frauduleux du sceau du pêcheur qui d'ordinaire sert à revêtir les actes les plus importants émanés du chef du catholicisme? Toujours est-il qu'après un peu d'hésitation le pape remit son anneau au capitaine de gendarmerie, mais il avait pris auparavant la précaution de le briser en deux, et ce fut en cet état qu'il fut envoyé à l'Empereur par le prince Borghèse.

THE FIGHT OF FAITH.*

THE victories won by the glorious Reformation are, as we know, in danger; plans have been promulgated for restoring to England the principles and practice of the Church of Rome. Nay, at this moment statesmen are found willing to denounce openly that Protestant ascendency to which "we owe so much of our Liberty, and so many of our Rights." These last words are quoted from Mrs. S. C. Hall, who has nobly thrown herself into the breach. Seeing the approaching evils, she armed herself with the first volume of a novel written some years ago, lately added a conclusion, and now brandishes this tremendous weapon in the face of the enemy. Her good-will is undeniable, but we fear she will find some troubles in the execution of her design. The first difficulty will be to get her enemies to read her treatise; and we fear that her second will be to get her friends to read it. The vision seen by one of her characters when in a state of "heated imagination" may be perfectly applicable to the future of a country which falls under the power of Rome. "A demon robed in black, and having the authority of judgment, shadowed the island with vampire wings, and as he fanned them slowly, the movement called into existence the most foul and unearthly followers." This is doubtless very powerful, and shows great faculties of delicate characterization. But, alas! it will be all thrown away if the slaves of the "demon with vampire wings" remain in happy ignorance of the scathing satire. Who would care to listen to Mr. Murphy if his eloquence did not call forth an echo from his outraged opponents? And what is the pleasure of listening to the voice of one crying through a two-volume novel, of which no one beyond her own keenest partisans is likely even to see the outside? We, it is true, have done our best to make known its spirit to such of our readers as have a taste for demons with vampire wings; but we fear that what we have further to say will scarcely excite their curiosity. To put it shortly, Mrs. Hall has endeavoured to combine two forms of art which are exceedingly questionable except in the most vigorous hands. Her book is at once an historical novel, which nobody ought to write whose mind is not saturated with knowledge of the period described, and also a novel with a purpose, which we are inclined to say that nobody should ever write at all. Novels of this kind do indeed sometimes produce a great effect. Some of Mr. Dickens' early works excited a strong feeling about chimney-sweeps, poor boys at Yorkshire schools, and other oppressed classes of the population. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" had much to do with the rise of the anti-slavery agitation in America; and other examples might be given of the power of a satire couched in this form. The merit, whatever it may be, of such works is generally gained rather at the expense of artistic effect, and still more at the expense of truth. It may, however, be pardonable at times to exhibit even an exaggerated picture of existing evils, with the view of stimulating the zeal of reformers. But if we must have such performances—and at best they are of very questionable value—let us at least have pictures of something with which the writer is really familiar. A mere fancy portrait of what somebody thinks is really the state of affairs somewhere else, must be unfair, and will ninety-nine times out of a hundred be exceedingly stupid. When therefore a lady proceeds, as Mrs. Hall appears to have done, to get up scraps of history from Lord Macaulay (to which recondite and "eloquent historian" Mrs. Hall specially acknowledges her obligation), and pieces out her ignorance from her imagination, in order to prove to us that Roman Catholics behaved very badly at the end of the seventeenth century, we can but wonder what end she proposes to herself. She of course can add nothing to our knowledge, and, indeed, in all probability she writes a fiction for the worst of all possible reasons, namely, because she does not know the facts. When a writer has spent a great deal of trouble in historical inquiry, we are sometimes sorry that he should use his learning for the purposes of a story instead of applying it to a genuine history. No such complaint can be made of Mrs. S. C. Hall. But we may wonder that she thinks herself entitled to write about a period on the strength of obviously superficial knowledge; both because her conclusions can have no sort of value, and because her colouring can neither be faithful nor vivid. Her Huguenots and Papists are such flimsy personages, and talk such a washy dilution of the ordinary tract mixture, that we care nothing for them, nor for the moral which they are supposed to teach. It is a perfectly fair argument, whatever its precise value may be, that the Roman Catholic religion is a bad one, because those who professed it persecuted the Huguenots, and committed various atrocities in England and Ireland. But before we can judge of the conclusions to be drawn, the first thing is to know the facts. What was the severity and extent of the persecution? how far was it worse than the persecution carried on by the opposite side? and to what extent is it to be charged to the distinctive tenets of the Church in whose favour it was intended? To these and similar questions a novel can give us at best a very imperfect answer. Without much more knowledge than Mrs. Hall seems to possess, it cannot even help us to a vivid realization of one view of the question; and, in short, the outside that we can expect from it is a certain amount of the amusement derivable from unintentional caricature. A good red-hot roaring Protestant in a state of excitement is apt to be an amusing animal, and perhaps some people may be tempted to dip into the Fight of Faith in the hope of an occasional smile. For the benefit of such sanguine admirers of eccentricity, we will endeavour to give some slight notion of the plot and style of the novel.

There are, of course, two sets of characters—the diabolical Papists and the angelical Protestants. The chief diabolical personages are a recreant Huguenot, who has become a French courtier, and his son. In the background we catch sight of one or two subordinate villains, such as a priest who scowls hideously, and beats a dying child for singing an heretical hymn, after turning its mother out of doors. On the opposite side are the brother of the recreant Huguenot, his wife, and their little daughter, who has been brought up as a boy that she may not be sent to a convent. After a great deal of scowling and raving and quoting of Scripture, the wicked brother seizes the virtuous brother and his wife, and sends them off to the galleys. The child is saved by being packed off in a ship; the ship is wrecked and every soul drowned, with the exception of the little girl, who turns up, smiling pleasantly, in a remote corner of the Isle of Wight. Thus ends the first act. In the next we find the little girl hospitably received by a virtuous English naval captain of the purest Protestant principles, who tells his wife to shorten sail when he means that she is to leave off talking, and generally demeans himself according to the accepted precedents of the rough British tar of comedy and fiction. The captain and his wife not only receive the waif and stray kindly, but provide a French tutor for her education; and who should this tutor turn out to be but her first cousin, the still more diabolical son of the diabolical uncle? This young gentleman has compressed lips and a habit of frowning to himself in dark corners, and otherwise acting like a Jesuit in disguise. He is of course suspected by a faithful domestic, but pardoned by the angelical simplicity of the captain's wife, until one fine day he fires a rocket out of a window, and behold, armed men and magistrates rush into the house and carry off the Protestant inmates to a loathsome dungeon on a charge of treasonable practices against King James II. The young lady escapes from this danger as she did from the other, though Mrs. Hall does not take the trouble to account for her mysterious evasion; and thus ends act the second, which has a singular likeness to the first. The curtain rises for the third time, and we find Mdlle. de Chavernay restored to her affectionate guardian in the North of Ireland. She has been released, as it seems, in consequence of the revolution of 1688; and has come to Ireland for no particular reason, except that Mrs. Hall has read Macaulay and has herself visited the scene of the battle of the Boyne, to assist in Schomberg's campaign. Everybody who has been left alive now turns up upon more or less satisfactory pretences. The wicked uncle and his son are acting respectively as an officer in the French army and as a spy in the English camp. A virtuous young parson, who was provided in the second act, retires to Ireland to be ready for the heroine. She has rashly promised to marry no one but her wicked cousin, in order to save the life of her father, who had been in his power. However, the cousin is killed at the battle of the Boyne, and, all difficulties being satisfactorily settled by his death, the old captain dies in the ecstacy of victory, the lady marries the parson, and the virtuous characters live very happily ever after. Thus, to put directly the accusations which the novel obliquely hints, Mrs. S. C. Hall is of opinion that the Huguenots were subjected to the grossest tyranny in order to procure their conversion, that priests forced mothers from the deathbeds of their children, that brothers arrested brothers and sent them into hopeless imprisonment, and that little girls had to be brought up as little boys to save them from compulsory entrance into a nunnery; meanwhile England was swarming with Jesuits in disguise, who went about betraying honest families and convicting them of treason against the government. The amazing Christian virtues of the persecuted race led them to go about blessing those who cursed them, and quoting Scripture with surprising fluency and exactness. There is only one contrast to the prevailing tone of the picture, which we apparently owe to an amiable weakness of Mrs. Hall's. She has an obvious liking for the Irish; and the only good character on the side of the Papists is an Irish girl who is accidentally shot by her father to remove her from her wicked connexions. Perhaps she dwells a little too much upon the natural dislike of this girl to the English invaders, for it tends to remind us that there was such a thing as Protestant ascendency in Ireland, which copied, to a certain extent, the tyranny of the detestable Papists. Indeed, when Mrs. Hall naively rejoices in the rights which "we" owe to Protestant ascendency, her own book might have reminded her that we enjoyed them at the expense of other people's rights; and her tone of unlimited exultation might have been qualified by a few shades of remorse. By all means let us condemn the detestable tyranny exercised against the French Protestants; but we had best remember that we cannot boast that our own hands are quite clean, and those should boast least who are proudest of "Protestant ascendency."

We have only to give a specimen or two of Mrs. Hall's style to satisfy the curiosity of our readers. She has, unfortunately, selected an epoch at which she can hardly use "Marry, come up," and "By'r Lady," and other catch-words. The local colouring is chiefly given by writing "Mistress" at full length, and by addressing a gentleman as "Sir Priest." The dialogue is, moreover, stiffened with a good deal of Scriptural phraseology to give it the proper Protestant twang. This may be easily conceived, and had, perhaps, better not be quoted. Here, however, is a specimen of the commonplace language by which it is relieved. A rough sea-captain and his wife, who is rather an excitable lady, are discussing a storm of the previous night. He says it was "a capfull." She replies:—

> Your pardon, husband; we do not differ except in words; the tempest was terrible last night, and you know it. The island, now, is encircled from Cowes to Ventnor by a girdle of seething foam, which the sun tinges but cannot penetrate; what we look upon one moment is obscured the next; and the tired growlings of the storm now are as silence to the fearful raging of the last six-and-thirty hours. I feel restless and unhappy, as if the foreshadowing of some great calamity.

To which, after a little intermediate sparring, the captain excuses himself for laughing as follows:—

> I laughed long ago at Southampton, to see how cropped hair had grown into love-locks, and the cast-up eyes of a Puritan become well practised in the side leer of the Cavalier. I laugh when men mistake a mood for a mind; I laugh when an old sea-dog like myself, a regular tarpaulin, who learnt his business amid icebergs and tropical hurricanes, was expected to cap to a silken scented commander who learnt his seamanship between Whitehall and Twickenham.

When old sea-dogs and their wives are allowed to indulge in such sentences, our readers may imagine for themselves the truth to nature and the general vividness of conception by which the conduct of the story is marked. If Mrs. Hall, as she hopes, "arrests in any degree the progress of those who," in short, object to Protestant ascendency, there need be little fear of machinations so sensitive to trifling obstacles.

THE ANNALS OF RURAL BENGAL.*

AMIDST the flood of worthless books on trifling subjects which at present corrupts the taste of the reader and drives the reviewer to despair, it is a solid satisfaction to learn that Mr. Hunter has been called upon, "within four months of its original publication, to prepare a third edition" of the Annals of Rural Bengal. He modestly attributes this success to "a conscientious desire on the part of the English people to understand the distant nations which have been committed to its care." To some extent, it may be hoped, this is true; but the merit of the desire in question has been greatly lessened by the pleasure with which, under Mr. Hunter's guidance, its gratification is attended. In spite of an unpromising title and some defects of arrangement, the Annals of Rural Bengal is a book of singular interest, both as to form and matter. We shall not attempt to criticize Mr. Hunter, for the very good reason that he deals with an unexplored field of history. But we may do some service to intending readers if we put clearly before them what is the story Mr. Hunter has to tell, and in what order he has told it. To do this we must first of all qualify the title of the book. The "Annals" go no further back than the transfer of the country to British rule. This limitation was not a matter of choice. India has no local history:—

> Each field, indeed, has its annals. The crops which it has borne during the past century, the rent which it has paid, the occasions on which it has changed hands, the old standing disputes about its water-courses and landmarks, all these are treasured up with sufficient precision. But the bygone joys and sorrows of the district in general, its memorable vicissitudes, its remarkable men, the decline of old forms of industry and the rise of new—in a word, all the weightier matters of rural history, are forgotten. Life wants the outdoor element which it possesses in so remarkable degree in England. Men of the upper classes come less frequently into contact with each other; caste and religious differences dwarf the growth of good fellowship and limit the interchange of hospitalities; and anything like society in the European sense of the word is prevented by the seclusion of the female sex. The strong county feeling which knits together the magnates of an English shire has not had a chance of being developed among the landed gentry of India. Each house scrupulously preserves its own archives, but carefully conceals them from its neighbours. Indeed, it never strikes the listless, rich native, that what to him are dull contemporaneous events will in time possess the interest of history; nor are there any antiquarians to gather up such meagre records as vanity or selfishness may have framed. English history owes much of its value, and still more of its pathos, to the stores of private documents which the strong individuality of bygone Englishmen has left behind; but in India, one rural generation dreams out its existence after another, and all are forgotten.

From the time the English took the administration of Bengal into their own hands, this scarcity of material gives place to an overflowing though hitherto neglected abundance. The chief Government office of every district contains a vast collection of reports, letters, and minutes which "relate, in the words of eye-witnesses and with official accuracy, the daily history of the country":—

> We learn from these worm-eaten manuscripts that what we have been accustomed to regard as Indian history is a chronicle of events which hardly affected, and which were for the most part unknown to, the contemporary mass of the Indian people. On their discoloured pages the conspicuous vicissitudes and revolutions of the past century have left no trace. Dynasties struggled and fell, but the bulk of the people evinced neither sympathy nor surprise, nor did the pulse of village life in Bengal move a single beat faster for all the calamities and panic of the outside world. But these volumes, so silent on subjects about which we are already well informed, speak at length and with the utmost precision on matters regarding which the Western world is profoundly ignorant. They depict in vivid colours the state of rural India when the sceptre departed from the Mussulman race. They disclose the complicated evils that rendered our accession, for some time, an aggravation rather than a mitigation of the sufferings of the people. They unfold one after another the misapprehensions and disastrous vacillations amid which our first solid progress was made. They impartially retain the evidence of low motives and official incompetence side by side with the impress of rare devotion and administrative skill. But, taken as a whole, they reveal the secret of England's greatness in the East. They exhibit a small band of our countrymen going forth to govern an unexplored and a half-subdued territory. Before the grave heroism and masterful characters of these men the native mind succumbed. Our troops originated for us a rude Mahratta-like supremacy; but the real records attest that the permanent sources of the English ascendency in Bengal have been, not their brilliant military successes, but deliberate civil courage and indomitable will.

Nor is the interest of these records of a purely historical kind. They are filled with information of the utmost political value even at this day. The East India Company had promised to govern in accordance with native usages, and during the first thirty years of its rule its officers were repeatedly charged to do all in their power to ascertain what these usages really were. The inquiry included every detail in the agricultural economy of each district, and "laid bare the whole fabric of the rural life of Bengal." It is in these researches that the real land law of the country is to be found, and Mr. Hunter is so emboldened by his acquaintance with them as to promise that it will shortly become possible to arrive at a definite solution of the mystery in which Indian tenures have hitherto been involved. To this important subject he proposes to devote his second volume. Unfortunately, the sweeping and perhaps premature reforms in the revenue system introduced at the close of the first quarter of the present century, together with the growing demands of administrative duty on the time and energy of the Company's servants, have long put an end to these investigations. "The labours of a previous school of officers soon became a subject of indifference to their successors; the quick decay of a tropical climate began its work: and of the researches that had occupied the ablest administrators during the first fifty years of our rule, the greater part has, during the second fifty years, been made over as a prey to mildew and white ants." Even Mr. Hunter seems only to have discovered their existence by accident; but now that the publication of his work has made known their value, it is to be hoped that, wherever such documents are still in being, they will be carefully preserved from further decay. We can imagine no better way of securing this end than by placing Mr. Hunter at the head of a new department of Indian Records.

The district with which this volume chiefly deals is that of Beerbhoom and Bishenpore, "the two great frontier principalities of Lower Bengal." In many respects this is a country of singular interest even for India. Its geographical characteristics distinguish it alike from the plateau of the Deccan, which bounds it towards the south, and from the plain of the Ganges, towards which it slopes on the north. On the inhabitants of this, "the outpost of the Sanskrit race on the west of Lower Bengal, devolved, during three thousand years, the duty of holding the passes between the highlands and the valley of the Ganges." To this day "they are a manlier race than their kinsmen of the plains"; to this day they form a composite people made up "of two races, which in intellect, language, and in everything that makes a nation great or ignoble have been selected as the highest and the lowest types of mankind." In the lowlands these races are found intermingled in various proportions; in the hills the aboriginal tribes "have preserved their primitive descent intact." Mr. Hunter's second and third chapters are full of striking instances of the influence which the black races have exercised on the Aryans wherever they have been brought into contact with them. The latter were the more open to this action because they had started on their march for Lower Bengal before Hinduism had developed into that "complicated and costly superstition" which it became in the North-west Provinces and the Punjab. The patois of Lower Bengal is full of words which have no connexion with Sanskrit, and "although such words are carefully excluded from written Bengali, they are ever in the mouths of the husbandman, the herdsman, and the forester, and they have furnished the domestic language of affection in which the mother speaks to her child." The religion of the Aryans in Bengal has equally undergone a change. Siva-worship, as Mr. Hunter shows, is distinctly traceable to the theology of the primitive race. The sanguinary aboriginal deity has forced an entrance into the Hindu Pantheon, and in proportion as the aboriginal element predominates in the population he has supplanted the older gods. "Siva-worship is the only form of religion which has now any hold on the masses in the Lower Valley. Khrishna, or Vishnu, is the god of the higher castes," but "in all time of need it is on Siva—a deity scarcely known to the earliest Aryan writers—that the Bengali populace calls." It would seem that the first Aryan colonists had tried to trample out this bloody worship at the same time that they enslaved those who practised it. When Buddhism, driven forth from the Sanskrit kingdom of Oudh, established itself in Lower Bengal, its missionaries owed, it may be, their easy victories to the circumstance that they presented themselves as the deliverers of the classes of aboriginal descent:—

But a negative religion, though it may be the creed of a dynasty, is never the religion of a people. Buddhism quickly lost its active principle in Lower Bengal, and retreated to monasteries or to secluded religious villages among the mountains, such as the Holy City in Beerbhoom; content with having placed a Buddhist dynasty on the throne, and with having spread a thin crust of monotheism over the surface of society. The common people were also satisfied; they were let alone. . . . Such a state of affairs could not be permanent: as Buddhism retired from public life to its monastic solitudes, Brahmanism crept back into its place, and at last drove it forth altogether. But of Brahmanism there are always two sides, the spiritual and the idolatrous; the former represented by the merciful worship of Vishnu, the latter by the bloody rites of Siva, the aboriginal Rudra. Brahmanism had learned wisdom in disgrace; it had learned that nowhere, not even in Bengal, can a dynasty be lasting which sets its face against the people. Instead, therefore, of again introducing their old esoteric religion, with its sublime dogmas and unbloody sacrifices of fruits, milk, and oil, the Brahmans threw themselves upon the people, and preached the popular side of their creed; with the popular Siva or Rudra at its head, to be worshipped according to the popular bloody rites. This was precisely the religion for the semi-aboriginal population of Lower Bengal. The mass of superstition that had always existed, and still everywhere exists, in Buddhist countries, upheaved, splintering into a thousand fragments the thin crust of monotheism that had concealed it. From that period modern Hinduism dates, with its top reaching to the heavens, and its feet descending into the lowest depths of man's depraved heart. Only in Lower Bengal is its baser form a homogeneous and strictly national religion; for only in Lower Bengal did the Brahmans, deliberately rejecting the spiritual side of the Sanskrit faith, identify themselves with the semi-aboriginal superstitions of the masses. Go where he chooses, the Hindu of the Lower Valley is known by his gross materialism and bloody rites.

The influence of the indigenous race may further be recognised in the social condition of the Bengalis. A population consisting of masters and slaves is not easily welded into a single nationality, and the presence of the latter element has greatly promoted that contempt for labour of all kinds which has so long marked the Hindu. "It is a bad thing for a race to be able to get other people to do its work during three thousand years." The consequence is that, under an impartial government, the non-Aryan element is everywhere competing at an advantage with the superior class. As industry ceases to be discreditable, the great bar to the creation of capital in India will be removed, and civilization may in future owe more to the despised tribes of the mountain and the jungle than to the pure-blooded aristocracy of the plains.

The East India Company did not undertake the direct administration of Bishenpore and Beerbhoom until 1787. Up to that time they had been governed by their hereditary princes, and it was only when the abuses provoked by the increasing feebleness of their rule brought the commercial operations of the Company within their jurisdiction to a stand that Lord Cornwallis determined to unite the two principalities into a British district. Mr. Hunter's first chapter—which should be read, we think, after the second and third—describes the condition of the country at the period of transfer. Eighteen years earlier Bengal had been visited by a famine, the effects of which had not exhausted themselves after an interval of forty years. The rice-crop which should have been gathered in December, 1769, failed from want of rain, and by the following May one-third of the population had perished. The next year came a harvest of unusual abundance, but it came "to a silent and deserted province." Ten million of human beings had perished, and for many a year after whole districts lay uncultivated for want of men to till the ground. A great part of the native aristocracy found itself unable to pay the land-tax demanded by the Government, and sank by degrees into irremediable debt and ruin. "When the local records open they disclose the Rajah of Beerbhoom hardly permitted to pass the first year of his majority before being confined for arrears of revenue, and the venerable Rajah of Bishenpore, after weary years of duress, is let out of prison only to die." The whole aspect of society in Bengal was changed. Instead of there being more husbandmen than there were holdings for them to occupy, the peasantry had to be courted to take land; and the great proprietors tried to entice each other's tenants by offers of low rents and protection against law-suits. But the desolation went on increasing in spite of everything. The cultivators fled from the deserted villages to the cities, and by 1780 the greater part of Beerbhoom had become an almost impassable jungle, infested by tigers and wild elephants. Where some traces of cultivation remained the banditti were as formidable as the wild beasts, and the first years of the Company's administration saw the Collector of the district reduced to wage a barely equal conflict with a constant succession of armed and organized depredations.

Such was the condition of the south-western highlands of Bengal at the period at which Mr. Hunter takes up their history. The account we have given of his opening chapters will show how comprehensive have been the preliminary researches by which he has prepared himself for his task. The narrative to which these researches serve as the indispensable introduction hardly begins in the present volume. All that Mr. Hunter attempts to do is to paint the state of affairs in the frontier district during the years that immediately followed the change of Government. With this view he shows us the Company as a rural administrator and as a rural manufacturer; he relates its dealings with the currency, and its essays towards an improved administration of civil and criminal justice; and having thus laid the foundation of his work, he leaves the reader genuinely anxious to see the speedy completion of the superstructure.

FULLER'S CHURCH HISTORY.*

(Second Notice.)

FULLER calls his work the Church History of Britain; at the same time, in more than one place he distinctly excludes Scotland from being any part of his subject. It is only when he gets near to his own time, when the attempted introduction of the English ritual into Scotland had such important effects in both countries, that he does, for a short season, cross the border, and even then he comes back home again as soon as he can. But Fuller, in the seventeenth century, had, seemingly without effort, performed that feat which seems so hard to so many of our friends in the nineteenth, and had learned to know an Englishman from a Welshman. In his very first page he speaks of "the Britons, our predecessors," a form of words which, simple and accurate as it is, seems to many people the most unintelligible of mysteries. So presently, when he comes to the controversy as to the birthplace of Constantine, he debates everything in due form, stating each Objection with its Answer to follow it. We there read:—

Objection III.—Bede, a grave and faithful author, makes no mention of Constantine born in Britain, who (as Lipsius marketh) would not have omitted a matter so much to the honour of his own nation.

Answer.—By the leave of Lipsius, Constantine and Bede, though of the same country, were of several nations. Bede, being a Saxon, was little zealous to advance the British honour: the history of which Church he rather toucheth than handleth, using it only as a porch to pass through it to the Saxon history. And Saxons in general had little skill to seek, and less will to find out, any worthy thing in British antiquities, because of the known antipathy betwixt them.

And it is but a slight backsliding when we read directly after:—

Now see what a pinch Verstegan, whose teeth are sharpened by the difference of religion, gives Mr. Fox: "What is it other than an absurdity, was no English but a British woman." And yet Fox's words are capable of a candid construction, if by "Englishwoman" we understand, by a favourable prolepsis, one born in that part of Britain which since hath been inhabited by the English. Sure, in the same dialect St. Alban hath often been called "the first martyr of the English," by many writers of good esteem. Yea, the breviary of Sarum, allowed and confirmed no doubt by the infallible Church of Rome, greets St. Alban with this salute:—

> Ave, proto-martyr Anglorum, > Miles Regis angelorum,
> O Albane, flos martyrum.

Sure, Helen was as properly an Englishwoman as Alban an Englishman, being both British in the rigid letter of history; and yet may be interpreted English in the equity thereof. Thus it is vain for any to write books, if their words be not taken in a courteous latitude; and if the reader meets not his author with a pardon of course for venial mistakes, especially when his pen slides in so slippery a passage.

On the whole there is not much to quarrel with in Fuller's account of these earliest times. He certainly depreciates Augustine and the work that he did; so to do is a temptation almost impossible to be withstood by a professed anti-Roman controversialist. But he is not carried away by the dream of an "ancient British Church," like those modern writers who seem to forget that they are Englishmen at all. Do any of our readers remember a book on English Monachism by Mr. O'Dell Travers Hill, which we reviewed some time back? or are there any whose memory can reach so far as to remember a frantic book called Perranzabuloe, or the Lost Church Found, published some five-and-twenty years or more ago by Mr. Collins Trelawny, and recently republished? Beside the extravagances of books like these, Fuller's faint yearnings after the ancient British Church and its supposed purity seem mild indeed. To be sure he sometimes talks about "Saxons," when he had better have said "English," but he says English about as often, and he grasps the real relations of Britons, English, and Normans in a way which one is glad to come across nowadays. This sentence, for instance, though we doubt its political truth, is well put in other respects:—

> William the Conqueror built most of them [the castles], and then put them into the custody of his Norman lords, thereby to awe the English into obedience. But these Norman lords, in the next generation, by breathing in English air, and wedding with English wives, became so perfectly Anglicized and lovers of liberty, that they would stand on their guard against the King, on any petty discontentment.

Fuller here thoroughly grasps the relations between the two races; he does not grasp the fact that for a private lord to defend his castle against the King was much more of a Norman than of an English proceeding. We must wait for the great days of resistance to John and Henry the Third before we see Norman lords acting thoroughly in the character of Englishmen.

In this early part of the book we come across a curious incidental witness to the mediæval pronunciation of Greek. Fuller meets with two verses on the legendary King Lucius:—

> Lucius in tenebris prius idola qui coluisti,
> Et merito celebris ex quo baptisma subisti.

On these he comments in his quaint way:—"It seems the puddle-poet did hope that the jingling of his rhyme would drown the sound of his false quantity. Except any will say, that he affected to make the middle syllable in idola short, because in the days of King Lucius idolatry was curbed and contracted, whilst Christianity did dilate and extend itself." Not at all; the "puddle-poet" simply pronounced εἴδωλα by accent, as a native Greek would have done. The odd thing is that Fuller did not see this, as it is certain that there were scholars at Cambridge who retained the accentual pronunciation of Greek as late as the days of Bentley.

A specimen of Fuller's quaintness of expression, and at the same time of the credulity which still lingered in his age, is found in the reason which he gives for the superhuman length of days said to have been enjoyed by many of the old British saints. "A wonder it is," says he, "to see how many Methuselahs (extreme aged men) these times did produce." He then goes into the reason of the matter in a way half pious, half philosophical:—

> Some reason whereof may be alleged: Because, living retired in a contemplative way, they did not bruise their bodies with embroiling them in worldly affairs; or it may be ascribed to their temperate diet, whilst many of our age spill their radical moisture through the leaks of their own luxury. Nor is it absurd to say, that God made these great tapers of a more firm and compacted wax than ordinary, so that they might last the longer in burning, to give light to his church, and bestowed on them an especial strong natural constitution.

Some way on he has a curious defence of the Welsh tongue "against such as causelessly traduce it." The Welsh language "was one of those which departed from Babel, and herein it relates to God, as the more immediate author thereof, whereas most tongues in Europe owe their beginning to human depraving of some original language." He instances the Italian, Spanish, and French, which he calls "daughters or nieces to the Latin, generated from the corruption thereof." By "nieces" Fuller of course means "granddaughters"; had he that notion which Sir George Lewis wrote against, of a single Romance language, whether we call it Provençal or anything else, intervening between Latin and the existing forms? He goes on to praise Welsh as being "unmixed," "unaltered," and "lastly durable, which had its beginning at the confusion of tongues, and is likely not to have its ending till the dissolution of the world." He then goes on to defend Welsh from the charge of "being hard to be pronounced, having a conflux of many consonants, and some of them double sounded; yea," he continues, "whereas the mouth is the place wherein the office of speech is generally kept, the British words must be uttered through the throat." Fuller's answer to this charge illustrates the imperfect philology of his day, and its connexion with a sort of mystical theology; but we are afraid that there are many people who would make the same answer now. "This," he tells us, "rather argues the antiquity thereof, herein running parallel with the Hebrew (the common tongue of the old world before it was enclosed into several languages), and hath much affinity therewith in jointing of words with affixes and many other correspondencies." He next answers the "cavil that it grates and tortures the ears of hearers with the harshness thereof; whereas indeed," says Fuller, "it is unpleasant only to such as are ignorant of it." He then goes on with a characteristic remark which is worth extracting:—

> What is nick-named "harshness" therein, maketh it indeed more full, stately, and masculine. But such is the epicurism of modern times, to addulce all words to the ear, that (as in the French) they melt out, in pronouncing, many essential letters, taking out all the bones, to make them bend the better in speaking; and such hypocrites in their words speak them not truly in their native strength, as the plain-dealing British do, who pronounce every letter therein more manly, if less melodious.

We venture to think that both the High Dutchman and the Spaniard have an equal right to this praise of Fuller's with the Briton, but what would Fuller have said to Gaelic?

It is odd to find our old friend Benedict Biscop (whom, it may be remembered, the Times once described as a "Northumbrian gentleman," and at the same time fancied to be the founder of the Benedictine order) appearing in Fuller as "one Benault, a foreign bishop (but of what place I find not)." Some historians would doubtless have quartered this unknown foreign ecclesiastic at Lexovia; but Fuller, though he is fond of calling people Frenchmen a little too early, knew the ecclesiastical geography of Gaul well, and when he comes to a person described as "Ebroicensis episcopus," he very properly rules that his see was not at York, but at Evreux.

The following passage is really by no means a bad description of the change from the old precarious Bretwaldadom to the permanent supremacy of the West Saxon Kings:—

> Egbert in this very year made himself sole monarch of England. True it is, in the Saxon heptarchy there was generally one who out-powered all the rest. But such monarchy was desultory and movable, sometimes the West Saxon, sometimes the Mercian, sometimes the Northumberland, king ruled over the rest. But henceforward Egbert fixed the supreme sovereignty in himself and his posterity: for though afterwards there continued some petty kings, as Kenulph King of Mercia, &c., yet they shined but dimly (as the moon when the sun is risen), and in the next age were utterly extinguished.

We have dwelt at some length on Fuller's treatment of the earliest times, because there is really no other test so good of a writer's critical power. And Fuller, if set to compete with a good many writers of our own time, would certainly not come out at the bottom of the list. Here is a specimen of his quaint humour some centuries later. He is speaking of the religious and charitable foundations of King Stephen:—

> And whereas formerly there were paid out of every ploughland in England, betwixt Trent and Edinburgh-Firth, twenty-four oat sheaves for the king's hounds; Stephen converted this rent-charge to his new-built hospital in York: a good deed, no doubt; for, though it be unlawful to "take the children's bread and cast to it unto the dogs," Mark vii. 27; it is lawful to take the dog's bread and give it unto the children.

Of Fuller's treatment of the period of the Reformation we have already spoken at some length. He throughout tries to be fair, and he often succeeds. The way in which he deals with some points in Cranmer's character does him honour; as when he speaks boldly of "Cranmer's inexcusable cowardly dissimulation in the disputation against Lambert." We doubt Fuller's facts when he describes Cranmer as "arguing, though civilly, shrewdly against the truth and his own private judgement," for it is far more probable that Cranmer still believed in transubstantiation; still Fuller's remarks are weighty in themselves, and especially worthy of notice at a time when the Archbishop's acts and character have been the subject of so much discussion as they have been lately:—

> Was not this worse than "keeping the clothes" of those who killed St. Stephen? seeing this archbishop did actually "cast stones" at this martyr, in the arguments he urged against him. Nor will it excuse Cranmer's cowardice and dissimulation to accuse Gardiner's craft and cruelty, who privily put the archbishop on this odious act; such Christian courage being justly expected from a person of his parts and place as not to be acted by another, contrary to his own conscience. I see not, therefore, what can be said in Cranmer's behalf, save only that I verily hope and steadfastly believe, that he craved God's pardon for this particular offence, and obtained the same on his unfeigned repentance. And because the face of man's faults is commonly seen in the glass of their punishment, it is observable, that, as Lambert now was burned for denying the corporal presence, so Cranmer, (now his opponent) was afterwards condemned and died at Oxford for maintaining the same opinion; which valour if sooner shown, his conscience had probably been more cleared within him, and his credit without him to all posterity.

To the history of monasteries in England Fuller devotes a whole book of his work. Of course we must not look for philosophy in it, nor indeed for very much of criticism, but, on the whole, his account is not to be despised. We find, however, a few odd slips, as when he says (ii. 168) that Waltham was "for Benedictines at the first," and when (ii. 278) he says that Abbot Whiting was "hanged for his recusancy to surrender the Abbey and denying the King's supremacy." This last confusion is constantly found in local writers and in the small fry of antiquaries generally, but one is really amazed to find it in Fuller. It is still more amusing when he talks (ii. 328) of "the Lord Abbot of Saint Vedastus (Anglicè Saint Forster's) in Arras." Surely, there is no authority for the existence of such a Saint as Saint Forster beyond the odd misnomer which has arisen from the accident of Saint Vedast's church in London standing in Forster Lane.

Fuller is struck, as he well might be, with the fact that several Bishops who conformed to the changes under Henry, and even for a good while to those under Edward, refused to conform under Elizabeth. He divides the Bishops in Edward's times into three classes—"Zealous Protestants," "zealous Papists," and a third class whom he calls "Papists in heart, but outwardly conforming to the King's laws, as Heath, Archbishop of York, and many other Bishops." On this class he thus comments:—

Here it is worthy our inquiry why this latter sort, who so complied under King Edward VI., should be so stubborn and obstinate under Queen Elizabeth; whereof I can give but this reason assigned—that, growing older and nearer their graves, they grew more conscientious and faithful to their own (though erroneous) principles, it being in vain to dissemble, now death did approach, though their younger years had been guilty of such prevarications.

But this judgment of Fuller's, like his judgment of Cranmer's conduct in the matter of Lambert, goes on the mistaken assumption that every man, in the actual agony of transition, must have been either "Papist" or "Protestant," in the clearly defined sense which those words bore a hundred years later. If a man did not act with perfect consistency in one or other of those characters, Fuller thinks he must have been dissembling. But the truth no doubt is that the mass of Englishmen, whether Bishops or anything else, had not, in Henry's time and in the first days of Edward, yet learned the necessity of being either one or the other. Some no doubt thought that change had gone too far, others that it had not gone far enough; but neither party had as yet pushed its scruples so far as to feel bound to disobey what was law for the time being. It is a memorable fact that Gardiner, though thinking that change had gone too far, was ready to use the first English Prayer-Book. But, some years later, men had found out that this intermediate position was untenable, and that they, and the Church of England, could not help taking one side or the other. Gardiner, Bonner, and even Heath and Thirlby, now chose the Romish side. Here, we take it, is the real explanation of the fact which puzzled Fuller, namely, that men who had admitted the greater claims of Henry and Edward refused the smaller claims of Elizabeth. It is some comfort, however, to find Fuller (see ii. 502, 503) thoroughly aware that the claims of Elizabeth were smaller claims. He pointedly sets forth the refusal of the great Queen to assume that title of "Head of Church" which not only common careless talkers, but even lawyers and others who should know better, persist to this day, without a shadow of legal sanction, in forcing on the sovereign of England.

Coming nearer to his own time, Fuller has much to say about the famous Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato, Dean of Windsor, Master of the Savoy, Rector of West Ilsley, but not Archbishop of York. Among other things we may notice that Fuller spells Spalato right, whereas, if one ventures to spell it so nowadays, it commonly gets turned into Spalatro. Those were the days of pluralities, but even then it seems to have been thought scandalous for a Dean to abuse the Chapter patronage to his own enrichment. "Finding one precedent in his predecessor, he collated this parsonage [West Ilsley] on himself." But the thing to be most noticed about him in Fuller is the following:—

We must not forget, that Spalato (I am confident I am not mistaken therein) was the first who, professing himself a Protestant, used the word "Puritan" to signify the defenders of matters doctrinal in the English church. Formerly the word was only taken to denote such as dissented from the hierarchy in discipline and church government; which now was extended to brand such as were Anti-Arminians in their judgments. As Spalato first abused the word in this sense, so we could wish he had carried it away with him in his return to Rome. Whereas, now leaving the word behind him in this extensive signification thereof, it hath since by others been improved to asperse the most orthodox in doctrine, and religious in conversation.

The dedications of the different sections of Fuller's work are worth notice. One hardly knows which most to wonder at—the number of his "patrons" of all sorts and classes, or the ingenuity with which he finds something special to say to each, either in Latin or in English. This kind of thing has gone out of fashion now, and, on the whole, it is better that it has gone out of fashion; still with it writers have lost the chance of saying a great many smart, pretty, and appropriate things.

Lastly, we have a word or two to say as to the editing of this edition. In reprinting an author of the sixteenth or seventeenth century, the question always arises, how far we are bound to retain the original spelling. It seems hardly needful to retain the utterly chaotic spelling, the wild waste of letters, of the middle of the sixteenth century, to wit, "Busshoppe" for "Bishop" and such like. But the spelling of the word is often part of the history of the word, and in such cases we ought surely not to wipe out the history. And it often happens that the difference between the older and newer word is more than a difference in spelling; it is a difference between two different forms of the word, or between two words of cognate origin. Mr. Nichols certainly seems to us to have taken some very unwarrantable liberties with his author's text. Let us hear his account of his own doings:—

The passive participle I have commonly found to be accurately formed; took is the principal exception, which I have uniformly changed into taken. The genitive case of nouns was, in many passages, constructed on the clumsy plan of circumlocution, which, soon after the Revolution, became quite obsolete, and which I have in this work always discarded. Thus, for such phraseology as "the end of King James his reign," I have substituted "the end of King James's reign." The author always employs funerals and corpse (applied to one person,) as plural nouns, and I have changed them into the singular.

So again—

I have substituted the relative who or that, for "which" when applied to persons; though the almost indiscriminate use of all the three relatives in such application was the common practice of that age. Another alteration also I have conceived it to be a part of my duty to effect:—to prevent this generally very correct writer from trangressing the rules of grammar, especially in his hasty mode of yoking a verb in the singular number with two or more plural nouns in the nominative.

Now, with all deference to Mr. Nichols, we want Fuller's text as he wrote it, and not as Mr. Nichols thinks good to improve it. Take again his "list of such words as he has changed for others, their cognates in meaning and derivation." The massacre is pitiful. It is cheering to find that, as late as Fuller's day, "sprongen" and "sungen" still existed as participles from "spring" and "sing." Mr. Nichols ruthlessly changes them into "sprung" and "sung." If Fuller talked about a "rythmer," why should Mr. Nichols change it into a "rhymester"? Why get rid of "justicer"? Why change "chirurgeon" into "surgeon"; why change the perfectly good word "eremitical" into "hermitical," a word of Mr. Nichols' own coinage? "Chantery-priests" might well enough be changed into "chantry-priests," but why into "chanter-priests," unless to show that Mr. Nichols does not know what a chantry is? On the next page we find a number of words which Mr. Nichols for various reasons has retained (as Sir Charles Barry "retained" Westminster Hall), though they are seldom employed in modern writing. Among them are "chequered," "datary," "eftsoons," "evangel," "pursy," "sewer" [dapifer], "infamed." Lastly is it Fuller or is it Mr. Nichols who calls the territorial extent of a Bishop's jurisdiction his "diocess"?

LES INUTILES.*

THERE is a theatre in Paris which is scarcely known to English travellers, and, under ordinary circumstances, is rarely sought by the Parisians themselves, but which within the last twelve months has acquired a considerable amount of celebrity, and that of the most creditable kind. The Théâtre de Cluny—such is its name—has made two bold ventures, both of which have proved successful, and is called, therefore, by the French wits of the day, the "Theatre of Experiments." Its power of attracting an audience beyond the precincts of its own immediate neighbourhood comes, however, unless we are greatly mistaken, by flashes. Thus it became universally conspicuous a year ago through the production of a comedy by the late M. Félicien Mallefille, entitled Les Sceptiques; and it is now still more an object of general attention through the production of another comedy by M. Édouard Cadol, entitled Les Inutiles, which had no sooner achieved a success in Paris, when brought out towards the end of last September, than it was performed simultaneously in two of the principal theatres at Brussels. Since that time the sound of M. Cadol's fame has soared into lofty regions, and the whole company of the Théâtre de Cluny has, at the request of the Emperor, played Les Inutiles before the Court at Compiègne. In the Parisian playbills of the day the title of the comedy has become a fixture. It was brought out shortly before the withdrawal of Fanny Lear, the great piece of the summer, from the boards of the Gymnase, and, while novelties have sprung up in every direction, it has remained the most remarkable work of the present season, though it has now to contend with three rivals—namely, a dramatized version of Mrs. H. Wood's East Lynne, entitled Miss Multon, brought out at the Vaudeville; Séraphine, a comedy by M. V. Sardou, launched at the Gymnase as a bolt aimed at female devotees; and Les Faux Ménages, a piece written by M. E. Pailleron, a new hand, who seeks to rehabilitate the "social evil" on the boards of the venerable Théâtre Français.

During the interval that occurred when Les Sceptiques had ceased to run and Les Inutiles had not been produced, the Théâtre de Cluny, though still open, seemed to relapse into its old position as a mere local establishment, and herein its case is one to which we cannot find a parallel in theatrical London. There is no doubt that the comedies of Mr. T. W. Robertson have done a great deal towards maintaining the Prince of Wales's Theatre, once one of the most obscure of our capital, in its position as a place of fashionable resort; but there is a permanence in Miss Wilton's elevation of the old Queen's that is not reflected across the Channel. Since the production of Mr. T. W. Robertson's Society, Tottenham Street has been celebrated as the place where people have a chance of seeing the best possible performance of works that have a better title to be called comedies than most of the new works brought out elsewhere. The Théâtre de Cluny, on the other hand, seems to have its periods of darkness, during which its visible existence is in abeyance.

The celebrity of Les Sceptiques was no doubt somewhat increased by the fact that it had been refused by the Théâtre Français, for its success in a remote quarter gave dramatic Radicals an opportunity of inveighing against the injustice of an institution which is one of the most conservative in France, as everybody knows who is acquainted with the struggles of MM. Hugo and Dumas against the force of time-honoured maxims. Its author, M. Félicien Mallefille, who has died within the last few weeks, was socially much esteemed, but as a dramatist he had a reputation which in the opinion of many was greatly below his deserts. Le Cœur et la Dot, a comedy from his hand produced at the Théâtre Français as far back as 1852, was pre-eminently successful, but had neither been preceded nor was followed by any work comparable to it in importance, nor will the student of the modern French drama who wishes to make himself acquainted with this reputed chef-d'œuvre be induced to think his pains very well requited. The personages by whom the action is carried on are indeed strongly marked, and the question between love and money as causes of wedlock is vigorously discussed in a practical debate, which of course terminates in favour of the former; but the whole work is formed by that intermingling of the farcical and sentimental elements which render the works of the Morton and Reynolds school so unpleasant when surveyed from a literary point of view, without regard to their possible effectiveness on the stage. However, its success, as we have said, was great, and its isolated condition easily led to the inference that M. Mallefille was in some sort a neglected genius. This opinion was confirmed by the production at the Théâtre de Cluny of Les Sceptiques, which, though rejected by the Théâtre Français, is much higher in its tone, and much more closely approaches the rank of genuine comedy, than its fortunate predecessor. Using for the basis of his plot two of those illicit liaisons which recent experience has accustomed us to consider almost indispensable to the modern stage of Paris, the author seriously dwells upon the danger of that prevalent disregard of the maxims of sound morality which he considers to be one of the prevalent maladies of actual society. The sceptic, in his sense of the word, is not of the speculative kind represented by Sextus Empiricus among the ancients, and by David Hume among the moderns; but typifies the modern man and woman of fashion, who sneer away the foundations of time-honoured institutions, the various personages of the play being for the most part varieties of the same species. The oldest sceptic of the party suffers retribution by the discovery that his wife has been seduced by a younger sceptic whom he has trained in his own principles, and the younger sceptic expiates his sin by a suicide which brings the piece to a close. Self-destruction seems a little out of place in a work which is not only called a comedy, but which is written in a spirit consistent with that designation; and it is possible that a disapproval of this feature of the work caused its refusal by the Théâtre Français.

M. Cadol, the author of Les Inutiles, is altogether a celebrity of the present day. His piece had been refused everywhere long before the public heard of its existence, and he had not, like M. Mallefille, the consolation of looking back to a bright speck in the past. After a time it was lost altogether, and for four entire years no one knew what had become of it. At last it was found in some impossible place by M. Larochelle, the present Director of the Théâtre de Cluny, who appreciated the value of the treasure-trove, and produced it on the stage, where it still remains. The peculiarity which distinguishes Les Inutiles from the contemporary dramas of France is its total freedom, not only from immorality, but from all reference to illicit correspondence between the sexes. We are often edified by the declaration of some French dramatist, that the works we have been in the habit of regarding as immoral are replete with sound social doctrine. All sorts of woes are traced on the French stage to the prevalence of adultery, which is regarded now as a source of deadly calamity, now as a cause of inconvenience. Another origin of mischief is the "social evil," against whose fascinations Parisian youth is warned with a zeal that would do honour to King Solomon or George Lillo. What can be more wholesome than a condition of the stage in which the most conspicuous class of sinners receives the severest castigation? Surely we ought to rejoice when we hear that a new play by M. Octave Feuillet is about to be produced in which adultery will be lashed as it was never lashed before. Nevertheless, everybody who knows anything of the subject feels that all arguments to prove the moral tendency of the modern French stage are but so many sophisms, however plausible they may seem. There is an art of using the lash in such a way as to render the flagellated party interesting by virtue of the operation, and no one can be a greater proficient in this art than the leading French dramatists. Paul Forestier, for instance, placed happiness on the side of quiet domestic life, and misery on the side of disorder. Nevertheless the cause of disorder was the fascinating person, and matrimony wore but a humdrum aspect. There is no greater fallacy than the supposition that the moral to which a play ostensibly points is all-important to the public. A piece illustrative of some ethical maxim the soundness of which is above dispute may nevertheless abound in indecorous passages, the mischief of which is incalculably greater than the truth enforced by the catastrophe. This is actually the case with most French plays of the modern school. It is also the case with our Jack Sheppard. The whole tale of the burglar ostensibly carried out the unquestionable truth that violation of the criminal code of one's country will probably result in an untimely end. At the same time the process of law-breaking was rendered so exquisitely entertaining to boys of the lower class, that the moral professedly illustrated by the fate of Jack was met with the irrepressible doubt whether, after all, a short life and a merry one was not preferable to dull, respectable longevity.

Now M. Cadol, seeing that there is on the French stage something which is analogous to "the thing called pitch," and which, however handled, is sure to leave a stain, avoids touching it altogether. His comedy is directed, not against sexual sins, but against a love of useless luxurious ease which is perhaps more common on the Continent than in England or America. Although it is in four acts—now a favourite number—its plot is so simple that it can scarcely be reduced to a telling narrative. Paul de la Fortnoye, a nobleman whose age trembles on the close of the eighth lustre, is the grand representative of mischievous inutility. He leads a single life, keeps open house for a party of dissipated friends, who game and feast night and day in the fond belief that they are amusing themselves, and is so utterly careless of the state of affairs that he imagines the revenue of his estates sufficient to cover his reckless expenditure, whereas the interest on the mortgages with which his property is encumbered exceeds his income, and he is only kept afloat by the magnanimity of Mesnard, a worthy manufacturer who has married his sister Pauline, and who even conceals from his wife the assistance he affords to her brother. About Paul minor "inutilities" are gathered—De Trevières, an elderly Baron of doubtful origin, whose title is his sole substance, a being expressly created to be useless, whereas of Paul better things might have been expected; and Henri de Potey, a very young man, who is useless against his will, simply because his father, a foolish, wealthy bourgeois, likes to see him ape the idleness and extravagance of the "quality." As an eminently useful person we have, as a contrast to the knot of idlers, M. Desrives, a notary, who has not a thought beyond his business and a modest hope of advancement, but who, though a man of perfect integrity, is evidently regarded by the author as too utilitarian to become an object of interest. The focus of attraction by which all the characters are concentrated into unity of action is Geneviève Seguin, an amiable young lady of fortune, related to Mesnard, who is moreover her guardian, and a general mark for the attentions of bachelors in want of wives. De Trevières sees in her wealth a convenient material for the repair of his own estate, and attacks her with insipid compliments; Desrives looks upon her as in all respects suitable to himself, and employs the good offices of Pauline; Henri de Potey is regarded as a chance on the cards; but the only genuine lover is Paul himself, who has been coaxed down into the country by his sister, anxious to rescue him from Parisian dissipations, and who, thus brought into contact with Geneviève, at once becomes deeply enamoured. But there is a difficulty with Geneviève, which arises from her extreme fastidiousness. She knows that she is wealthy, and she believes that she is far from handsome; hence she is inclined to attribute every attention she receives rather to a desire for her money than to admiration for herself, and, being remarkably sensitive, often sheds tears when other young ladies are expected to smile. At the end of the piece her union with Paul is a settled affair, but a great many delicate obstacles have to be surmounted before things are brought to this happy conclusion. Mesnard, while assisting his brother-in-law, has almost brought himself to ruin, and his generous ward would willingly repair his fortune with her own. He is, of course, too much a man of honour to accept her offer, and Paul, when he has learned the state of the family finances, feels a scruple in asking for the hand of Geneviève, where his suit might be ascribed to a mercenary motive. The lady herself cuts the knot by signing a resignation of her inheritance, without the privity of her friends; for thus Mesnard steps into her property as next of kin, and Geneviève and Paul are enabled to marry without suspicion of interestedness on either side, while the audience are left to hope that the useless man of fashion thrown on his own resources will become a profitable member of society. The plot of Les Inutiles is indeed its weakest part; its chief merit consisting in the delicate, though distinct, manner in which the personages are drawn, and in the easy grace of the dialogue, which, less epigrammatic than is commonly the case in French comedy, is throughout tasteful, natural, and free from all obvious straining at effect.

But it is on the negative virtues of his work that M. Cadol sets the highest value, and so thoroughly was he convinced of his extreme audacity in presenting to his countrymen a play in which no moral blemish was to be found, that on the night when his comedy was first performed at the Théâtre de Cluny he distributed an apologetic preface among the audience, which is now reprinted with the piece itself. In this preface, after declaring that his work is moral, he states that the question once occurred to him, whether it was altogether impossible to make an assembly of worthy folks laugh or cry by any other means than the exhibition of social sores. He then proceeds thus:—

> Ceci posé, on a pris la question de face, sans marchander, sans louvoyer. Aussi—vous le verrez—parmi les personnages, pas un coquin, pas une farceuse; comme moyen d'action, pas de papiers honteux, qu'un mystérieux inconnu garde, durant trente ans, pour les produire au dernier acte, afin de dénouer l'intrigue; pas d'adultère non plus; ni duel, ni guet-apens, ni bâtard, ni boursier; pas même une pauvre petite substitution d'enfants; les dames de la pièce n'en ayant point eu avant leur mariage, soit par surprise, à leur insu, durant le sommeil, soit autrement. On n'a pas même admis ces dévouements sublimes et poétiques, par lesquels une jeune fille, infiniment bonne, se livre à l'amour d'un homme indélicat pour sauver celui que "son cœur aime." Nul se suicide, nul se vend, et l'on pousse le scrupule si loin que le sujet lui-même ne coule sur le déshonneur de personne.

By thus apologizing for his own shortcomings, M. Cadol contrives to give a very full and by no means overcharged description of the present state of the French stage.

JEBB'S SOPHOCLES.*

AN accidental tardiness in noticing these instalments of a Sophocles which promises to be one of the ablest and most useful editions published in this country must not be construed into any lack of due appreciation of their value. It seemed best to wait till more than one play had issued from the press; but it is not too late to express the favourable impression which we have formed, from the two samples before us, of Mr. Jebb's eminent qualifications for the task of interpreting Sophocles. Eschewing the old fashion of furnishing merely a grammatical and textual commentary, he has concentrated very much of the interest of his edition in the excellent and exhaustive introductions which preface each play, and which, while excluding what is not strictly connected with the subject, discuss the real matter in hand with acuteness and tact, as well as originality and research.

Thus, for example, he limits his regard, when dealing with the collateral literature of the Electra, to a contrast between the Æschylean and the Sophoclean treatments of the story. This contrast, according to Mr. Jebb, is due in great measure to the conditions under which each dramatist worked—the former at a link in his chain or trilogy, which he sought to rivet consistently; the latter at an independent piece, without prelude, and without sequel. Hence the Sophoclean Electra is not agitated by feuds between clashing interests and duties, such as it might puzzle the most experienced casuist to determine. No balancing of claims and crimes here distracts our sympathy from Electra and Orestes, about whose call to avenge on Clytemnestra and her paramour the murder of their sire there is no difference of opinion—men, and gods, and natural feeling alike imposing it. Clytemnestra is not permitted, as in Æschylus, to win justification, or sympathy, on the score of previous wrong or feminine jealousy; but is lowered in the eyes of the audience by her tyrannical treatment of her daughter, and never achieves even that amount of interest which we accord to Lady Macbeth, or to the Queen in Hamlet. One touch of nature, it is true, Sophocles has, with exquisite tact, accorded to her, when he represents her, though interest and expediency prompt her to rejoice at the supposed fate of her son, yet yielding to a mother's pang at the loss of her child (vv. 766-768). The critics who suppose that outburst to be got up for the sake of acting are but sorry judges of human nature, whereas Mr. Jebb, both in his note on this passage and elsewhere, proclaims his adhesion to the very opposite school, as may be seen from his remark that "these few words of genuine grief humanize and therefore dramatize, Clytemnestra more vividly than anything in Æschylus." Mr. Jebb, indeed, exhibits throughout his commentary that insight into the poet's mind, that appreciation of the coinage of the poet's brain, which is sometimes wanting to the most painstaking of editors. He can harmonize and collate different phases of the same character, and is not dismayed, after the manner of some, when she who, at the first tidings of her son's fate, gave way to natural anguish is shortly afterwards (in v. 807) described as "leaving the stage with an exultant air" (ἐγγελῶσα φρούδους) because roused to a sense of the advantages accruing from the death of Orestes, by the surprise of the messenger at her indifference, and by the irritating laments of Electra. Not less ably does he analyse the characters of the two sisters—the key to that of Chrysothemis being "decorum," τὸ κόσμιον, while to Electra duty (τὸ καλόν) is all in all (872, note). In another place (v. 328, note) Mr. Jebb's remarks on the skill of Sophocles in bringing out Electra as protagonist, as contrasted with his two rivals, are so pertinent, and display so large a grasp of the ethical features of his subject, that we cannot refrain from transcribing them:—

In Sophocles Electra suffers on the scene of her father's murder—in the palace which should be her brother's—amidst the luxuries which should be her own. Hardest of all, the advantages which Electra has sacrificed to duty are paraded by the sister who should have been her ally, but is only her temptress—a weaker Goneril or Regan, serving as a foil to a more masculine Cordelia.—P. 34.

Nor has Mr. Jebb been less successful in hitting off, in his introduction, the main scope and the characteristic features of the Ajax. It is a highly plausible theory that in that play Sophocles welded into one the moral of both the Homeric epics, contrasting in the characters and fortunes of forceful Ajax, and patient, time-biding Ulysses, the perils attaching to such fearless spirits as Achilles and the Salaminian hero, and the more sure triumphs of that wise self-restraint which is the theme of the Odyssey. He meets, too, in the only way in which it can be met, the objection to the seemingly inartistic construction of this play—the hero's death occurring when it is barely half over. The later scenes supply that portion of "the Death and Burial of Ajax," as the drama might fitly be called, for which earlier dramas, as well as their sense of what was seemly, would have prepared the audience. "To the Greek mind," writes the editor, "due burial was a matter of supreme concern; nothing could be more deeply, more painfully exciting than any uncertainty as to whether a hero with whom the spectators sympathized was, or was not, to receive funeral rites." Of the tact and good sense which Mr. Jebb brings to bear on his study of the Ajax, no better illustration can be given than his note on κἂν ἄποπτος ᾖς (v. 15), where the proper interpretation of the chief word involves a consideration of the question whether or not the goddess was visible on the stage at the opening of the drama, and during her colloquy with Odysseus. It is surely a descent to the ridiculous to accept the theory of her invisibility, and we are glad to see that Mr. Jebb has not only adopted the opposite view, but also maintained it as well by common-sense arguments, as by cogent parallels of divine personages appearing as well as speaking on the Attic stage.

But it must not be supposed that undue space is allotted to generalizations of character, or to disquisitions on points of the kind just referred to. The motto of this edition would seem to be "suum cuique." We recollect no edition of Greek plays where the stage directions are so good and so clear, and where the functions and position of chorus and actors are so lucidly discriminated in the notes. The illustration, too, of Aristotle's rules about Tragedy, by application to a special example, must conduce to create, in students whose minds are as yet hazy on such topics, a clearness which never would have arisen out of study of those rules in the abstract. Again, minuter attention is here paid to the metres of each strophe in the choruses than is to be found in most commentators. Take up Mr. Blaydes's unfinished edition of Sophocles in the Bibliotheca Classica, and the only hope of arriving at any elucidation of the choral metres is to snap haphazard at the jets of light which with difficulty peer out from the midst of long, jumbled notes about this, that, and the other. Now the first thing Mr. Jebb attempts at the opening of each chorus is a continuous exposition of the metres of each strophe, the reader being left to apply it to the corresponding antistrophe. This long-desired concession to the convenience of readers is a boon for which one cannot be too thankful. For thus each consideration has its own time and place, so that, when we have ascertained the metre and manner, we are able to proceed unencumbered to the grammar and the matter of the passage before us.

On these latter points there is much in Mr. Jebb's commentary to satisfy the needs of every class of readers. The advanced student will not lay down this volume after perusal without having gained two or three "wrinkles" which he will find serviceable when reading other samples of the Greek tragic drama; while younger hands may advantageously bestow any amount of pains on seeing that their affluence of suggestive hints will serve to render easier, not only the rest of Sophocles, but the works of his two compeers. We are indebted to Mr. Jebb for various nice pieces of verbal criticism. At the 320th line of the Ajax, for example, he notes the fitness of the word ἐξηγεῖτο, a word used commonly of authoritative exposition, to be put in the mouth of Tecmessa, and suggest "the reverence with which she received the utterances of her husband." On the word ἄλημα, "knave," in the 381st line of the same play, which is derived from ἀλέω, "to grind," he shows how the notion of "finesse" underlies this word, as it does also παιπάλημα, from παιπάλη (πάλλω), "fine meal." On El. 178; χρόνος γὰρ εὐμαρὴς θεός, it is pointed out that εὐμαρὴς is not so much "soothing" as "smoothing," or "facile," "bringing about the accomplishment of things which now seem hopeless"—cf. Virg. Æn., ix. 8. To this conclusion the derivation would, no doubt, lead us, but it is the gift of such annotators as Mr. Jebb to teach us this. In like manner, profit may be derived from Mr. Jebb's hints as to the sense of καὶ in such sentences as καὶ τί μέτρον κακότητος ἔφυ; (El. 236), and of ἦ καὶ ("do you really") in vv. 314, 385; of μήπω in v. 403, and of μὲν (= "so") in v. 516 ibid. There is real service done, too, by meeting the question whether σωζέσθω or σωζέσθων should be read in El. 438, ἀλλ' ὅταν θάνῃ, | κειμήλι' αὐτῇ ταῦτα σωζέσθω κάτω, with a mid-course between Porson's canon, which is too narrow, and Hermann's, which is too broad. Κειμήλια, as is here shown, fulfils neither of the descriptions of a neuter plural, to which Jelf's Grammar limits the use of a plural verb. It is not a case where (1) "de animantibus agitur," nor (2) where "the idea of plurality is prominent."

Of a kindred character are the nice distinctions, in which the notes of this edition abound, between cognate words such as ἀραί and Ἐρινύες (El. 111), the former being commonly special, personal, and inactive, the latter general, public, and executive; or ἑορταί and πάνδημος πόλις (ibid. 982), the one representing meetings for the special object of worship, the other larger gatherings in commemoration of a common descent. Other notes concern distinctions of a more syntactical character—e.g. between ὅρα μὴ τίθης and ὅρα μὴ τιθῇς, where the indicative marks certainty, the subjunctive only probability. Whether there is basis for the distinction at El. 199 between εἴτ' οὖν θεός, εἴτε βροτός, and εἴτε θεὸς εἴτ' οὖν βροτός—namely, that οὖν in the first instance puts the alternatives on a par, while in the second "it introduces the second with a shade of fretful despondency"—may, we think, admit of question. Dindorf and Linwood treat them as used indifferently for the same thing.

We are glad to see that the editors of the Catena Classica do not adhere too rigidly to that portion of their programme which seemed to profess that their road was to be all new metal, no old materials being tolerated. To ostracize good matter, because trite, is a doubtful policy, for right is right, and cannot be too often enunciated. There is substance and satisfactoriness in the note on ἔποικος (El. v. 189); but adherence to such a rule would have precluded the quotation from Il. xvi. 59, ὡσεί τιν' ἀτίμητον μετανάστην, which has probably figured in almost every edition of Sophocles, as indeed by reason of its pertinency it is quite entitled to do. In several instances we have found the substance of Mr. Jebb's notes identical with those of Mr. Linwood; e.g. in El. 958:—

ποῖ γὰρ μενεῖς ῥᾴθυμος ἐς τίν' ἐλπίδων
βλέψασ' ἔτ' ὀρθήν;

The former explains "ποῖ γὰρ] i.e. ποῖ—ἐς τίν' ἐλπίδων—βλέψασα μενεῖς ῥᾴθυμος; to what quarter—to what hope can you look, &c. cf. v. 996"; while the latter notes "ποὶ ad βλέψασα pertinere vidit Monkius, sc. ποὶ γάρ, ἐς τιν' ἐλπίδων βλέψασα μενεῖς ῥᾴθυμος;" the pith of both notes being the same. In interpreting another passage later in the play, 1007-8—

οὐ γὰρ θανεῖν ἔχθιστον, ἀλλ' ὅταν θανεῖν χρῄζων τις εἶτα μηδὲ τοῦτ' ἔχῃ λαβεῖν, not only does Mr. Jebb not scorn the steps of his predecessors, but he even embodies, in a somewhat diffuse paraphrase, a sense which Hermann had cleared up by the brief explanation "carcerem et lentos cruciatus timet." We may reasonably doubt whether Greek plays will ever be edited without large repetition of the lucubrations of others. Enough if the newest workmen contribute some new tools or methods to the work. The present editor has done this. He has not only, as we have seen, nicely defined shades of meaning and peculiarities of syntax, but has also now and then struck out a new path, and ventured on independent explanations, which commend themselves by their probability even where they differ from the interpretations of predecessors. Thus in Electra's allusion to Agamemnon's murder by Clytemnestra (444–5)— > ὑφ' ἧς θανὼν ἄτιμος, ὥστε δυσμενής, > ἐμασχαλίσθη, κἀπὶ λουτροῖσιν κάρᾳ

> κηλῖδας ἐξέμαξεν,

it has been usual to explain the last clause by changing the subject of the verb from Agamemnon to Clytemnestra, and to translate "and for a purification she wiped off the stains of blood on his head." Shrinking from so harsh a construction, Mr. Jebb tries back to the natural subject of the verb, and, taking it with κηλῖδας as meaning, which it well may, "took the print of the sword-stains," gets an interpretation which is not only ingenious, but less at variance with ordinary syntax:—"And by way of funeral ablution received the point of the sword-stains on his head."

At emendation, when he attempts it—though this, as might be expected of a good scholar, is but seldom—Mr. Jebb is also generally successful; and not less so in the exercise of that sort of ingenuity which, in the case of various conflicting emendations of some obscure passages, contrives to evoke light somehow. Take, for example, as a sample of his emendatorial skill these lines from the third chorus of the Electra (1085–9), > ὡς καὶ σὺ πάγκλαυτον αἰῶνα κοινὸν εἵλου,

> τὸ μὴ καλὸν καθοπλίσασα δύο φέρειν ἐν ἑνὶ λόγῳ,
> σοφά τ' ἀρίστα τε παῖς κεκλῆσθαι.

The first four words of the second verse defy coherent elucidation. Mr. Linwood tries to give a sense to the words as they stand—e. g. "organizing that which is not a pious act in itself (matricide) so as to win two things on one score," i.e., the credit of piety and the discredit of impiety by the same act. This palpable awkwardness is not got rid of by Hermann, Dindorf, or Schneidewin. By substituting τὸ μὴ κατοκνεῖν, ἐλπίσασα for the four obscure words above-mentioned, Mr. Jebb extracts from the sentence a very intelligible meaning. "Even as thou also hast chosen a life of tears and sympathy (with the dead, κοινὸν); instead of hesitating (lit. "so as not to hesitate") in the hope of winning two kinds of praise on one score"—the praise of being a prudent, and a pious, daughter. Taking into account the contrast throughout the whole play between Electra's singleness of purpose and Chrysothemis's attempts to square caution and duty, it seems highly probable that this emendation, or some words conveying a similar sense, may give the true key to the enigma.

A corrupt passage in the Ajax will exhibit Mr. Jebb's skill in making the best that can be made of the guesses and solutions of others. The passage is commonly read thus:—

> ἐγὼ δ' ὁ τλάμων παλαιὸς ἀφ' οὗ χρόνος
> Ἰδαῖα μίμνω λειμώνι' ἄποινα, μηνῶν
> ἀνήριθμος αἰὲν εὐνώμᾳ
> χρόνῳ τρυχόμενος.—Ajax, 600–4.

To take Ἰδαῖα λειμώνι' ἄποινα as meaning "a reward for (a long campaign upon) Ida's meadows," is to give the words a pregnant force "too strained for Sophocles." There is a difficulty, too, in seeing the point of εὐνώμᾳ in its natural sense. Out of a conjecture of Bergk, not otherwise very helpful, Mr. Jebb picks εὐνῶμαι as a substitute for εὐνώμᾳ, and for ἄποινα, in v. 601, reads ἔπαυλα (which seems to be corroborated by the variant μήλων, a gloss probably on ἔπαυλα). His only other change is μίμνων for μίμνω; and the sense then works out as follows, "Tarrying through countless months I ever make my couch in the quarters (ἔπαυλα) on the plains of Troy." With εὐνᾶσθαι ἔπαυλα he compares Agam. 176, σέλμα σεμνὸν ἡμένων, and with the idea of bivouacking set forth in εὐνῶμαι, the well-known passage in Agamemnon 542–5, and vv. 1206–10 of the Ajax.

In reading Mr. Jebb's notes on these plays we have rarely, if ever, found any mention of the Oxford editor of Sophocles, Mr. Linwood, whose views, where we have compared the two, are frequently antagonistic. At Electr. 698, for instance, Mr. Jebb's brief note is "ἱππικῶν masc." Mr. Linwood on the same passage writes "ἱππικῶν generis neutrius esse vidit Schneferus." Doctors must disagree, we suppose; but there is ample room for both editions, and those who have read Sophocles already with Mr. Linwood's notes cannot possibly do better than supplement the sound scholarship, thus imbibed, by the rare and valuable knowledge which Mr. Jebb has brought to bear on the Electra and the Ajax.

CAST UP BY THE SEA.*

FROM the minute and matter-of-fact detail of personal travel and exploration to the boundless realm of fiction and imagination is about as wide a step as a writer can well be conceived to take. Not only is there the transition, so to speak, from the narrow river of individual life to the broad ocean of fancy, but faculties widely different in character are called for in the two cases. It must always be with a considerable amount of uncertainty, not to say of apprehension, that we behold an author who has made himself a name by the unadorned and truthful recital of what he has seen, suffered, or surmounted, come forward as an adventurer upon the totally opposite element of fiction. Into that illimitable sea, where so many founder, and in which there are so many liabilities to shipwreck, he seems to venture like a mariner in a craft of untried powers and capacities, without chart or sailing directions, upon waters of unknown roughness and depth. Sir Samuel Baker has inspired the public with so much confidence in his straightforward, natural, and hearty way of describing life in its simplest and least conventional forms, that a natural misgiving may be felt as to how far this reputation will be fortified or impaired by an experiment in the creation of characters or scenery of a fictitious or representative kind. It is true that he can plead for himself as not having been left wholly to his own original or spontaneous promptings in entering upon this novel and possibly perilous enterprise. Since the publication of the Albert N'yanza and the Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia, he has been besieged, he tells us, by letters "from boys to whom he was entirely unknown, and who remain unknown to him at this moment except through the medium of their spontaneous correspondence," expressive of their youthful enthusiasm for the life of adventure led by the writer and his wife, and of lively admiration for their bold and successful struggle with so many difficulties. This outburst of boyish spirit impelled him to make some return for sympathies so much in keeping with his own love for what is most fresh and stirring in life. And what seemed to have presented itself as most natural and appropriate to the occasion was the idea of a work of fiction blending with it so much of the facts of history or of actual experience as might enhance its impressiveness and reality, and so take the stronger hold of the class of minds to whom it was primarily addressed. There was much, we may add, in the temperament of the writer's own mind, as shown in his previous lifelike and speaking narrative, which was sure not to fail him in the exigencies of his novel task. Exploration and travel in its most varied forms had made him acquainted with manifold types of men and life, while reading had combined with experience to store his memory with incidents and records of adventure. A degree of reality was thus imparted to the creations of his fancy which could hardly be expected in the mere conceptions of gentlemen who stay at home at ease. We are not prepared to say that the tale before us would of itself have raised the author's name to high literary rank. Nor do we consider it to prove that his forte lies in pictures drawn from pure imagination. Like most works of fiction the strength of which turns upon incident rather than character, it is best calculated to interest and charm the young. For that class of minds, we must remember, it was primarily composed. And though we cannot promise the author that width of sympathy on which he in his dedication counts hopefully, "from all boys alike, from eight years old to eighty," he may, we think, within the limits of all true and promising boyhood, rely upon a reception sufficiently cordial to repay him amply for the effort.

"Adventures," we are told by Mr. Disraeli, speaking by the mouth of Ixion, "are for the adventurous." The maxim is certainly justified in the instance before us by the profusion in which risks, hairbreadth escapes, marvels by sea and land, and incidents of the most startling and sensational kind crowd upon the youthful adventurers whose fortunes and exploits fill the pages before us. Never since the time of Sindbad did peril and disaster, tempest and shipwreck, monsters of the deep or enemies of the land, combine to beset and persecute any unfortunate son of the sea as they combine against Ned Grey and his companions in adventure. And never did Crusoe himself in his utmost need face difficulty and danger with greater cheerfulness, or show himself more prompt and full of resource in meeting and overcoming them. Never did even Ulysses, the much-enduring and daring man, tumble out of one trial or labour into another with more celerity or adroitness. Into Ned Grey's career of a few years are compressed, in fact, the whole ten years' mishaps and experiences of the great Greek's voyage to Ithaca, with the perils of Troy thrown in to double the amount. Our hero may be said literally to be cradled in adversity. The frontispiece shows him to us "cast up by the sea," an infant not many days old, snugly packed in a box lashed on an impromptu raft of empty barrels, while the lovely corpse of his fair-haired mother is found floating upon the waves. No vestiges remain—and no efforts, oddly enough, seem to have been made—to reveal the name of the vessel which has come to wreck upon the coast of Devon. A rich Indian shawl, some trinkets of value, and two hundred pounds in gold packed with the infant, are kept sacredly by its rescuers in the vague hope of light being some day thrown upon the mystery. It would imply a strange distrust of the story-teller's orthodoxy were the reader to doubt for a moment the ultimate clearing up of the secret, the clue to which is here laid by till the proper occasion. It is no part of ours to anticipate the dénouement. Suffice it that admirers of Paul Clifford will concede the fact of its faithfulness to established precedent, with the exceptional point in its favour that neither does scandal attach itself to the parentage, nor more than the faintest stain of crime to the personal career of the hero. Such moral shadow as may be suffered to flit over it for a while is, after all, but of a kind to pass with most people, and at most times, as conventional and venial. At the time of the late French war, and among the population of the sea-coast, it almost rose into a virtue; combining, as it did, the assertion of free rights against an arbitrary impost with deeds of daring and skill dear to the national heart. It is in the line of contraband trade with France, in articles which the long war made exceptionally and extravagantly dear, that Ned—under the auspices of his foster-parents, Paul Grey and his handsome and spirited but childless Polly—takes his plunge into a sea of troubles, perils, and eventual triumphs. The cruises of the smart lugger, the Polly, furnish themes for description quite in the manner of Captain Marryat. Despite the malignant arts and spells of Mother Lee—an old crone strongly suspected of witchcraft, and burning with jealousy of the happy seaman's wife and her blooming foster-boy—the saucy craft plies her adventurous calling in the teeth of revenue cruisers and French privateers. Goodly store of smuggled wealth fills the secret cave behind Paul's cottage on the cliff. The friendly hints of the active one-armed lieutenant of the coastguard—Joe Smart, secretly in love with the buxom Polly—fail to check the flow of enterprise. The revenue cutter, close on the heels of the Polly at the close of one successful trip, is lured upon the rocks by the bale-fire of Mother Lee, in revenge upon the officers of the Crown for the loss of her husband, who has been hung for piracy and murder. A terrible scene occurs at the foot of the cliff, where a handful of drowning men, upon a mast with their officer, battle for life with the boiling surf:—

"Lord help us!" screamed a voice of agony; "help!"

"Hold fast!" was again heard, as the breakers forced the entire length of the mast broadside on against the rocks, and jammed the unfortunate men against the cliff.

Old Mother Lee had stood up, and she leant over the cliff, listening to the terrible struggle for life.

"Ha! ha!" she chuckled.

"Lord help us!"

"I'll help ye! Yer helped my Stephen, didn't yer? Here's help for yer! and here! And here's more help! Curses on yer! here's more help! Ha! ha! I heard that strike! D'ye like it? Here's another!"

The old woman, with incredible strength, in a frenzy of fury lifted large blocks of stone from the rocky ground, and showered them at random upon the unfortunate sailors below. A fragment of stone of many pounds' weight fell upon the head of the gallant captain with a dull crash, and his lifeless body slipped from the mast and disappeared amidst the surf. Another, and then a third, succumbed to the pitiless shower of stones which the old hag rolled without intermission from the height. Two men had been crushed to death against the cliff by the mast driven by the surf. Only one remained; several rocks bounded past him, and two had struck the mast within a few inches of his hands.

Just at this moment Paul and Ned arrived, and found Mother Lee in the act of heaving another piece of rock over the edge of the cliff; in her excitement she had neither heard them approach, nor had she seen the light, as her attention had been directed below.

Startled at the unexpected sight of the old woman, Paul halted for a moment just as she hurled a large stone over the precipice. At the same time, a loud cry of distress from beneath rang upon his ear. The horrible truth flashed upon him as Mother Lee turned round, and he read the deed in the fearful expression of her features.

"Cursed old fiend!" shouted Paul, as he seized her by the waist, and lifting her like an infant in the air, he swung her above his head; and in another moment Mother Lee would have been flying over the rock into the boiling surf had not Ned caught Paul's arm, and checked his first impulse of retribution.

Ned's daring is rewarded by the rescue of the single survivor of the crew, a black boy, who becomes his faithful and inseparable companion—the man Friday of his subsequent thrilling adventures in foreign parts. A love episode with the rector's charming and ingenuous daughter, Edith Jones, agreeably diversifies the current of risks and exploits, but is abruptly cut short when Ned and "Nigger Tim" are swept off the beach by a press-gang led by the odious and cowardly Jem Stevens, the rival suitor for Edith's good graces. Her big and brave Newfoundland dog Nero forms their companion in exile, and their saviour in many a hazard by sea and land. Meanwhile Ned's disappearance, falling in with the murder of rector Jones that very night—Ned's name too being the last word upon the dying clergyman's lips—involves the missing youth in the suspicion of guilt, in which his foster-father also innocently shares. A verdict of wilful murder is brought in against them both. The secret of the smuggler's cave is betrayed by Mother Lee, and its stores, including the relics "cast up by the sea," are taken possession of in the King's name. The old hag, following up her scheme of hatred and revenge, and scenting according to her diabolical wont "more luck from the sou'-west," attempts to lure the Polly, together with the man-of-war in pursuit, upon the rocks; but, catching fire from her own tar-barrels, meets a horrible though righteous death. The interest of the story from this point is divided, to be carried on alternately between the fortunes of Paul in desperate sea-fights and French prisons, those of the sad and weary watchers at home, and those of the two bold lads and their four-footed companion afloat. An extra touch of reality is given to the tale by the introduction of the famous sea-fight between the Sibylle and the Forte, from James's Naval History. The subsequent loss of the latter with her prize crew is hardly less vividly real. Readers of naval romance must not quarrel either with the probabilities which leave Ned, Tim, and Nero the sole apparent survivors of the wreck, or with the bounty wherewith good luck throws in their way everything needful, first for a long raft voyage, and next for the encounter with savage life on the African continent. At this point Sir S. Baker's special knowledge of Africans and their ways stands him in good stead, and he makes liberal use of the materials at his command. We are almost out of breath with the exploits and hazards which crowd upon us at every page. Our young adventurers cross burning deserts and foaming torrents, singly face the lion and the elephant, and bag the hippopotamus and the giraffe. Tim, through recalling the language of his boyhood, makes a way to the heart of more than one native race, and Ned, copying the precedent of Columbus, rises almost to divine honours through foretelling an eclipse, for introducing which without the authority of the almanac the author thinks it fit to make an apology. We come upon a succession of rapidly shifting tableaux, of tribes ferocious or gentle, wary old chiefs and gushing negro maids, envious magicians and medicine men, and lovely amazon queens. Through the jealousy or hatred of the one sex, and the far more perilous endearments of the other, our hero's constancy and courage pass triumphant, bereft as he is in turn of the watchful Nero and the faithful Tim, till we hail with satisfaction his safe return to England, home, and beauty. The moral unities of the tale are upheld throughout, not only by a delicacy of tone which renders it safe and fitting for the perusal of the young, but by a dealing out of substantial justice, which rewards the suffering good and deprives the wicked of their triumph.

The style of the book bears throughout the impress of the writer's own healthy and vigorous enjoyment of life, and if somewhat free scope is given to the imagination, there is nothing of sickly sentiment, or of any pandering to the love of the horrible. The narrative has been vigorously seconded by the lively though somewhat idealistic pencil of the illustrator. Nautical critics might possibly find professional holes to pick here and there in the records of deeds afloat. Much as Sir S. Baker has seen of life by sea as well as land, he can hardly have met with a lugger which had a "spanker" to be shot away, as befalls the Polly in an action with the French privateer, or a boom to be "slacked off" as she is cut out from under the guns of the corvette. Greater risks than those of facing savage tribes beset the landsman who ventures into the technical details of seamanship. In judging the general merits of the book as a fiction, it is only fair to keep in mind the class of readers for whose behoof it was specially designed. Should it be thought by professed novel-readers too rude or inartistic in respect to plot, or of too tough a fibre as respects such or such of its thickly-spun and inexhaustible yarns, it may turn out all the healthier and more digestible food for simpler and less blasé stomachs. We may envy the appetite with which the schoolboys so near to the writer's heart will sit down to the rich feast of marvel and adventure that he has spread before them.

SPAIN.

THE establishment of a Directory or Triumvirate in Spain will be a continuation of the Provisional Government, and a further adjournment of difficulties which thicken with delay. The supporters of a Republic are justified in assuming that the temporary adoption of their favourite form of government furnishes an argument for its permanent necessity and expediency. No future time will offer new facilities for selecting a dynasty or a King, unless indeed circumstances should encourage the ambition of some successful soldier. The only reason against choosing the Duke of MONTPENSIER or the Duke of AOSTA is that neither candidate is recommended by special merit or by general popularity. If SERRANO and his colleagues have really determined to propose a Directorate, their resolution shows but a qualified respect for the constitutional omnipotence which they have so constantly attributed to the Cortes. At the general election the main issue between a Monarchy or a Republic was decided by a large majority against the system which is now, according to common report, likely to prevail. The electors, as far as they may be supposed to have had an opinion, thought a King better than a President; nor can their representatives decorously forget, at the word of command, the professions which they have made or the instructions which they have received. Any objections which have been raised against the usual form of a Republic apply with increased force to a Directory. The executive power, except in extraordinary cases, cannot conveniently be put in commission, because, amongst other reasons, every member of the governing body will be more anxious to maintain or improve his own position than to contribute to the efficiency of the Government. In the height of a formidable war and of a desperate revolution the Committee of Public Safety for a time conducted the administration of France with spasmodic energy, and in a certain sense with success. The pressure of business and the imminence of danger rendering a division of labour possible, CARNOT was scarcely interrupted in his direction of the frontier campaigns by the mechanical duty of signing daily warrants for the judicial murder of victims selected by ROBESPIERRE or COLLOT D'HERBOIS; yet, when the reaction of Thermidor arrived, it appeared that half the Committee were eager to put the other half to death, nor would the section which might have proved the stronger have failed to accomplish its bloody purpose at the first interval of comparative leisure. The Directory which succeeded, falling on more prosaic times, soon deservedly acquired an evil reputation for faction, corruption, and incapacity. The conspiracy of Brumaire, with its results, was one of the most popular exploits in modern French history, especially when it appeared that the two supplementary members of the new Government were not destined to share with the FIRST CONSUL any portion of supreme power. The Provisional Government of 1848 abdicated, after an inglorious reign of two months, to make room for an Executive Body, which, through the imbecility of LAMARTINE, included LEDRU ROLLIN. The new Government, entering upon the nominal possession of power at the end of April, lasted long enough to be overthrown by the fearful insurrection of June. General CAVAIGNAC was then rewarded for his services in restoring order, by a kind of temporary Presidency; and it has always since been held that there ought to be a single person at the head of the Government, although a minority of the Constituent Assembly proposed to dispense with a President, and to entrust the executive power to a council of responsible Ministers. A Directory which would be weak even if it were designed to be permanent will certainly not derive additional strength from a limited and uncertain tenure of office. If either a different form of Republic or a Monarchy is deemed preferable to a Triumvirate, it will be obviously unreasonable to postpone advantages which can be at any time attained.

The Provisional Government, in referring every question to the Cortes, virtually acknowledges its own incapacity rather than its legal or constitutional disability. Revolutions are no more to be made by parchment than with rose-water; nor have PRIM and SERRANO any title except what is derived from military usurpation, ratified either expressly or tacitly by popular consent. Every statesman is aware that a large assembly can take no initiative, and that Government must, unless it is to abdicate all its functions, introduce and carry the measures for which SERRANO and his colleagues affect to be waiting in passive expectation. As it is impossible to be totally motionless, the members of the Government display a fitful and inconsistent activity. One of the Ministers considered himself authorized to commence the secularization of moveable Church property, although no Cortes had at any time sanctioned confiscation or transfer of Church goods to the State; yet, when a subordinate functionary is murdered in the course of obeying the Ministerial order, the Government announces its own incompetence to decide the question of religious freedom. The objection to measures relating either to Church property or to liberty of conscience is founded on the danger of irritating the priests and the fanatical part of the population. A Spanish bishop would probably prefer even the public preaching of a Protestant sermon to the loss of the treasures of his cathedral; but the Government, which was not afraid to provoke the Burgos outrage, has not made up its mind to establish freedom of worship, although its members, with some inconsistency, boast that one Protestant service, of which, as it happens, they knew nothing, has been celebrated at Madrid. It may still be hoped that Marshal SERRANO is not deeply moved by the sacerdotal tirade against heresy which has been presented to him in the name of various ladies of rank. The memorialists probably believe that, in the words which the priests have caused them to adopt, Protestants worship false gods, and preach unmixed immorality. The Provisional Government is not likely to share their frantic [illegible]; but it has probably not yet ascertained, to its own satisfaction whether any party worth conciliating cares for religious freedom. Sanguinary proof has been given that the fanatics are in earnest, and that they have a portion of the lower classes on their side. When Mr. BEALES and his followers next hold a meeting to congratulate the Spaniards on their institution of civil and religious liberty, it may be well to inquire whether the majority of the people approve even of the barest toleration. It may be safely assumed that the mob which killed and mutilated the unfortunate Governor of BURGOS would, at the bidding of its clerical leaders, as willingly have pulled down a Nonconformist chapel.

The Burgos assassination strikingly resembles many of the transactions which occurred in France in the days of the last Kings of the House of VALOIS. The League had, in Paris and in the larger towns, entire control over the bloodthirsty rabble; and it could always count on the clergy, and especially on the regular orders. Even in Spain the progress of modern degeneracy would probably have prevented the ARCHBISHOP from employing a confidential assassin to vindicate the cause of the Church. It was enough that the clergy and their attendants opened the doors of the cathedral to the mob, while they suddenly withdrew themselves from the presence of the victim. The murder may or may not have been deliberately planned, but there is little doubt that it must have been contemplated as possible. The clergy, who were supposed to be mainly aggrieved by interference with the archives and treasures of the Church, would undoubtedly have been able, within the walls of the cathedral, to restrain the zeal of their partisans. Ecclesiastical consciences will be but faintly troubled by an act for which they will profess to hold the Government responsible. The registration of church books and ornaments was not of urgent necessity, and it was therefore indiscreet to undertake it in a time of general confusion. The reasons assigned for the measure by the MINISTER of PUBLIC WORKS were obviously futile or insufficient. The possibility that historical documents might be lost if they were left in the churches furnished but a lame excuse for making an inventory of silver candlesticks and jewelled reliquaries. The distinction between a mistake and a crime will not be regarded by the instigators of the murder, who will consider their own act, in its turn, as a more or less judicious political measure. It is unfortunately not yet certain that the clergy have committed an error, or, in other words, that their party is the weaker. The assassination is a defiance as well as a provocation, and there are some indications that the Government is intimidated. The open hostility of the Church to the Revolution greatly increases the risk of civil war. Some of the Northern provinces have returned Carlist members to the Cortes; and there are rumours of importations of arms across the French frontier. Even in political conflicts it is possible that the Church party may hold the balance of power by inducing the extreme and moderate Liberals to bid against one another for its support. It is useless to speculate on the final result of movements which become every day more complicated and more perplexing. The history of Spain during the last six months proves in a crucial instance that even such a Government as that of ISABELLA II. is scarcely more mischievous than a plausible revolution. Some of the worst anomalies which discredited the Monarchy seem to be inseparable from Spanish administration. In defiance of law and of justice the persons accused of complicity in the Burgos murder are to be tried by Court-Martial, although the state of siege which has since been proclaimed is the consequence of the crime. It is only in disregarding the securities of freedom that the Government is bold, for the NUNCIO, notwithstanding the refusal of the POPE to receive the diplomatic agent of Spain, still retains his diplomatic position and his ecclesiastical jurisdiction. There is little reason to expect that the authority of the Cortes will supply the want of statesmanlike vigour and prescience which threatens to make the Revolution abortive.

THE IRISH BISHOPS AND THE GOVERNMENT.

THE Irish Bishops are at this moment in a position of great difficulty, and, in order to do them justice, the difficulty of their position ought to be carefully considered. They are looked on as the natural guardians of an institution which is beyond all question destined to receive before long a totally new shape. The interests of many individuals, and the feelings of a large and powerful class, are certain to be afflicted in a very serious and painful way; and the Bishops are considered, with more or less distinctness, to be the proper persons around whom those threatened should rally. If the Bishops could but take the same ground as the Protestant Defence Association, and could impose on themselves and the world by appearing to believe in the supreme utility of meetings merely assembled to hear third-rate speeches, and cry "No surrender," their task would be easy enough. But this is impossible. Men of sense can see no good in shutting their eyes and screeching out that what they know is going to happen shall not happen. The Irish Church will most certainly be disestablished and disendowed, but everything depends on the meaning which is to be practically affixed to these terms. To the Bishops, above all men, it belongs to endeavour that this meaning shall be one as favourable as possible to the Church over which they have been appointed to preside. But what are they to do? If they simply wait and do nothing, they are accused of supineness; and the clergy, who have very much to say, and the laymen, who have something to say, complain that they have no means of conferring with each other, of combining their efforts, and of helping the Bishops by their suggestions and their support. But then, if the Bishops make themselves into a standing committee of a purely voluntary and unrecognised kind, and associate with themselves that portion of the clergy and laity which would like to be so associated, they may fetter themselves by the action of a vague, unmanageable body over which they would have no control, and which might scandalize the public by its dissensions or its fanaticism. Excellent people as most Irishmen of the Established Church undoubtedly are, there are members of the Church who, in the hot contest they are always waging against Popery, have acquired a bitterness, a wrongheadedness, and a barbarous fury, that would create a very disadvantageous impression if its utterances were now brought before the world. The Bishops might be able neither to repress nor to disown their dangerous friends; and to what shocking lengths Protestant fanaticism may be carried has been just illustrated by the astounding story of the proprietors of Arran, who have, it is said, condemned 3,000 people to go without bread altogether unless they would buy it of a Protestant baker. Persons inflamed with this kind of zeal could scarcely be excluded from a conference of amateurs assembled to speak their foolish minds to the Bishops. The dirty linen of the Irish Church had better be washed at home just now, and it would be very difficult to secure this if an irresponsible, indeterminate body of zealots were called together. But it seemed to offer a happy escape from the dangers of such an assembly, and also from the reproach of doing nothing, if the Bishops could get permission for the Convocation of the Irish Church to meet. There would then be a body known to the law, composed mainly, if not entirely, of persons on whom the Bishops could rely, and eminently adapted from its constitution to do nothing if a masterly inactivity seemed the true policy, or to come out with any amount of resolutions, speeches, and declarations if a manifestation of clerical opinion might in the chances of events seem likely to be beneficial. Nothing could be more convenient, and the Bishops at one time thought that they might venture to ask Convocation to meet without the license of the Crown; but they found that the law was too strong for them, and so they were obliged to ask for the permission of the Government. They could not have had much hope that the present Government would accord the permission, but at any rate it seemed well to ask it. They have worked themselves into the favourable position of having a mild sort of grievance to cherish, and, if they do nothing, they can throw the blame of their inactivity on a tyrannical and hostile Ministry that actually will not allow the legal heads and representatives of a threatened Church to meet together in the hour of their peril.

The reasons against permitting the Irish Convocation to assemble appear to us overwhelming, and how very strong they are is shown by the refusal or omission of Mr. DISRAELI's Government to let it meet. Why, when the friends of the Irish Church were in power, and when a new Parliament was summoned, and the Convocations of the English Provinces duly called together, was the opportunity not taken to give the desired powers to the Irish Convocation? The only answer is, that the fatal objection which is felt now was felt then. This objection is, that the Irish Convocation is a complete novelty, and that the State would now take a distinct step in creating it, which is entirely inconsistent with the attitude of the State towards the Church involved in disestablishment. The Irish Convocation would not have been a recognised body of churchmen meeting at the ordinary time, in the ordinary way, for the discussion of what is clerically termed business. It would have been a new clerical body, summoned ad hoc, for the express purpose of resisting a Bill founded on Resolutions passed by the House of Commons. No State in the world would for a moment think of allowing anything of the sort. The same people who would meet in Convocation can of course meet at Dublin as a purely voluntary association, and may say and vote and resolve anything they please. But this was exactly what the Bishops, for reasons of which we recognise the weight, were especially anxious should not be done. They wanted the State to interfere on their behalf, to exercise that power which, of all its powers, most thoroughly assumes and realizes the theory of secular control over an Established Church— the power of saying that a particular body of clergymen may meet together in such a way that their proceedings have a legal validity which is undoubted, although its extent and nature may be undiscoverable. The Bishops, in effect, said to the State, "Establish us and our Church a great deal more strongly "than you have ever done as yet, and then we shall be "in a more comfortable position to discuss with you whether "we shall be disestablished." If indeed Convocation could have been used for the very purposes of disestablishment, if it could have been made to furnish the Government with a body competent to organize the Irish Church as a voluntary community, it would perhaps have been wise to overlook the anomaly and absurdity involved in calling it together at the present moment. But it is evident that it could do nothing of the sort. No English statesman would think for a moment of leaving the constitution of a church to a purely clerical body. Whatever may be the nucleus selected around which the future voluntary association is to cluster, it must necessarily contain a large lay element. To have called Convocation together, and then have added laymen to the members of Convocation, would have been merely a laborious and roundabout way of doing that which had better be done as simply and in as straightforward a manner as possible. And it would be wholly premature at present for the Government to take any steps towards the creation of a body charged with the organization of the Irish Church as a voluntary association. When the nation is satisfied with the interpretation of disestablishment and disendowment suggested by the Government, it will be quite time enough to decide how and by whom the details of the scheme are to be practically worked. Before this organizing body comes into existence, it will be necessary to settle what endowment shall be left to it to administer, and what are to be its relations to the Established Church of England. Convocation could not possibly help any one to settle either of these points; whereas, by its discussions and by the air of intimate alliance with the State which it would assume, it might seriously embarrass their settlement.

The Bishops have now to consider whether, as they cannot get permission for Convocation to assemble, they will content themselves with forming a voluntary and unrecognised association to confer with and support them. They know their own business best, and can judge as no one in England can, whether they could get together such an association, so composed as to be in some degree manageable, and to carry with it weight and influence. But so far as any one here can pretend to have an opinion, we may venture to suggest that they would make a great mistake if they did anything of the sort. An association which only dealt in general remarks, which cried out against all spoliation, and went on speechifying and passing inoperative resolutions, would put the Bishops in a much worse position than that which they hold now. It is, on the other hand, quite impossible that an association presided over by the Irish Bishops should be able to make any practical suggestions of value at the present moment. Lord RUSSELL has kindly offered himself as a sacrifice for the general good, and has illustrated with what easy contempt the public passes by hasty, foolish little schemes from outsiders for giving so much of the Irish Church property in this way and so much in that. The Bishops had much better wait until they know what are the leading features in the scheme which the Government will propose. This measure will have at least the effect of bringing discussions about the Irish Church to definite issues, and will invest them with a practical character. We may calculate that all, or very nearly all, that can be said for or against the measure will have been said by the time the Bill passes the second reading in the Commons, and the degree of favour with which it is received by the nation at large will then have been ascertained. The Irish Bishops and their friends may then be prudent in making a move, and if they try to modify or to improve the Bill, while adopting its general principles, they may work with some prospect of success. There are many details which must be gone into before the Bill is finally settled, and as to which they have, perhaps, better information, and better means of arriving at a conclusion, than almost any other set of men. If they exhibit prudence and tact and moderation, it is impossible that the Bishops should not be able to control very largely the shape which the Church, under its new organization, will assume. They may, moreover, be encouraged to keep quiet for the present by observing that the contest on which they are about to enter begins under auspices very tolerably favourable to them. Their chief opponents are of course the Roman Catholic clergy, and although there is not the slightest sign that England is inclined to waver in entering on the path of justice, yet language has been held recently in some of the Romanist clerical circles which will certainly not tend to diminish whatever prejudices an ordinary Englishman may have against them. Nothing, perhaps, could conduce more to ensure the concession of very favourable terms to the holders of the endowments of the Established Church than that a cry should be raised by their rivals that they will not be content unless England strips the Protestant Church, when disestablished, of the last farthing. The priests are certain not to be content, whatever is done, for it is their business not to be content; and the argument so often urged by the friends of the Church, that it is useless to try to stop the agitation of the priests by ruining the Protestant Church, would carry much weight as being supported by all the facts we know of, if only it were not quite irrelevant. But although the Irish Church will be disestablished and disendowed, not to stop the agitation of the priests, but from a simple desire to do justice, yet the temper in which the Church is dealt with may in some measure depend on the course taken by the friends and enemies of the Establishment. The priests have gone some way to do themselves and their supposed interests harm by beginning to talk big and use violent language about what must and what must not be done. The Irish Bishops will do well, we should think, to avoid falling into the same error, and to remain in the silence and reserve that gives no offence, until they can do or say something likely to be effective.

GREECE AND TURKEY.

THE resignation of the Greek Cabinet seemed for the first time to afford a definite indication of the policy which was to be adopted; but it now appears that the KING has been unable to form a new Government, except on the understanding that the advice of the Great Powers should be rejected. Notwithstanding the calculated arrogance of Greek diplomacy since the beginning of the quarrel, it is still difficult to believe that the Government will venture on war. Without troops, without money or credit, in the presence of a formidable army on the frontier, the KING and his advisers can scarcely believe that it is their interest to provoke an unequal struggle. A less cogent argument against resistance might be deduced from the consciousness that from first to last Greece has been wholly in the wrong. It will probably be found that ostentatious reluctance to withdraw from a hopeless struggle has been assumed, partly to gratify national vanity, and principally for the purpose of imposing on the imagination of foreigners. Ingenious diplomacy delights to create or magnify the mysterious resources on which it professes to rely. As long as Greece seems to be only restrained by external force from springing at the throat of Turkey, credulous politicians will believe that some promise of aid, from Russia or from malcontent subjects of the Porte, supports a confidence which obviously rests on no visible foundation.

The extraordinarily mild language which revealed the internal differences of opinion in the Conference has enabled the Greek Government to affect a reserve and hesitation which were probably not seriously entertained. It cannot be doubted that Russia has long since announced that the moment is not propitious for a war of aggression; and it is improbable that the Greek Government should at any time have thought of undertaking a single-handed contest with Turkey. The elaborate deference of the Plenipotentiaries, and the delay which elapsed before the recommendations of the Conference were formally communicated to the Greek Government, have given an opportunity for the exercise of diplomatic skill. For two or three weeks all Europe has been kept in suspense while a petty State deliberated whether, in obedience to the counsels of the Great Powers, it should decline a hopeless struggle. In finally assenting to the moderate terms devised by the Paris Conference, any Greek Ministry which may be in office will have the air of conferring a favour. Few politicians will pause to reflect that the acceptance of the Protocol is an admission of wilful breaches of international law. Powerful wrongdoers have often displayed an ostentatious condescension when they have been forced to withdraw from some untenable position; but the strength of the Greeks consists mainly in their immunity from the extreme consequences of war. They know that at the worst they will be protected against any loss of territory, while their enemy is at all points exceptionally vulnerable. During the recent crisis they believed, with some reason, that they were able to involve half Europe in a war for which no Power was fully prepared; and, on the whole, they have added to the importance of their country by causing the commotion which has not even yet subsided. On the other hand, the Porte may perhaps hereafter be treated with more respect, in consequence of its original determination to rely on its own resources, and of the moderation which it has subsequently displayed. It has been often and truly remarked, that the diplomatic ability of Turkish statesmen is altogether disproportioned to their administrative capacity. The advisers of the SULTAN are perhaps more in earnest when they deal with great questions of war and peace than in the still more important task of removing internal abuses. The ablest Western Cabinet need not have been ashamed of the adroitness and foresight which have been displayed by the Porte during the whole of the Cretan insurrection. During that time the policy of France and of Austria has oscillated more than once between opposite extremes, and Russia has steadily watched for the opportunity of forming some aggressive alliance; but the Turkish Ministers rightly calculated that the Governments which had adopted no definite systems would ultimately imitate the unswerving neutrality of England, and every proposal of intervention in the internal affairs of Crete has been consistently rejected. The hostile proceedings of the Greek Government were endured until it was impossible to doubt the justice of retaliation, and even when war became apparently imminent, time was afforded for neutral Powers to interpose their good offices. The Turkish Plenipotentiary at Paris made the adhesion of his Government to the Protocol contingent on the submission of Greece; and even at the present moment, if the negotiations should break down, the Porte is at liberty to make use of its undisputed superiority of force.

While both the disputants may claim to have secured some advantages in the controversy, the mediators have perhaps suffered a certain loss of dignity. There was a time when five Great Powers, dispensing for the most part with the formality of a Congress, settled without appeal any difficulty which might arise among the weaker States. If there had been a common purpose, the Paris Conference would probably have dictated peace in not less peremptory terms; but in political, as in ecclesiastical assemblages, vague and elastic formulas must be used when it becomes necessary to cover irreconcileable dissensions. It is possible that Prussia and Austria might have concurred with France and England in a vigorous censure of Greek turbulence, and in a demand for the discontinuance of hostile menaces; but if the Russian Ambassador had refused to sign the Protocol it was certain that Greece would be contumacious. It was therefore thought expedient to confine the decision of the Conference to commonplaces, not even seasoned with menaces or warnings. As the document has produced the desired result, it is perhaps hypercritical to complain of its form. Some ingenious theorists have discovered a more far-fetched apology for the tame language used by the Conference, in the knowledge of the Plenipotentiaries that the Greeks had no intention or desire of fighting. The determination of bystanders not to interfere in a quarrel has cooled the zeal of many an eager combatant; and it is possible that the Greek Government may have understood the Protocol as a hint that it would, in case of refusal, be allowed to indulge its warlike propensities without restraint. To the Turks, who had ships and troops ready, while they said little of their purposes, it would have been useless to address any similar intimation. The task of pacification has been greatly facilitated by the suppression of the insurrection in Crete, which was in some degree due to the resolute policy of Turkey. The rupture of diplomatic relations rendered it possible to confine the Greek blockade-runners to the port of Syra, and the Turkish commanders in the island, relieved from the danger of fresh invasions, were enabled to concentrate their forces against the volunteers and insurgents. Now that there is no longer a rebellion to support, it would be absurd to go to war in support of the theory that national sympathies supersede public law. The abortive insurrection, which from the first was deprecated by the ablest Greek statesmen, has greatly diminished the probability of the future annexation of Crete to the Hellenic kingdom. The Mahometan Greeks are now relatively more numerous than at the beginning of the war, and the hopes of the disaffected Christians are proportionally depressed. The Turks have found by experience that their most formidable enemies are more ready to threaten than to strike; and all parties have ascertained that the union of Crete to the kingdom of Greece is not regarded in Europe as an object sufficiently desirable to justify a war.

It is generally agreed that it would have been better, when the independence of Greece was first recognised, to have assigned to the new kingdom a larger territory; yet it is surprising that some intelligent politicians should hold that the Greeks have a right at any time to correct the supposed oversight by unprovoked attacks on Turkey. If, indeed, they were able to accomplish their object by their own strength, foreign sympathizers might well extend to their irregular proceedings the tolerance which was in a similar case accorded to GARIBALDI; but as long as the Turks have both legal rights and ample means of defending them against Greek assailants, it is not to be endured that enterprises should be undertaken which could only be successful if they formed the occasion of a general war. The Greeks, who among other accomplishments possess the art of writing in foreign newspapers, not unnaturally use their literary opportunities for the purpose of proving and illustrating their national superiority to their enemies. As they justly boast, they make fortunes in trade; they attend with praiseworthy solicitude to popular education; and in all respects they furnish a contrast to the characteristic immobility of the Turks. They are also, probably, adepts in the science of logic, but they have not succeeded in showing that their intellectual superiority entitles them to protection against the consequences of lawless attacks on their neighbours. Neither law nor morality allows a good man, on the strength of his virtues, to rob and murder a bad man; and the pretension of scholars to seize the property of dunces is still more indefensible. The aggressive patriotism which inspires Greek residents in Western Europe is not universally cherished at home. Many of the ablest public servants of the Porte, of Greek race and religion, prefer, for the present at least, the government of the SULTAN to the corruption and anarchy of Athens. If the obstinacy of the Greek Government after all forces on a war, the sympathy of England will not be with the aggressors.

THE ELECTION PETITIONS.

THE decision at Bradford is one of the most important that have yet been given, for Mr. Baron MARTIN in an elaborate judgment attempted to lay down the general doctrines of law with regard to bribery and treating. This will be of the utmost service to future candidates, for the most honest man may find his election upset by the rashness or even the mistakes of his agents; and if it can but be understood what may, and what may not, be done, candidates who mean to play a fair game will be able to say exactly what their agents may and what they may not do. For the future a much greater control will be exercised over the operations of agents than heretofore, and candidates will have to make it one of their chief tasks to know as nearly as possible what their agents are doing. With regard to bribery the law is tolerably clear, or at least it seems moderately intelligible, which is saying a good deal for any piece of law embodied in a modern Act of Parliament. If the candidate, or any of his agents, with or without his knowledge, gives money to any elector in order to obtain a vote, the candidate is ipso facto from that moment disqualified, and cannot possibly be elected. If, after he has been elected, he or any of his agents give money to reward a person for having voted for him, and this payment is made corruptly—that is, with an evil intent—his election will, on proof of the fact, be set aside. This is the law as laid down by Mr. Baron MARTIN, and it practically comes to this, that a candidate will lose his seat if he or his agents either give a voter money beforehand to induce him to vote, or afterwards give him money corruptly to reward him for having voted. But in what cases money could be given after an election to reward a voter, without its being given corruptly, is not quite clear, although nothing can seem clearer than the language used by the Judge. He said that, in all cases of money given after the election, the other side must prove an evil intention on the part of the giver of the money. But supposing a candidate, after having been elected, sent for a hundred of his supporters and gave them five pounds apiece, and there was no evidence to show that any of these men knew beforehand that the bonus was coming to them, or that the candidate gave it in order to make his seat safe on a subsequent occasion, would the act be perfectly legal, or would the Judge be at liberty to infer an evil intent from the character of the act? Mr. Baron MARTIN certainly said that the evil intent must be proved, not inferred; but until the case has actually arisen and received a judicial interpretation, it seems hazardous to assume that evil intentions can never be inferred from the mere fact that large sums of money are paid after an election to poor voters. But extreme cases are not likely to occur, and it is perhaps more useful to inquire what would happen in probable cases. If an employer of labourers who was the agent of a candidate told his men beforehand that they might vote as they pleased, but that he intended to raise the wages of all who voted for his friend, he would indisputably invalidate the election. But if, after the election was over, he called his men together and said that he had not interfered sooner because he wished them to exercise an independent judgment, but that now he wished to befriend the supporters of his friend, and would give a shilling a week more to all those who had voted on his side, would that be legal? We think that, according to the doctrine laid down at Bradford, it certainly would be legal, and yet such a proceeding would do as much as anything could do to demoralize a constituency. But the law cannot pursue a man's conduct into all its ramifications, and it is difficult to see how anything like evil intent can be proved by an employer raising the wages of those workmen whom he prefers. And, if he may raise wages for political reasons, he may reduce them. He may tell his hands that those who have voted the right way shall have a shilling a week more, and those who have voted the wrong way shall have a shilling a week less. At the next election this would produce its natural fruit. He would tell his men that he was going to vote for SMITH, while they were at perfect liberty to vote for SMITH or JONES as they pleased. But the men would know, from past experience, that it would make the difference of two shillings a week to them according as they voted in one way or the other, and they would thus feel themselves practically under a pressure to vote for SMITH which it would need much courage to resist.

If the employers who so acted were never in any sense agents of any candidate, but merely distributed wages as they pleased in order to promote the success of the political party to which they belonged, no election could be affected. Employers, however, naturally lean, not to bribery, but to intimidation. They wish to attain their object as cheaply as possible, and it seems simpler, and promises to cost less, to let it be known that, if their men vote the wrong way, they will be dismissed, or will have their wages reduced. The end thus attained by the operation of fear, without any inducement by way of reward being added. Intimidation is the weapon that comes handiest to manufacturers who are hot political partisans. That intimidation has been largely practised in many boroughs at the recent elections is a matter of common notoriety; and there can be no doubt that it was practised at Westbury. It is premature at present to comment on the Westbury case, for the decision has not yet been given. But the evidence adduced on behalf of the sitting member is quite sufficient to show that large numbers of men have been turned out of their employment because they did not vote as their master wished. So much has this been the case that an association has been formed, as it is alleged, to protect them from beggary until they can get work elsewhere. Whether the threat of dismissal made by an agent of a candidate will invalidate the election of that candidate, supposing the agency is proved, is the point to be decided at Westbury; and we will not anticipate the decision. But it is evident that exactly the same threats might have been made by persons who took care not to become agents, and that the manufacturers, whether agents or not, might have waited till after the election, and have then proceeded to punish those who voted the wrong way. If this precedent was established, the election could not be invalidated, nor could any future election be invalidated provided the employers, if agents, took care not to say anything of what they were going to do, but left it to be inferred from past experience. Practically, it would come to this, that manufacturers who were fierce political partisans could determine election after election by bribery or intimidation, or both, without the law being in any way able to touch them or to deprive them of their political success. This is a great evil, and it is to meet this evil that the cry for the Ballot has arisen so strongly in the last few months. Formerly the Ballot was demanded as a protection for tenants against landlords. But it is not on behalf of tenants that it is now asked nearly so much as on behalf of artisans against manufacturers. The manufacturer can act much more rapidly and decisively against his workmen than an owner of land can against his tenants. Nor is it at all true that those dismissed by one manufacturer who is a Conservative will be employed by another who is a Liberal. In many small boroughs there are two or three large factories belonging to members of the same family, and the rest are on a much smaller scale, and cannot take on extra hands at a moment'snotice. The owners even of large factories may not be able to take on new hands, and so many manufactures require special training that a discharged hand who just knows one little piece of manufacturing knowledge may very probably see no hope of employment if he migrates. He is in a worse position than that of a tenant who, when the term of his tenancy is over, is driven out of his holding for acting contrary to the wishes of his landlord. The working-classes feel this, and they feel it bitterly. We have put political power in their hands, and, if they choose to use it, they will have their own way. They have been stung by the tyranny exercised over them in some boroughs at the late election. They think that the Ballot is the only safeguard they have against constant political oppression for the future. It is no use shutting our eyes to the facts of current political history. Manufacturers have a power of determining elections which is quite enough to prevent the free suffrage of artisans, and some of them have shown at the last elections that they will use this power unsparingly. The suffrage has been given to men who, without the Ballot, are at the mercy of masters who will show them no mercy. It is perfectly certain that, if this intimidation goes on, the Ballot will be forced on Parliament, and, bad as the remedy is, the disease is worse. The arguments against the Ballot appear to us to preponderate over those for it, and the greatest of the arguments against it is that, by appealing to the better instincts and principles of men, we may bring about a healthier state of things, whereas by secret voting we can only frustrate their evil intentions; and the last elections showed that, among the great owners of land there has generally sprung up a sense of political honour, and they put less pressure on their tenants than they ever did before. It is quite conceivable that in a few years a landlord who coerced his tenants might injure himself in the social opinion of his equals and neighbours, and it would be far better that political liberty should be brought about in this way than by the rude contrivance of the Ballot. In the same way it would be much better that manufacturers should be shamed out of turning men who vote the wrong way into the streets, than that the men should be protected by the Ballot; but unless the manufacturers are wise in time the Ballot will certainly be demanded as the inevitable supplement of the new Reform Bill.

Mr. Baron MARTIN laid down the law with regard to treating as well as to bribery; and it is practically much more important to know what treating is than to know what bribery is, for it is easy to understand that money must on no account and under no pretence be given to a voter, but it is not so easy to understand when a candidate may pay for the beer drunk by other people. The law is that a candidate may pay for refreshments consumed by his supporters to an amount reasonable according to their station, and to the occasions on which they exert themselves, provided that he does not do this with any evil intention, or with a view to being elected. We do not see that there could be any evil intention which would not be contained in a design to be elected, and so, although the Judge used the expressions as if they might mean different things, it may perhaps be assumed that they have the same meaning. If, therefore, a candidate gives refreshments to his supporters, who he knows are sure to support him whether he gives them refreshments or not, he is quite safe. He may pay the bills of his Committee for such refreshments as they can properly consume while engaged in their work. This was the precise point decided in Mr. FORSTER'S case. It is not giving refreshments that will unseat a candidate, but giving refreshments in order to be elected. Mr. RIPLEY lost his seat because he had given refreshments to any one who liked to partake of them. He had kept open a vast number of public-houses. He had spent more than seven thousand pounds in doing so. It was impossible, as the Judge thought, that this vast sum should have been spent merely to provide certain supporters with moderate refreshment. It is not necessary in such a case to prove that refreshments were given to any particular person to induce him to vote, but the general evil intention—the wish to be elected by offering refreshments lavishly and indiscriminately—is inferred from the acts of opening many public-houses and spending much money. Mr. Baron MARTIN, however, went further. He held that if an agent of a candidate invites a wavering voter to come to a public-house, and then stands a moderate amount of beer, just to wet the discussion, but not to make the waverer decide in his favour by the inducement of the beer, then he has had no evil intention, and has not violated the law. Further, he invented a test eminently favourable to those accused of treating. An agent who treats corruptly exposes himself to a penalty of 50*l.* Mr. Baron MARTIN said that, in order to decide whether an alleged case of treating was such as to invalidate the election, he should ask himself whether the evidence adduced would make him return a verdict of guilty, supposing he were sitting on the jury and the agent were indicted. Certainly the Judges have done nothing to encourage petitions, unless brought forward on very strong grounds. As was said both at Lichfield and at Warrington, the Judge will treat the return as a serious thing not to be put aside lightly, and hitherto more petitions have failed than have succeeded, and many, it may be surmised, will be withdrawn now that it is more clearly understood what must be established in order to make success probable.

AMERICA.

THE great and increasing prosperity of the United States proves that a country possessing unlimited land and an industrious population can afford to dispense with legislative wisdom and with administrative honesty. The addition of five millions to the number of inhabitants since the census of 1860 far more than compensates for the losses caused by a mischievous tariff, and by a perverse depreciation of the national credit. The Empire of Brazil is as large as the United States, and probably it contains even greater material resources; but it is inhabited by inferior or degenerate races, and the climate is not for the most part tempting to European immigrants. The great Republic of the North, like a wealthy spendthrift, presumes on its advantages with comparative impunity. No small State could afford to be ruled by the politicians who are thought good enough for Congress. Americans generally express in private a sincere contempt for the House of Representatives, and for some of the most prominent members of the Senate; and they never seem to understand that a great community can be any way compromised by the character of its chosen rulers. In a speech lately delivered in the House, Mr. BUTLER recommended the permanent adoption of an irredeemable paper currency, on the ground that coins had first been invented and stamped by despots some thousands of years ago. On another occasion Mr. BANKS proposed the establishment of an American Protectorate in Hayti and San Domingo, although there was no allegation that any party in either the French or the Spanish section of the island desired foreign interference. Mr. BUTLER moved as an amendment that the PRESIDENT should be authorized to extend the Protectorate to any or all of the West India Islands, on the demand of the Government or of the people. As it was scarcely likely that the European Powers which hold possessions in the West Indies would apply for American protection, the amendment practically contained a promise of aid to possible rebels, and more especially to the actual insurgents in Cuba. The French Convention in 1793 was to a certain extent consistent in offering assistance to any nation which might desire to liberate itself from its existing Government, but Mr. BUTLER simply offers, in a time of profound peace, to annex the territories of friendly neighbours on the first occasion. Another representative moved a further amendment, which was intended to include the Sandwich Islands; and finally, a Fenian member from New York demanded that Ireland should share in the benefit of the Protectorate. As the House finally shelved the motion and the amendments, it may be said that the folly and insolence of the speakers were harmless; yet it must be remembered that the chief offenders are leading members of the dominant party, and that in a long debate no opponent rose to rebuke them. Mr. BANKS is Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House; Mr. BUTLER was the principal manager of the impeachment, and he has since been returned to the next Congress by a large majority for an electoral district in Massachusetts. When brawling and dishonest demagogues are allowed to occupy high places, the discredit attaching to their language and conduct is not confined to themselves. The habitual indifference of the people of the United States to personal qualification was oddly illustrated during the war by the appointment both of Mr. BUTLER and of Mr. BANKS to high military commands. The scandalous incompetence exhibited by both has apparently not in any way affected the popularity of either politician.

Notwithstanding the statistics and the reasoning of Mr. WELLS, both Houses have been busily employed in imposing prohibitive duties on imports. It happens that certain copper-mines in Michigan are not at present prospering; and to relieve the shareholders, who have probably not failed to purchase support at Washington, Congress has raised the duty on copper by 300 per cent. The only opponents of the measure in the Upper House were some Senators from New England, who were justly taunted with inconsistency in refusing to Western mines the protection which is enjoyed by Eastern factories. Mr. SUMNER at last endeavoured to tack on the Bill a clause for the further protection of some New England fabrics; but ultimately the copper miners obtained an unmixed triumph. One of the speakers in the debate stated that American ships are forced to sail to some foreign port before they are sheathed with copper; but the manufacturers of New England and Pennsylvania have a strong interest in bribing the Western States to support protection. As Mr. WELLS justly argued, the products of one kind of manufacture are the raw materials of another; so that the existing tariff frequently operates as a special burden on domestic industry. It would perhaps not have been prudent to dwell on the injustice to the consumer who is forced to pay a heavy tribute to his producing neighbour. The interests of the community at large are never considered where the rudiments of political economy are unknown. It is almost a subject for regret that America is not in need of foreign wheat; for the threatened importation of a single cargo of grain would inevitably be followed by a protective corn law which would reproduce the obsolete policy of England. There is already a heavy duty on foreign wool; but, according to one of the speakers in the Senate, the wool-producers have not received a corresponding benefit. In dealing with this article, Mr. WELLS, according to his customary rule, abstained from urging on Congress the hardship imposed on the not inconsiderable class which requires coats and trousers; but he ventured to suggest that there were more tailors and slop-makers than sheep-farmers, and that the protective duty on wool counteracted the protective duty on clothes. The administration of milk instead of strong meat to babes in economic science is a proof of Mr. WELLS's sagacity. His report may perhaps gradually effect some modification in public opinion; but as long as the producers watch with their usual vigilance over the lobbies, there will be no change in the legislation of Congress. At some remote period the Western farmers will probably discover that they receive scarcely any portion of the subsidy which their representatives extract from the American consumer for the relief of all who produce what might be better produced elsewhere. In the meantime the evil is mitigated by the wide extent of territory which is uninterrupted by any Customs frontier. The annexation of Cuba, if sooner or later it is accomplished, will practically repeal the resolution which gives a monopoly to the copper of Lake Superior. The copper ore of Cuba is better and cheaper; and if the island were once made a part of the Union its products could be no longer excluded. The desire for aggrandisement would, if the question arose, prevail over the love of protection, especially as some Northern patriots would rejoice to inflict an additional blow on the sugar-planters of Louisiana.

The indefinite extension of the territory of the Union would mitigate the evils of a bad tariff, but it would dilute and adulterate the character of the American people. It is doubtful whether the Constitution will survive the infusion of three or four millions of negroes into the ruling body; and Cuba would add another unmanageable mass of Spanish Creoles and of liberated slaves. There are uncertain rumours of negotiations with Mexico for a cession of territory in discharge of unsettled claims. If such a cession involved a transfer of allegiance by any large number of Mexicans, the transaction would not be ultimately beneficial to the United States. The American people, happily for themselves, have been scarcely sensible that they were governed; and the Federal authority was more imperceptible than the power of the State. Their indifference to the character and competence of statesmen and Legislatures is partially explained by the insignificance of the functions of the Government; and the same excuse may be offered for the reckless admission of incapable negroes to the enjoyment of the suffrage. Nevertheless it will be impossible to convert Cubans or Mexicans into Republicans capable of administering their own affairs with regularity and vigour. If the BANKSES and BUTLERS succeeded in appropriating the West Indian islands, including Hayti, the Government would have to choose between the admission of a semi-barbarous population to equality and the institution of some form of colonial administration which would be incompatible with the spirit of the Constitution. The Union has extended itself from the Atlantic to the Pacific by the voluntary movement of a population which, notwithstanding a large admixture of immigrants from Northern Europe, was sufficiently homogeneous. If countries inhabited by inferior races are to be annexed, the system which has been found successful must be largely modified. The history of South America during the last half-century sufficiently proves that the most symmetrical Constitutions fail to confer freedom and order on turbulent and half-civilized communities. There can be little doubt that American statesmen are aware of the danger and inconvenience which might be caused by the indulgence of ambitious designs; but the debate in the House of Representatives shows that politicians think it worth while to affect sympathy with the unscrupulous projects which are known under the cant name of "manifest destiny." The enormous amount of empty talk which is customary in the United States sometimes misleads foreigners who still cherish an old-fashioned prejudice in favour of decent reserve.

THE WAR-OFFICE IMBROGLIO.

NO outward sign has yet been given of Mr. CARDWELL's progress in the reorganization of the department which has been handed over to him in a state of almost hopeless confusion. If the interval—already considerable—that has elapsed since the change of Government has been spent by the War Minister in mastering the difficulties of his position, and preparing the way for a reconstitution of his office on a more rational basis than has ever yet been laid down, the time may not have been thrown away, however small the immediate fruits may be. Whether this is or is not the case remains a profound mystery, notwithstanding the jubilant announcements invented some time since by the military organs, that the generals had triumphed, and that all the finance of the army, including the preparation of the Estimates, was henceforth to be entrusted to the same military hands by which the supplies are distributed and the money spent. There is no reason to suspect that Mr. CARDWELL has done anything so mad as this; but, on the other hand, no indication has yet been vouchsafed to the public of any definite step for the restoration of the financial control exercised over the army by civilian and Parliamentary officials for more than a century, until it was undermined by the military manœuvres which culminated in the appointment of Sir HENRY STORKS. Our military contemporaries have been very angry with us, and with other journals who have adopted our phrase, for designating this long-continued movement by the title of the Horse Guards Plot but, until Mr. CARDWELL recognises the fact that such a plot is always in existence for the purpose of supplanting civilian by military control, he will not have gone far towards the solution of the problem he has taken in hand. The exultation with which the premature announcement was made that Sir HENRY STORKS had got hold of the Estimates was only one of many plain intimations that the leading idea of all the recent modifications was the exaltation of the military element into supreme authority over the civilian departments that had previously controlled it. There are very many soldiers, and one civilian, who think this a desirable consummation to aim at; but while Lord ELCHO and his army friends loudly proclaim the imminent success of a revolution which shall transfer army government and army finance into the uncontrolled hands of general officers, it is little puzzling to be told by other friends of the movement that it is a mere delusion to suppose that any such project has ever been hatched. In truth the plot is nothing new. It is easy to trace the course of its sappers incessantly working and mining for years and years, and the only peculiarity of the present moment is that the energy of the attack has been redoubled in consequence of the advance which it has made while the defence of constitutional authority was left in the feeble hands of Mr. CARDWELL'S predecessor And not only is it nothing new, but it is nothing surprising. So long as the dual government subsists, so long will the Horse Guards Plot be an inevitable element in our system of army administration. Until civilian control is either made supreme over military government, or trampled under foot by it, there must be a perpetual struggle for mastery, open or disguised, between the two competing rivals for administrative power. Soldiers as naturally wish for one termination of the contest as thoughtful politicians do for the other, and we are not sure that even the triumph of the wrong side would not be preferable to the disorganization that results from the subterranean tactics by which the nominal supremacy of the Parliamentary Minister is continually being undermined

In the near relations which exist between the executive head of the Army and the Throne it has been supposed that any reformer would find a grave source of embarrassment; but this is an entire delusion. No appeal would be needed to the sound constitutional principles which have always governed the conduct of HER MAJESTY, for no one who ever held the command in chief has acknowledged more frankly than the Duke of CAMBRIDGE, that the War Minister ought to be supreme, and that the proper function of the Commander-in-Chief is to act as his principal adviser in military matters. The Horse Guards plotters are much more zealous for soldier-supremacy than the Head of the Horse Guards has ever shown himself to be. That the time has come for the reorganization of the War Department with an unflinching regard to sound principles of administration and to nothing else, we are profoundly convinced; and if Mr. CARDWELL appreciates the importance of the crisis, it is no wonder that he should pause to mature his plans before committing himself to definite action. If, on the other hand, he shrinks from the plain duty before him, and limits his aspirations to that heaven of feeble Ministers—a plausible compromise sufficient to last his time—he may well hesitate before choosing between conflicting schemes which differ only in being more or less ephemeral and inefficient. Still there are modes and degrees of temporizing, and a Minister who is content with merely staving off the day of decisive action may, by one course, transmit the difficulty to his successors not much more formidable than he found it himself, while by another he may so aggravate the confusion as to leave it almost remediless, except by a reform little short of revolution.

If Mr. CARDWELL reflects on what has been done since the days when we had an efficient army-ruler on the permanent staff in Sir BENJAMIN HAWES, he will see that these are no fanciful apprehensions, and that if he does not set himself resolutely to unweave the web that has been so covertly woven by military hands since the commencement of the Crimean war, he will, however reluctantly, find himself a passive instrument of the party whose object, sometimes disclaimed and sometimes avowed, is to create such a self-governing army as has never existed in this country since the days when Kings were generals, and Army Ministers their unquestioning servants.

The most superficial glance at the present and past organization of the War Office affords conclusive evidence of the great change that is in progress. What did Mr. CARDWELL find when he first entered his new office? He met first a general officer enjoying the dignity of Under-Secretary of State, who had been selected originally to advise on military technicalities, and to perform some of those duties towards the Minister which the Commander-in-Chief would discharge if, instead of being established in anomalous independence, he were made the first executive officer under the Secretary of State. On inquiring for the next biggest official, Mr. CARDWELL would find pointed out to him another general officer with newer trappings, but with nominally equal, and perhaps really superior power, who goes by the name of Controller-in Chief; and he would learn that this distinguished officer, with the aid of a third general, takes under his charge the supply of all the requirements of the army, and aspires to the command of the auditors who are supposed to check his expenditure, an to the management of the finance and the preparation of the Estimates, which have never before been committed to any but civilian hands. Having received the homage of these great subordinates, Mr. CARDWELL would next be invited to look upon a civilian of lower rank, still nominally enjoying the title of Assistant Under-Secretary, whose shadowy function it would be impossible to describe, if it were really true that the Controller had absorbed all the offices he thirsted for. An interesting relic of an obsolete régime, when Parliament really asserted its authority over army finance, this powerless officer would stand as the modern equivalent of the once omnipotent BENJAMIN HAWES, and of the earlier series of Secretaries-at War, in whose time not a shilling was allowed to be spent without the Parliamentary Minister knowing the reason why and knowing it from the information, not of the soldiers who spent it, but of watchful civilians, whose duty it was to keep extravagance in check, and who did it by judicious organization, and not by merely cutting down troops and stores, leaving the void to be filled up at double expense in future years. These three officers are the authorities through whom the Minister has now to work.

Now, look at the picture of an earlier time, immediately after the consolidation, as it was called, which was attempted at the time of the Crimean war. The Minister for War of that day found his office ruled, not by two generals competing for the first place, but by one permanent officer, who swayed the whole machine. This was the Deputy Secretary-at-War—a civilian trained in the House of Commons to constitutional principles. Perhaps some "HIPPOPHYLAX" may add, with a sneer, that he was a metropolitan member and an ex-soapboiler. The fact was so, and it was also the fact that no permanent officer had ever governed the army with the authority, skill, and judgment displayed by Sir BENJAMIN HAWES In spite of the complication of the dual government, there was in his day no successful encroachment on the functions of the civilian chief of army administration. The next officer was another civilian, the Assistant-Under-Secretary, who had the sole control of finance and of the Estimates, subject to the directions of the Deputy Secretary-at-War. These were the two great offices of the permanent staff, and of them the first has disappeared, and the second, deprived of the support of a civilian chief, seems to retain no function that is not coveted (and, if our army friends prophesy truly, already on the point of being appropriated) by the Military Controller. A third officer, of inferior grade, completed the higher staff. This was the soldier Secretary for Military Correspondence, a subordinate makeshift appointment devised to stop the gap occasioned by the severance between the Horse Guards and the War Office. This is the same office which has now developed into that of Under-Secretary, and which, together with the newly devised Controllership-in-Chief, absorbs all the powers that were once so vigorously wielded by Sir BENJAMIN HAWES.

We cannot within our limits trace the successive steps by which the War Office has been thus transformed. Neither is it necessary to dwell on the means by which what is really a revolution in military administration has been brought about. The result speaks for itself. The two great civilian offices that governed all are shrunk into one subordinate office of secondary rank and precarious authority; the one insignificant military office is somehow or other dilated into first-class proportions, and yet another high military office is added in which all civilian functions are rapidly being merged. And let it be especially observed, that these results have not been attained by the mere personal substitution of soldiers for civilians in any particular posts. That would be temporary, and of small importance. But the civilian functions have been insidiously tacked on to the military offices, so as permanently to exclude for the future all civilian interference. And this has been done very skilfully; for care has been taken that each soldier-official to whom financial duties have been transferred should have so much specially professional work to do as to preserve his powers for all time as the exclusive property of a military clique. We do not complain of the appointment of military officials, but of the creation of offices marked as military offices, and yet entrusted with the supervision of financial, and therefore of civilian, work. And all this has happened without the House of Commons having the slightest voice in the matter. No fresh scheme of reorganization has been submitted to Parliament, but one Minister after another has half unconsciously made one change after another at the suggestion of his soldier advisers, and military influence has been the power that has silently and steadily worked the transformation. Can any one consider these things and doubt that we rightly spoke of the "Horse Guards' Plot"? And if it has been thus vigorous in the last ten years, it is not the less to be traced, though working under greater difficulties, in still earlier periods. The very unification of departments which took place at the beginning of the Crimean war was a secret triumph, both in what it left undone and in what it did, for those who were manœuvring for military predominance; and it was so, first, because it did not unite the Horse Guards with the ordinary Parliamentary organization; and secondly, because in bringing together the functions of the Secretary-at-War and those of the Secretary for the Colonies and War, it took all the financial powers which had till then been vested in a purely civilian ministry, and handed them over to a mixed department which, as the event has shown, was not, like its predecessor, proof against military sapping and mining.

All these things have no doubt been duly pondered by Mr. CARDWELL. If he thinks that the military encroachments of the last ten years have improved the organization of his office, he will only have to do nothing, and he will soon drift without effort into the grand consummation of army self-government, and will find himself a helpless puppet in the hands of a staff of generals. If he takes a different view, and desires to restore the civilian control to the vigour which it displayed under Sir BENJAMIN HAWES, he has a rather arduous and tedious campaign to fight, and can only hope at last for the imperfect sort of success which always attends half-measures. If he has the courage to face the whole difficulty, to sweep away every anomaly, and reconstruct his office on the basis of Parliamentary supremacy, he may reckon on one sharp struggle, followed by an increase in the efficiency and genuine economy of our army organization, for which his name will long be remembered among the best and boldest of our statesmen. But, unfortunately, administrative genius is not common, and reforming courage is rare among men in high office, and we are still left in doubt whether Mr. CARDWELL can rise to the height of the situation.

FRANCE.

IT is quite natural that the French Government should wish the present Session to close without a debate upon its internal policy. When a general election is impending, the speeches of the Opposition orators become of unusual importance. At other times they may be unpleasant to listen to, but when that little annoyance is over there is nothing more to fear. The division lists in the Corps Législatif might easily be made up beforehand. Just now, however, the opportunities of mischief are not exhausted quite so soon. Once in five years even a French Deputy gets the chance of speaking to the country, and not merely to a packed and obedient Chamber. In May next every French elector will be thinking to whom he shall give his vote, and though in many cases the force of circumstances will decide the question for him, still the mere fact that he has a vote to give must tend to interest him in the proceedings of the Assembly in the reconstruction of which he will shortly bear an infinitesimal part. It follows, therefore, that if M. THIERS or M. JULES FAVRE were to get possession of the tribune, they would be sure of a very much larger audience than they can commonly count on. In many parts of France the apathy or the contentment of the population is such that no amount of indictments against the Government would make the least difference in the election. But that there is an increasing number of constituencies not thus happily circumstanced is shown, not only by the isolated victories of Opposition candidates, but by the large minorities which they have gained even in districts where the Government has been successful. Under these circumstances, anything in the nature of a damaging exposure must, in common prudence, be avoided, and so far M. ROUHER's anxiety that the demand for an interpellation on internal policy should be burked in the preliminary Committees needs no explanation. M. PINARD's reign at the Ministry of the Interior was too fruitful in mischances to make the subject at all a safe one three months before the elections. Unfortunately, to follow a natural impulse is not always the wisest course. There are many occurrences which it may be very important to prevent without its being for that reason safe to prevent them at all hazards. For once, M. ROUHER seems to have forgotten this. A demand for an interpellation must be authorized by at least four out of the nine Committees of the Corps Législatif, and in this case the demand had only succeeded in three. But in two out of the six the votes had been equally divided. Those who had voted for the interpellation contended that a second vote should be taken, but in both cases the Presidents ruled that a tie was equivalent to a refusal. A motion was then made in the Chamber itself to remit the demand to the two Committees, in order that the vote might be repeated. This was hotly opposed by M. ROUHER, and on a division the Government could only obtain a majority of 12, half of whom were Imperial chamberlains, in a house of 216. This amazing indiscretion on the part of the Minister of State has created the largest minority ever arrayed against the Government in the Corps Législatif. M. ROUHER might have used what pressure he liked to secure the vote he wanted in committee, and no harm have come of it. But openly to show that he feared the result of a second trial was to entail on the Government he represented no inconsiderable part of the inconvenience he was so eager to avert. The significance of the division itself, indeed, has probably been overrated. People have argued that, if 102 Deputies can show this amount of independence just before an election, what will they do when they are secure in their seats for a term of years? It would be nearer the truth to infer that it is the approach of an election which has induced them to assume this independent attitude. On these occasions a Deputy has not only a Government to please; he must also think a little of his constituents. To stand well with the latter may often greatly improve his position with the former. A prudent Prefect will not be content with the return of the official candidate; he will endeavour to get him returned by as large a majority as possible. Some small display of independence on the part of a Deputy now may secure a good many wavering or indifferent votes which would otherwise have been given to the Opposition, or not given at all. On this ground it may easily be the part of true prudence to take the electors as well as the Government into account in determining how to act during this short final Session; and the man who is found voting against M. ROUHER in January may have returned to his normal obedience by June. His constituents will then be safely at his back, while front of him will again be a paternal Government with its accustomed supply of prizes for good children.

The essence, therefore, of M. ROUHER's mistake was not that he ventured upon a vote which proved to be so very close, but that he allowed himself to provoke either the debate or the division. It is this which has enabled the Opposition to charge the Executive with shrinking from the legitimate discussion of its own acts. He should have left the Corps Législatif to decide the question for itself, and aimed at preserving an ostentatious indifference as to which way the decision went. If this exhibition of equanimity was beyond his strength, he might at least have rested his opposition to the motion on purely technical grounds. Some Parliamentary precedent might have been disinterred, and made to support an argument that a tie always does mean that a demand is rejected. Instead of this, M. ROUHER went at once into the merits of the proposed interpellation. He did not disguise that, if he had liked the substance of it better, he would not have objected to the vote of the two Committees being again taken. The line he adopted laid him completely open to a very telling attack from M. THIERS. How, asked the Minister of State, can the Chamber discuss anything so general as the internal policy of the Government? If any Deputy wishes to challenge our conduct in respect of the press or of public meetings, or on any other defined subject, we are ready to meet him, but we will not plead to an indictment which specifies no particulars. The answer was obvious. If this excuse is to be allowed, the policy of the Government as a whole must for ever escape discussion. The general direction given to the affairs of the country is a distinct and separate matter from the course pursued on any particular question. The same men may approve the one and disapprove the other. The right of interpellation was substituted for the debate on the Address; and if it is now to be reduced to a simple permission to put a particular question to the Government, it is a substitute which wholly fails to answer the same purpose. For, as M. THIERS pointed out, if any Deputy attempted to make a particular interpellation of the text for a disquisition on the general policy of the Empire, the Minister of State would at once charge him with wandering from the question, and invoke M. SCHNEIDER's authority to put him down. It is easy to foresee the use to which this incident will be turned by independent candidates of all shades during the approaching canvass. Nor can the authorities easily make their reference to it the occasion for a charge of faction. If only a small number had voted against M. ROUHER, this no doubt would have been attempted. But when just half the Corps Législatif are found on the Opposition side, the most devoted Prefect must forbear to abuse a minority which was largely made up of the EMPEROR's friends.

Although the Government dislikes being questioned its general internal policy, it has vouchsafed to reassure its Conservative supporters on the subject of the socialist meetings which have lately been held in Paris. That property, religion, and family ties should be openly attacked by extreme democratic speakers is so obviously beneficial to the Empire which claims to be the one power competent to protect society from the practical consequences of such doctrines, that we need not wonder at the exceptional immunity conceded to these demonstrations. If there is anything unintelligible in the action of the authorities, it is the determination announced by M. BAROCHE of at once putting the law into execution against them. Perhaps however the explanation is, that some consideration has to be shown to timid friends. If M. DE BENOIST's terrors were suffered to go beyond a certain point, he might cease to worship that Imperial providence which has hitherto made his mind easy and his sleep sound. Nor is it improbable that the meetings in question have not been quite popular enough to serve the turn of the Government. They are described as having been attended by very small audiences, and addressed by very few speakers, and those men of no note. It may be that the authorities would have been better pleased if they had assumed more formidable dimensions and enlisted more important supporters. Not one of the deputies of Paris—declared democrats as some of them are—have been present at them, or taken any part in promoting them. It is by no means desirable for the Imperial purposes that the respectable classes should realize that there is a broad and plainly marked distinction between such men as M. PELLETAN, or M. JULES FAVRE, and the obscure demagogues who rave against religion and decency. M. BAROCHE would doubtless have liked to see these widely removed sections of the democratic party confounded under a common censure, and regarded with a common dread. As he has not been able to achieve this object, it is as well to make a little capital with the ultra-Conservatives of the Corps Législatif by lending a gracious ear to their nervous invocations.

THE NEW CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF POLICE.

It is not often that a deputation to a Cabinet Minister elicits an announcement of official patronage or official intentions. In this respect the deputation which waited upon Mr. BRUCE last Wednesday had an advantage over many others. It reaped the triple benefit of expounding its own ideas, learning those of the HOME SECRETARY, and hastening the publication of Colonel HENDERSON's appointment. This last news had been circulated for some days in private circles, and hardly took the world by surprise. The hope that it may realize all the good which the HOME SECRETARY augurs from it is not diminished by the fact that it hardly coincides with the wishes of Professor MARKS's deputation. To these gentlemen it seemed a strange and terrible thing that a person who was to command a brigade of 8,000 men, distribute their posts, regulate their reliefs, and superintend their patrols, should be a military officer. The "common sense of most" will probably find its best assurance of the goodness of the selection in the ingenious perversity of a metropolitan deputation. But though it is often sufficient to draw inferences from the arguments of bad logicians, there are grounds for approving of this choice quite distinct from the objections of those who dislike it. It is quite true that Colonel HENDERSON has the misfortune to belong to a profession the higher ranks of which are familiar with the duties of authority, method, arrangement, and punctuality. Some folks, too, will deem it a greater misfortune that he belongs to a scientific corps. But this disqualification the general public may perhaps consider to be neutralized—his opponents may regard it as strengthened—by his recent civil appointments. It was Colonel HENDERSON who for thirteen years was at the head of the convict establishment in Western Australia, and who for the last eight years has presided over the Directorate of Convict Prisons in England. Professor MARKS and his friends may perhaps argue that a long intercourse with convicts must have infected his mind with too sympathetic a sentiment towards the subjects of his care. But, until some flagrant instance of partiality has been displayed, we shall be content to believe that a man whose previous career has made him acquainted with the lives and characters of criminals is not wholly unfitted to be placed at the head of the Metropolitan Police. Had he been merely an inspector of convicts, or governor of a convict establishment, it might have been contended that his experience was one-sided, and that his capacity had been sharpened in one direction, only to be blunted in another. This objection is adequately met by the fact that, though long engaged in civil duties, Colonel HENDERSON has never ceased to be a soldier, and that the lessons which an officer learns early, both of obedience and of command, cling to him throughout life. These two qualifications — his original profession and his recent experience—are patent to the world. Sensible people will accept them as primâ facie claims to an appointment which requires habits of authority, discipline, and method. And sensible people will, until the contrary is proved, be ready to believe that he possesses other and personal qualifications not less requisite for his new office; that he is neither a vain, nor a garrulous, nor what the Americans call a "gassy" man, not one who talks too much of his doings, or who looks rather to a transient popularity than to his own conscience for the reward of his services. If with his professional and official experience Colonel HENDERSON combines discretion, discrimination, and reserve, Mr. AUSTIN BRUCE will have done much to atone for his hasty and ill-considered commutation of BISGROVE's sentence by giving to the Metropolis a good Chief of Police.

It was not to be expected that any deputation which waited upon a Secretary of State would fail to profit by the opportunity of discoursing on much collateral matter. In this instance the matter of the discourse was quite germane to the object of the interview, and we cannot say that the words of the deputation were without weight and relevancy. While we entirely disagree with the proposition that 8,000 is too large an aggregate police force for a capital which already contains 3,200,000 people, and bids fair within ten years to contain four millions, we are obliged to confirm the statement that the moral is quite disproportionate to the physical strength of the police. With 8,000 defenders, London ought to feel secure against the alarms of normal violence and pillage. Such infractions of law as are known to most and experienced by many of us ought to be either impossible or exceptional. It ought not to be possible that, in a long, populous, and frequented street, houses should be entered by means of ladders between six and eight in the evening, two or three rooms stripped of their most valuable contents, and the thieves get away with the same ease, safety, and celerity, with which they entered. It ought not to be possible for a man to go up to a gentleman's house and carry off a pet dog in broad midday; and that a policeman patrolling close to the scene of theft, when appealed to by a spectator, should calmly plead his instructions as an excuse for not interfering. It ought to be impossible to point out showy shops owned by respectable ratepayers, whose principal traffic notoriously consists in the purchase and sale of stolen jewelry. It ought to be impossible to point out in a body of skilled artisans one or two men—"intelligent operatives" and electors of the British Parliament—who are known to combine the profession of crime with their other industry. But these things, which ought to be impossible, are far from being infrequent. They happen, not rarely and exceptionally, but at least every week. In fact, we do not know of the number of cases such as these. Those which attract attention happen in rich and fashionable neighbourhoods, where their occurrence excites interest and ensures publicity. But in poor and remote districts, where the policeman is sometimes an autocrat, and more frequently a victim, cases of deliberate neglect and studied inattention are the rule rather than the exception. Now, it would be unjust to say that either fear or corruption is the invariable cause of this laches. That each has its influence we do not doubt; corruption in the wealthier, and fear in the poorer, districts. But we are persuaded that a policeman's neglect of his prescribed duties is more frequently the effect of ignorance than of fear or corruption. It is inconceivable how ignorant even some of the policemen of the A division are of their primary duties—of everything that concerns street nuisances, information given of theft, and all the applications of the law under which and on behalf of which they are supposed to act. Sometimes this ignorance is further clogged by great stupidity; more frequently it proceeds from carelessness, and sometimes from an utter despair of being able to understand and classify the regulations which are scattered over more than seventy Acts of Parliament. Two remedies for this evil suggest themselves. One is a more frequent supervision of the district stations by the Chief Commissioner, and of the patrols by the Assistant Commissioners. The other is the enlistment of a better and more intelligent class of men in the police. The former remedy depends on the personal energy and example of the chief himself; the other on his influence with the Government of the day. Sir R. MAYNE shirked neither danger nor trouble on great and perilous occasions. But it was his grave and conspicuous fault that he confined his duties mainly to pen-and-ink work in Scotland Yard. This will never do. A chief of police, to know his men thoroughly, and understand the working of the police, must be seen at outposts, and witness the way in which his inspectors perform their duties. There can be no zeal, no energy, without the occasional presence of the chief. As to the enlistment of a better class of constables, that does not entirely depend upon him. All that he can do is to persuade the Government to adopt measures which will make entrance into the force an object of competition to a good and intelligent class of men. At present vestries and deputations grumble at the numerous resignations of the constables, and seem to impute this evil to the Chief of the Police. They might as well accuse him of the unseasonable weather, or of female fashions, or of the taste for music-halls. He has just as much influence in these matters as he has in making the profession of a constable popular. That can only be done by attaching to it the same conditions as induce men to enter other departments of the public service. Let constables be assured of a provision for life when they have ceased to serve, and there will be as little difficulty in obtaining good policemen as there is in obtaining good soldiers, sailors, and clerks. This boon the Chief Commissioner is powerless to confer, but he may be most powerful in procuring it.

There is one point in which Colonel HENDERSON's nomination will be satisfactory to many beside the deputation of last Wednesday. The inhabitants of London have awakened to the consciousness that their metropolis is the Omphalus of the thieves' world. The most accomplished proficients in roguery and villany gravitate to it by a sort of special attraction. The cleverest of convicts air their ticket-of-leave experience under our windows and on our doorsteps. In Paris and Vienna the course of action would be clear enough. A body of detectives would be specially assigned to watch these felonious and burglarious gentry. Their goings out and their comings in would be accurately scrutinized, their residences narrowly watched, their companions dodged, and their apartments entered by the inevitable agents of the Public Force. In this country we cannot do as they do in France and Austria, and there is a popular objection to the express legalization of measures which savour of arbitrary harshness. But most people are convinced that even without an Act of Parliament something more might be done than is now done for repressing the criminal expert. To effectually deal with the ticket-of-leave man, to deter him from going on with his profession, to keep him from corrupting others, and to keep others from associating with him, requires a special knowledge and experience. Such a knowledge is possessed by Colonel HENDERSON. He knows the convict, from the virgin wickedness of his Australian nonage to the full-blooded depravity of his ticket-of-leave maturity. He knows the reclaimable and the irreclaimable; those in whom some spark of virtue still lingers, and those who have lost even the grace of hypocrisy. This knowledge will be of use whether the police be armed with new powers or left only to a wider use of their present powers. And it will be one of the most important duties of the new chief to suggest to the Government such changes in the law as, without offending the prejudices of the people, may empower the police to act efficiently, not only for the arrest of detected criminals, but for the prevention of meditated crime.

THE SPECULATIVE AND LOGICAL MINDS.

MR. LEWES, in a passage of the recent edition of his History of Philosophy, has described with great vigour and substantial correctness, though in a phraseology that appears to us not entirely unexceptionable, the process of the discovery of truth by the human mind. This process, according to him, consists of two parts—first, the "anticipatory rush" of the mind in framing conceptions of what is possible; secondly, the testing of these conceptions by all means in our power, which involves at once the examination of the intelligibility and internal consistency of the conceptions, and the examination of external reality, to see whether that in any way contradicts what we imagine to be the truth. As near as we can recollect, we have here added a little to Mr. Lewes's statement of the process; for, unless we are mistaken, he lays much less emphasis than we should think right to do on the necessity of clearing up our conceptions in themselves, and divesting them of any secret obscurities and ambiguities that may lurk in them—a portion of the process of discovery which can by no means be neglected, and which is quite distinct from the comparison of our conceptions with external reality. However, we do not imagine that Mr. Lewes would materially dissent from our statement of the process.

Speaking broadly, then, the discovery of truth consists of two parts—the imagination or conception of what is possible, and the testing of our imaginations in order to see whether they represent clear and actual truth. Neither of these parts can in any way be dispensed with. At all times there have been men who have imagined without testing, and men who have tested without imagining. The first, however, is mainly the error of an early and immature period; the second, the error of a late and cultivated period. Towards the first inclined such thinkers as Thales and Pythagoras; towards the second, such thinkers as Sir George Cornewall Lewis and Mr. J. S. Mill. But the most productive and efficacious thinker is such a man as Newton, at once so powerful in imagination as to be able to think possibilities that had never before entered the head of man, and so cautious in accepting these possibilities for truths as to lay them by for years because they were thought to contradict some ascertained facts.

It is, however, needless to say that the combination of these qualities is both difficult and rare. In fact, there is a certain antagonism between them. No man can at the same moment fling open his mind to all the imaginations that may crowd into it, and also be busily employed in testing the truth of these imaginations. The same man may at different times feel both these impulses to the highest extent, but not at one and the same time. And hence, in most men, one of these impulses habitually predominates, and the other is only admitted casually and at intervals. Thus, not to speak of men of remote times, Mr. Ruskin has the imaginative faculty in a very high degree, but cannot be said to have the logical faculty, or the faculty of testing, in more than a slight measure; while Mr. Mill, as we have said, is at precisely the opposite pole. Again, the speculative faculty, of which Mr. Darwin and Sir Charles Lyell have so large a measure, is not fundamentally different from the imaginative faculty; in both there is the same throwing open of the mind, the same spirit of search, of waiting until the desired truth shall arise before the inward vision; only imaginative minds, as we commonly use the word, have their desire bent on the more vivid sensuous reality, speculative minds on the broader intellectual conception. And thus, in the classification of thinkers, we should put Mr. Darwin on the same side as Mr. Ruskin, and over against Voltaire and Hume and Mr. Mill; for though it would be very unjust to Mr. Darwin to speak of him as deficient in logical ability, it is not his logic that has gained for him his great reputation, but his speculative power.

Not only with individuals, but with generations of men, it is noticeable how these two opposite impulses have alternately prevailed—sometimes one, sometimes the other, being dominant. The imaginative or speculative faculty always comes first; and thus in the infancy of Greek thought we have speculations of the freest and boldest type, enunciated by philosophers who thought that the universe lay open to be apprehended by the first comer, and were wholly unaware what a long series of observations—guided indeed by a rational motive or principle, but perpetually checked by the indispensable habit of cautious doubt—was necessary before the human mind could gain any satisfaction from the contemplated result of its endeavours. Thus Thales declared water to be the first principle of all things; nor must we undervalue such a step in philosophy as this, attained as it was through genuine observation and thought, and a faith, rare in all ages, in the unity of things. How vague and inaccurate his hypothesis was, Thales could hardly have known; he probably did not know (though he might have known) that it was a tentative hypothesis only. With Thales must be classed Pythagoras and Heraclitus and Anaxagoras, as great speculatists. The reactionary impulse, the impulse to test, the logical intellect, began with the Sophists. It was indeed as yet only in its rudiments; it was no cautious testing and experimentalizing that the Sophists instituted, but a sweeping denial; they were as proud of human ignorance as their predecessors had been of human knowledge. Neither party had the smallest n   of the advantage of accumulating facts of little individual importance, but whose truth was certain. With Socrates began a new era. Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle were three philosophers of that rarest type which does not give any inordinate preference either to the impulse to speculate and affirm, or to the impulse to test and deny. And it is in consequence of this that they are powerful over the minds of men even at the present day; whereas hardly any other ancient thinker is studied save for reasons of scientific curiosity. In a certain point of view, these three thinkers, like those before them, failed. That is, they instituted no science; they did not form the starting-point of any system of clear and enduring knowledge. And hence scientific men are prone to look with disfavour on them—a disfavour which results as much from the necessary narrowness of science (for science is essentially limited) as from the vagueness of philosophy. For looking broadly at the work done by Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle, it is absurd to speak of them as having failed. They first marshalled together and experimentally tried all those faculties and dispositions of mind which lead to knowledge; they did not narrow themselves to this branch or that of human interest; there is no corner in the field of discovery which men to this day have reached, that has not been reached through principles that were first apprehended by one of these three men. Their spirit has predominated over all succeeding thought, in spite of the fact that they themselves were guided into few facts or principles of supreme importance. Probably the width of the field over which their intellects ranged prevented their attaining entire clearness in any part of it.

It is of little use here to examine the alternations of the two impulses we have indicated with respect to the later ancient philosophers. Coming to modern times, we are at once struck by a fact, in itself most natural, though one which our ignorance of ancient times does not permit us to appreciate there with equal clearness, that it is periods of a stormy and troubled character that dispose men to great speculative efforts, whereas the logical mind is fostered by circumstances of quietness and ease. Thus, though the Reformation originated in denial and rejection, and might therefore be regarded as a movement rather of testing and trying than of origination and positive search, it is wonderful how soon the great leaders of the Protestants applied themselves to the inquiry on their own account of what was the truth. The system of Calvin was no doubt the most definite and remarkable of them all; but there was not one of the Reformers who would not have scorned, or rather condemned and anathematized, a thinker whose main efforts were in the negative direction. And so too in other branches of thought, the names of Copernicus and Galileo and Kepler, of Bacon and Descartes, prove the great speculative originality of the time. The waves of that great movement of humanity of which the Reformation was the most remarkable phase lasted long; nor can they be said to have finally settled down till the end of the seventeenth century, when the era was closed by three thinkers of the highest rank—Newton, Locke, and Leibnitz. Great as these thinkers were, yet perhaps even the greatest of them, Newton, had not quite the superabundant outflow of originality which characterized some of those who had gone before; but in compensation they had a large portion of that logical spirit which was the distinguishing mark of the following age. For the eighteenth century is distinctively the period of all history during which the logical spirit is predominant. Even in the very style of its literature this is apparent. There are no longer the bold sweeps, the magnificent promises, the lofty station, the resounding words of Bacon, of Shakspeare, of Descartes, of Bossuet; not to err is the mark which every writer sets before himself. Every sentence of Pope or of Voltaire is checked with careful anxiety lest something too much might be said, lest an extravagant or overweening phrase should excite the ridicule of the literary world. If we look at the substance of the thoughts of the age, the same phenomenon appears. Theology, which in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries had bloomed into all sorts of spontaneous forms, whether elaborate systems or fanatical extravagances, was now restricted to criticism. In Germany, criticism acted as a slow but powerful solvent of existing creeds; in France, it ran riot in the attack on Christianity itself; in England, the principal writers were indeed defenders of Christianity, and so far positive teachers, but teachers of so cautious a type, so careful to confine the essential doctrines of Christianity to the very fewest possible, as no Christian apologists ever had been before. If we look at philosophy, the name of Hume is sufficient to show that this too had the same character. A dread seemed to have possessed the whole world of all wide and bold hypotheses, of every assertion that could not be substantiated the moment it was uttered. And it is noticeable, correspondently with this, that the century was, up to the time of the French Revolution, politically the quietest of modern times. There were wars indeed; but no civil wars, nor much internal disturbance of States; nor was ever that rancorous and fanatical spirit displayed by which the Thirty Years' War, for instance, had been signalized.

The French Revolution was, in great measure, the offspring of the critical spirit, as exhibited by Voltaire; but it immediately generated the desire for vast generalizations. These, indeed, were hollow-sounding and poor enough in the mouths of Robespierre and his fellow-revolutionists; but in Germany the same impulse produced great results. However mystical and visionary Fichte and Schelling and Hegel may be thought, there can be no question as to the great influence they have had on Europe; and certainly there can be no greater contrast than between the writers who stood on either side, chronologically, of the Revolution. Between Voltaire and Hegel, what a difference! Again, with respect to the last fifty years; must we not call the era which produced, nearly thirty years ago, Mr. Mill's System of Logic, preeminently a logical era—an era not of much effluence of imagination, but of cautious restriction? On the other hand, since 1848 bolder sentiments have again come into vogue, both in the political and the scientific spheres. If we were to give our own judgment, we should say that since Newton there has not in England been a philosopher of more remarkable speculative and systematizing talent than (in spite of some errors and some narrowness) Mr. Herbert Spencer.

We have spoken throughout this article of logic as the art and faculty of testing imagined truths, with the view of discerning whether they are real truths. This, we think, is confessedly the nature of the syllogism. It has long ago been remarked that the syllogism can discover nothing; its real office is to test. But, nevertheless, though to test is the central design of logic, there are consequences which follow from logic of a wider extent. Without logic, systematization is impossible. Truth, as it first dawns upon the mind, is seen vaguely and obscurely; much even that is false is frequently mixed up with it. Logic, then, has the office of clearing and marking the limits of the truth thus imperfectly discerned—of cutting off, so to speak, its loose ends, and rendering it plainly intelligible and expressible in unexceptionable words. When this is done, and not before, the different truths discovered can be made to fit and dovetail into each other, instead of confusedly overhanging each other's boundaries. And thus logic is the essential preliminary to systematization, which is the last step in the discovery of truth.

INDEFINITE HOPEFULNESS.

A REFLECTIVE person who happens to be staying in a dull country town is apt to employ some part of his time in meditating on the views and aspirations and projects of the persons who have to pass all their days in the dull country town. To anybody in the full swing of a career, and not yet more than a certain number of years old, there is something profoundly marvellous in the possibility of so many rational creatures living with some appearance of content in a place where monotony, dulness, narrowness, and every other condition of limitation and littleness reign supreme and undisputed. Their affairs in the money-making order are puny and diminutive; commercial enterprise is not known among them, for the reason that everybody into whose heart the spirit of enterprise has found a way makes an opportunity forthwith for carrying himself and his enterprise elsewhere. Their political interests are contracted and merely traditional, the atmosphere of small places being conspicuously unfavourable to the exercise of independent judgment, as well as to all other manifestations of vigour. Their social interests strike one who is accustomed to a larger sphere as mean beyond endurance, and their social pleasures strike him as painful beyond description. How do they live? he asks himself. Where do they find the salt necessary to keep so savourless an existence from open decomposition? What do they look forward to? Where is their goal? The lives of the women of such a community furnish a special puzzle. The men at any rate possess the semblance of a career, and follow at least the shadows of larger interests. The warehouse may be small and the trading petty; still they demand a measure of energy and a fragment of originality. And though giving a vote and professing to hold a political view may not be very august processes, yet they may be allowed to count for something in stimulating a little movement in the slow and respectable soul. But women are debarred from even these poor spurs to a quicker pace. If the interests of commerce and public affairs shed but a faint illumination on the mind of the man, that pale light becomes yet paler by process of reflection upon the mind of the wife, and paler still in the daughters and sisters, for the latter have only a very secondhand concern in money matters, and usually no concern at all in affairs of State. And yet, it cannot be denied, these dwellers in waste places seem to enjoy a state of something not unlike happiness. Life appears tolerable to them, and they are every bit as reluctant to leave it as the most active and elevated persons are supposed to be. The explanation is perhaps not very difficult, and it lies in the fact that even these dullest of creatures to all outward seeming have inwardly a far-spreading and brightly illuminated ideal background. Of course some of them have given up all hopes of anything livelier or more golden than the humdrum round of Little Pedlington for this world, and reserve the fulfilment of all ideals for the world to come. But in most people perhaps resignation does not go quite so far as this; they will not, so long as they can help it, surrender all hope of vague good things even in this present world, and so they round off their lives with indefinite pictures for which they are indebted to a sanguine imagination. The outlines are not determined, and the colours shift and change, and the whole thing is very sketchy. The young ladies think of the fairy prince who will come and take them away to London or Paris, and the gay world of pleasure and activity; the mother, in turn, gives her hopes to her children, and builds castles in the air for them; the man often finds more than all the satisfaction he wants in the habitual reflection that with opportunity he had it in him to be Prime Minister, and that even as it is some miraculous turn of Fortune's wheel may one day bring him to that top, wherever it may be, for which generous nature destined him Seriously, none of these expect in sober truth that their golden visions will ever transform themselves into realities; but they have learnt the great lesson that possibilities in human life are all but unbounded, and that for them too, as for others, possibilities may one day turn up trumps. The chance is enough for them; on the chance they can go on living. They all attend to their duties and go through the day's work, endure their pains and survive their pleasures, on the strength of a hopefulness which reason would by no means warrant or justify.

Perhaps by the time our reflective friend has thought all this out, and the hour has come for his return to the more genial air of labour and ambition, he may have seen enough to make it worth his while to pursue the train of thought a little way further, asking himself whether the dull souls who vegetate in country towns and little watering-places are, after all, the only people who nourish themselves on indefinite and undefinable aspirations. It would perhaps be found upon due contemplation that this margin of the indefinable is just as necessary for the peace of persons who are far removed from stagnation as it is for those who are closely surrounded by it. How far do we all feed upon indefinite aspirations after a future about which the only clearly recognisable feature is that it does not resemble the present? To how many of us would the course of the circumstances around us be endurable, if we finally realized the undoubted fact that it is of these and such as these that all the remainder of life is to be made up? This is a fact which substantially we accept, but mostly we try to think of it as little as we can. It is not an inviting object of contemplation, however happily a man may chance to be placed. Incapacity of being absolutely satisfied with such gifts as reality permits to him appears to be an inevitable condition of man's nature, and there is a hope springing eternally in the human breast, of a much more equivocal kind than that which the poet meant. Take men who are unquestionably in those grooves which lead to worldly success of the best sort; men who are making large incomes as well as a reputation at the Bar, who are treading the smooth path that leads to preferment and dignity in the Church, who are being talked about with much sympathy and much tempestuous reprobation in the world of politics, who are names in scientific circles, or who are recognised as doing good and welcome work in fiction, history, philosophy, or any other part of literature. Yet who believes that any one of these is perfectly contented with what his career is bringing him to? We do not in the least mean, what some novelists would try to persuade us, that there are skeletons in all cupboards, and secret consciousnesses in all hearts, and a sense of blight and mistake and remorse generally pervasive through all the families and men who seem so delightfully happy on the surface. This sort of thing is probably confined to the marionettes whom novelists fashion and move in their delusive puppet-shows. In real life it is pretty safe to suppose that remorse is only occasional, and that the grounds for it are tolerably infrequent. But remorse has nothing to do with that inarticulate dissatisfaction which is the element in life we are talking about, and which finds a remedy for itself in a corresponding view of inarticulate or indefinite hopefulness. Even successful men constantly think that all is vanity and vexation of spirit, and that success is not by any means the filling and substantial end-all and be-all which in the golden days of youth they had fondly supposed it to be. Sometimes they turn cynics, make their success a pleasant text from which to preach upon the inanity and nothingness of the world and its fortunes, and delight to impress on incredulous and ambitious youth the dreariness and hollowness of the universe. At other times this dissatisfaction is mixed with vanity, and they deprecate their success as being indeed not much more nor better than failure; a curious form of morbid over-estimate of self of which we had a highly amusing instance two or three months back, when a well-known and popular gentleman wrote a pamphlet showing that the Christian religion must be true because it had given him ample consolation under the afflicting vexations of being a member of Parliament and the author of one of the best books for little boys that were ever written. But either of these cases, either the cynic or the vain man, is a little abnormal. In a general way, the dissatisfaction is much too secret, too subtle, and, we may add, too painful in a quiet way, for men to be fond of trotting it out either for the reproof or the instruction of their neighbours. For the most part, they would hide it from themselves as much as they could, and the only counterweight to it—or perhaps it would be better to say the only form in which, if they are wise, they allow themselves to recognise it—is a certain vague expectation of days when things shall not be as these days are. They only know that they are not heartily and profoundly content with the present, because they find themselves now and again seeking an apparently unnecessary consolation in thinking of a totally different kind of future. The barrister in the midst of his toil and moil vaguely hopes that one day he may awake and discover that, by an admirable metempsychosis, he is become a dweller in the fields and woods, with horses and crops and stock to think about. The student has private dreams of the time when the world shall have opened its eyes to the merit of intellect, and the right of the thinker to a sovereign place in the public assembly. The politician, like Mr. Lowe the other day, deludes himself into the idea that, after all, books are the best friends, their companionship the sweetest and noblest, and that it is a sorry exchange from them to the heat and turmoil, the mortifications and the littlenesses, of practical politics. But of course there are as many ideals as there are men. The one condition of each of them is that it should be different from the real, no matter how. With the common run of men and women this is its one definite feature. There is a great deal of pathos in the reflection how many people there are in the world, or say in London only, who do not know exactly what to hope for, if only the blank could be somehow filled up. Even for those who are best off, whose lives offer most of variety and interest, there would be a marked sense of chill—provided they are not mere flippant creatures, the flies of a summer afternoon—if they could see for certain that what they are now they will remain, that such as the course of their lives is now it will continue to be down to the end. It is to keep off this terrible chill that they spread out between themselves and the future this veil of bright-coloured smoke. The world would be ever so much the worse if the filmy curtain were lifted, for many of those who are doing the best possible work in the world might be ready to faint by the way if they saw that the arduousness or the humdrum was to last to the end of their lives. Duty, we know, is duty, whatever betide, yet not seldom it comes in the guise of a drug, which even good and dutiful men would fain have gilded; and people who have the gift of indefinite hopefulness can happily carry on this gilding process at discretion, very cheaply and most efficiently.

PUMPKINS.

PUMPKINS are among the most imposing of all groundling growths. They have fine showy flowers, handsome leaves, roving stems, and they bear solid-looking fruit of a goodly size and gorgeous colour. To see them spreading over their domain with such rapid luxuriance, one would imagine them among the best things growing; but a critical examination proves their flesh to be about three parts water, while as for their stalks, they are of so pithless a nature they can only creep along the earth, unable to stand upright without support; which tells something against the pumpkin's claim for extra consideration. Still, their showy largeness attracts the eye, and not a few of us believe in pumpkins, and admire both their mode of growth and the fruit resulting. In like manner the human pumpkins—those beings of imposing presence and loud self-assertion—get themselves believed in by the simple; and, as occasions by which their watery and fibreless nature is revealed do not arise every day, they are for the most part accepted for the substantialities they assume to be, and the world is deceived by appearances as it ever has been. These human pumpkins abound everywhere. In all states and professions, and in both sexes, we find them flourishing magnificently upon the face of the earth, taking the lead in their society, and setting themselves out as the finest fellows to be found in their respective gardens. Among them are the men of the Bombastes type, so dear to the older playwrights; braggadocios of the kill 'em and eat 'em school, who were such terrible fellows to look at and listen to, though only pumpkins of a singularly innocuous nature when stoutly squeezed and analysed; fire-eaters of the juggling kind, with special care taken that the fire shall be harmless, and that the danger shall be only in the fear of the spectators. Now that duelling has gone out of fashion, and discharged captains who have signalized themselves in war are rare, our old swashbuckler type of pumpkins has gone out both in fact and fiction, on the stage and off it. To be sure we have a few travellers of slightly apocryphal courage, and more than doubtful accuracy, whose books of perilous adventure and breathless dangers are to us what Bombastes and Bobadil were to our fathers; and we have Major Wellington de Boots with his military swagger and his hare's heart. But he is a very weak imitation of the old fire-eater; and, on the whole, this special family of the pumpkins has dwindled into insignificance, and their place knows them no more.

Then there is the pumpkin after the cut of the Prince Regent—the man of deportment, generally big, often handsome, and chiefly noticeable for a loud voice, a broad chest, and an indescribable air of superiority and command; the man who has studied bowing as one of the fine arts, who walks with a swagger, and even now tips his curly-brimmed hat slightly to the side. This is the kind of man who influences women. Bombastes frightens the nervous and inexperienced of his own sex, but the man of deportment partly fascinates and partly overawes the other. They take him at his own valuation, and have not skill enough to find out the flaw in the summing up until perhaps it is too late, when they have come so near to him that they are able to appraise him for themselves, and have learnt by bitter experience of what unsound materials he is made. And then let him look out. There nothing women resent so much as pumpkin manhood—nothing which humiliates them more in their own esteem than to discover that they have been taken in by appearances, and that what they believed was solid wood turns out to be only squash. Women like to rely on men, and dread nothing so much as weakness and vacillation in their male protectors; save indeed those grim and bulky females in whom Hood so much delighted, who take small men vi et armis, and subjugate them body and soul, like two-legged poodles trained to fetch and carry at the word of command. But these are exceptions; the average woman prizing strength rather than poodle-like docility. The pumpkin of the Prince Regent cut is generally notorious for laying down the law on all points. His voice is loud, and his manner of speech dictatorial, so that no one dreams of doubting, still less of contradicting, him, but everybody takes him as he represents himself to be—a man of prompt decision, of boundless resources, a granitic tower of strength to be leant against in all emergencies without the slightest fear of failure; a man who is not only sufficient for himself, but strong enough to bear the weaknesses of others. He is famous for giving advice—advice of a vague, rapid, sprawling kind, never quite exact to the circumstances, never quite practical or to the point—large advice, general in scope but wonderfully positive in tone, and, until you analyse, grandly imposing in effect. Nail him to the point; ask his advice seriously on any question where the responsibility of counsel will rest with him; place yourself in his hands where the consequences of failure will touch him as well as you; and then see to what meagre dimensions your goodly gourd will shrink. The confident assertion drops into a weak hesitation, the arrogant advice melts into a timid refusal to take such a serious responsibility on himself; you have pricked your windbag, dissected your pumpkin, and henceforth you know the precise weight of substance remaining. Yet mankind sees him exactly where he was before, and he will go about the world in his large, loud way, saying to every one that if you had followed his advice you would have succeeded—supposing you have failed; or, if you have succeeded, he will take all the credit to himself, and say it was he who guided you, and showed you how to go in and win. For himself, and his own affairs, he has no more moral stamina than he had leadership for you and yours. The least reverse knocks him over. Care or sorrow, when it touches him, shrivels him up as completely as frost shrivels up the pumpkin; in every circumstance requiring promptitude, or coolness, or keen perception, or just decision, our swaggering man of froth fails ignominiously; and one hour of real pressure proves without doubt that he was only a pumpkin of imposing presence, good neither as meat nor staff when the time of trial came.

Very often the pumpkin has a wife whose fibre is as close as his is loose, and whose nature is as tough as his is soft; a hard-eyed, thin-lipped, tenacious woman, who speaks little and boasts not at all, but who does all she wishes to do, and whose iron will pins her pumpkin to the wall as the spear of the Bushman pins the elephant or the rhinoceros. It is very curious to see how a blatant blustering man, who is so loud and confident abroad, knocks under at home; and how the high-crested deportment which carries things with such a lofty bearing out of doors droops into the meek submission of the henpecked husband as soon as the house-door closes on him, and he is subjected to the pitiless analysis of home. There is no question of flourish then; and if by chance the ambitious crest should try to display itself, the wife knows how to lower it by a few decisive words of a keen-edged kind, and her pumpkin is made to feel sharply enough the difference existing between fibre and pulp. Yet it is almost melancholy to see one of these fine flourishing fellows so subdued. Pumpkin as he may be, it is not pleasant to see him so cut down in his pride; and involuntarily one's sympathies go with him rather than with that tenacious, hard-mouthed wife of his, who would be none the worse perhaps for a little of her husband's softness, and with less than her own hardness. How often, too, these big fellows have no physical stamina, as well as but very shaky moral fibre. A small, wiry light-weight will do twice as much as they; not, of course, where muscle only is wanted, but where the question is of endurance. Large heavy men knock up far sooner than the light-weights; and though size and weight count for something at certain times and on occasions, fibre and tenacity go for more in the long run. In the Crimea, the men who first dropped off from exposure and privation were the magnificently-built Guardsmen—men apparently bred and fed to the highest point of physical perfection; while the undersized little liners, who had nothing to be admired in them, stood the strain gamely, and were brisk and serviceable when the others were either dead or in hospital. So far as we have gone yet, we have not solved the problem of how to combine toughness and bigness, solidity and size, but for the most part fail in the one in proportion as we succeed in the other. Many of the dark-skinned races are pumpkins in a way. Their flashing black eyes and swarthy skins seem to be instinct with passion; they look like living furnaces filled with flames and molten metal, terrible fellows, dangerous to meddle with, and almost impossible to subdue. But nine times out of ten we find them to be marvellously meek persons, timid, amenable to law, unable to give offence, and incapable of taking it—lambs masquerading in tiger-skins. A fair-faced Anglo-Saxon, with his sensitive blush, good-humoured smile, and light blue eyes, has more pluck and pith in him than a brigade of certain of those darkskinned men. He has less ferocity perhaps than they when they are thoroughly roused, though our good-humoured Anglo-Saxon is by no means destitute of ferocity on occasions when his blood is up; but it is ferocity of the brutal and bludgeon stand-up fight kind—the ferocity of strength fairly put out against an adversary, not the tigerish cruelty which is almost always found when moral weakness and physical submission have a momentary triumph and reaction. Cowardly men are like women in their revenge when once they get the upper hand; and their revenge is more cruel than that of the habitually brave man who, after a fair fight, overthrows his opponent. Some of the dark-skinned races look the very ideal of the melodramatic ruffian—operatic brigands painted with broad black lines, and up to any amount of deeds of daring and of crime; but they are only pumpkins at the core. We need not go so far as Calcutta to find them; we got examples nearer home, both in Houndsditch and in Rome; for both Jews and Italians are soft-cored men in spite of their passionate outsides, and both would be better for an extra twist and toughness in their fibres.

Intellectual pumpkins are as common as those of the more specially physical kind. You meet with philosophers and "thinkers"—perhaps they are poets, perhaps politicians—who flourish out a vague big declamation which, when you reduce it to its essence, you find to be a platitude worth nothing; whipped cream, without any foundation of solid pudding. If they are of the philosophic sort, they quote you Fichte and Hegel, to the bewilderment of your brains unless you have gone into the metaphysical maze on your own account; but they might have put all they have said into half a dozen words of three letters, like a child's first reading lesson. The flourish imposes, and people who cannot analyse take the whipped cream for solid pudding, and think that platitudes dressed in the garb of Fichte and Hegel are utterances worthy of deep respect and admiring wonder. All the professions which talk, either by word of mouth or in print, are specially given to this manifestation of pumpkinhood. Preachers and authors sprawl and flourish over their small inheritance with a tremendous assumption of vital force and vigorous growth; and weak hands, with weaker heads, find support and shelter in their foliage. Poets too, with a knack for turning out large moulds in which they have run very small ideas, are pumpkins dear to the feminine mind. Have we not our Tupper? had we not our "Satan" Montgomery? and a few others that we might catalogue if we cared for the task, each with his multifarious female following, and his spiritual harem of ardent admirers? All artists—that is, the men who create, or rather who assume to create—are liable to be proved pumpkins when called on to show themselves solid wood. They talk grandly enough, but when they have to translate their words into deeds, too often the noble aims and immortal efforts they have been advocating tail off into pulp and water, and we have botches and pot-boilers instead of masterpieces and high art. Perhaps we may take it as a rule that all doers who talk much and boast grandly are of the pumpkin order, and that art, like nature, is best elaborated in silence.

Strong-visaged women are often pure pumpkins with a very rough and corrugated outside. It is astonishing how soon they break down, and for all their stern and powerful looks sink under burdens under which a frail little creature, as light as thistle-down, will glide along quite easily. Women with black brows and harsh voices—brigandesses by appearance, or like the typical Herodias of unimaginative artists—are often the gentlest and most pithless of their sex, and may be seen acting quite compassionately towards their infants, or vindicating their womanhood by meekly sewing on their husband's buttons, and weeping at his rebukes; while a fair, silver-tongued, languid lady, as soft as if she were made of nothing harder than the traditional cream and rose-leaves, will give up her babies as a prey to unfeeling nurses, and let her husband go buttonless and in rags, while she lounges before the fire indifferent to his wrath and callous to his wrongs. There is many a house mistress who looks as if she could use her fists when annoyed, who is absolutely afraid of her servants; and the maid is always the mistress when the one is fibre and the other pulp. Heaven be praised that the strong-visaged women are not "clear grit" all through. If they were as hard as they look, the world would go but queerly, and society would have to make new laws for the protection of its weaker male members. But nature is merciful as well as sportive, and while she amuses herself by creating pumpkins of formidable aspect, takes care that the core shall not always correspond to the rind. Like the Athenian images of the satyr which enclosed a god, the black-browed brigandesses and the men of magnificent deportment are sometimes impostors of a quite amiable kind; and when you have once learnt by heart the false analogies of form, you will cease to fear your typical Herodias, to be impressed by your copy of the Prince Regent, or to be influenced by your wordy Hegelian talking platitudes in the philosophic dialect.

UNIVERSOLOGY.

IT is with infinite pride that we become the means of announcing to the benighted inhabitants of Europe a discovery which is about to regenerate the world—certainly not before such a process was needed. Indeed we are inclined to agree with an enthusiastic reporter of the proceedings at which the discovery was first announced, that "there was room in the nature of things for precisely such a science, and that there ought to be, if there is not, precisely such a discovery." It is sad indeed that a desolating scepticism should introduce that ominous clause, "if there is not." Let us endeavour for a moment to accept the hope, without criticizing the good news too closely. Mr. Stephen P. Andrews has been plunged "in the deep recesses of abstract speculation for thirty years"; and in a month or two a thick volume of 800 pages, with eighty illustrative diagrams, will reveal his marvellous discoveries to mankind. "No less than five distinct introductions" from five enthusiastic disciples will usher in to the world this novum organum of the nineteenth century. Listen to a few of the enthusiastic utterances wrung from these appreciative philosophers. "Universology," says Professor M. A. Clancy, "is not only a science vast as the universe in its scope, but a method of scientific procedure capable of application to every domain of Thought and Being, in the new investigation which will ever be demanded in exploring new special departments of Being." It is rather a fall from this glowing language to the plainer vernacular of Professor A. F. Boyle, who contents himself with saying that he "feels as if the world wants it (universology) at just this nick of time"; but the Rev.

Edward B. Freeland, David Hoyle, and J. West Morris are again up to the mark. Universology is the "complete discovery and perfect interpretation of the purposes of the Deity in creation." Universology is the "science of the whole universe, or the Positive and Rational Revelation of the Organic Laws of Thought and Being, by means of their correspondence or of the Grand Pervading Analogies between them." Even the commonest adjectives, as we see, blossom into capital letters when pressed into the service of the universologist. But Mr. David Hoyle is the worthiest disciple. Universology, he tells us, will "revolutionize the world in all its domains, whether Ideal, Physical, Social, Moral, Political, or Religious. . . . It is in fine the Sublime Expounder of the Universe of God; and the means of the eventual introduction of the Race to a Paradisic Existence whose pleasures will transcend the highest imaginings of so-called Utopian dreamers." And now we feel that Mr. Stephen P. Andrews would have conferred upon us a great benefit if he could have complied with the request of his publisher to give some condensed account of the book in which this mighty discovery is announced. Unluckily this is beyond his power, and he can only refer us to his title-page. This announces the book as "the Basic Outline of Universology; an introduction to the newly-discovered science of the Universe; its elementary principles; and the stages of their development in the special sciences." We confess that our minds are not much the clearer for this condensed account. We are, however, treated by way of illustration to one specific result of the science. We shall in future have a universal language, which will be named Alwato—pronounced, as we are carefully told, Ahlwahto. This announcement it seems, excited the Polytechnic branch of the American Institute, whatever that may be, to pass a vote of thanks to Mr. Andrews, contrary to their usual practice.

The most remarkable fact about this surprising revelation is that Mr. Andrews has already five appreciative disciples. Thinkers who have gone in for explaining everything in the universe have generally found some difficulty in making that first step. It is still a matter of dispute whether or not any other man ever succeeded in understanding Hegel. Comte's disciples are still few and far between, though the world was to be converted to his views before the present generation has passed away. The would-be founders of universology—for the science is common enough, though Mr. Andrews has the merit of discovering its new and very significant title—have probably been quite as numerous as the schools which they founded. We constantly see little treatises in which a key is given to the whole mystery of the world, which appear to be generally published at the authors' expense. But here are five men, sufficiently educated to use the largest epithets regardless of expense, and to spell with accuracy, and even for two of them to call themselves Professors, who are ready to swear by Mr. Andrews. Truly it is a good omen, and he need not despair of hearing some day a dialogue carried on in Alwato. We can only suppose that, in the land of the celebrated Miss Hominy, there is held in solution a good deal of that sort of intellectual matter which naturally crystallizes round a Stephen P. Andrews. Mr. Dickens has given few more decisive proofs of his wonderful quickness of perception than by hitting off that admirable caricature. Hominyism is a tendency widely diffused through American society, and therefore there is no country in which the neglected philosopher has a better chance of receiving recognition. Americans sometimes boast—and with occasional truth—that they discover English writers of genius before they have gained honour in their native country. They do it, however, at the price of accepting also a good deal of rubbish. Tuppers pass current there as well as Tennysons, and sham philosophy, if it only uses big enough words, and asserts itself with sufficient audacity, secures a foothold as well as the genuine article. The most highflying transcendentalism will find sympathetic souls in Boston when it can excite nothing but a sneer in London.

There is nothing surprising, and certainly nothing discreditable, about this. It is an illustration of the real meaning of the frequently misused term, that America is a young country. The analogy between a nation and an individual is apt to mislead; but in some points there is a genuine resemblance. Most clever young men go through a certain phase, as naturally as babies take the measles. If poetically inclined, they are cured by a favourable eruption of bad verses; and if given to speculation, they frequently invent what Mr. Andrews so happily calls universology. An intellect of average strength and cultivation discovers, generally about the age of twenty-three, that it has not quite solved the "riddle of the painful earth"; that there are flaws in the scheme which once seemed so perfectly satisfactory; and that the same ideas which looked so novel and startling had previously occurred to more than one philosopher since men began to speculate. Occasionally men of ability are so peculiarly constituted that they carry on this temper of mind into maturer life; and they then develop into the creators of the various ephemeral Utopias which amuse or sadden us for a time. Great social convulsions such as the French Revolution naturally encourage this temper, and throw up St. Simons, and Fouriers, and Comtes, because they seem to open wide possibilities for mankind; and America, in a certain sense, is in a permanent state of revolution. The order of things changes so rapidly, and the whole mind of the people is so constantly set upon the development of its vast resources, that it is no wonder that enthusiastic people suffer from a kind of spiritual intoxication. Everything seems to be possible; and it is the most natural thing in the world to propose a completely new system which shall introduce an inpromptu renovation of society from top to bottom. There is no deeply-rooted respect for old traditions to hamper the boldest schemer; he has, as it were, a blank sheet of paper on which to draw his diagrams just as pleases him best; and he naturally gives full play to the indomitable hopefulness which is the most attractive feature of new societies. In a less satisfactory sense, he falls into the credulity which in an old country is eradicated before a man grows up to years of discretion. There is as yet no thoroughly cultivated class in America which can speak with authority in matters of speculation. One man is as good as another—not merely in regard of his political rights, but because he has attained pretty nearly the same level of cultivation. No ferocious critic sits in the seat of judgment ready to pass sentence on any impostor who claims to be a leader of thought. Doubtless such a class is being slowly developed; but meanwhile questions which ought to be decided by competent judges are determined by universal suffrage or popular acclamation. We are astonished at the success with which the impositions of spiritualism thrive on Transatlantic soil. No story of eccentric tables and mysterious spirit-writings seems to be too gross to find favour. New dodges are found out as soon as the old ones disappear; and a little sleight-of-hand would enable any unscrupulous person to make a very comfortable living out of our kinsmen. If we ask why similar delusions are not so prevalent in England, we can hardly flatter ourselves that it is because we have in general attained a higher intellectual level. Everybody has known persons of apparent sanity, and even sense, who believed in the whole nonsense of spiritualism. And it was easy to see, in the discussions produced by the case of Home, that most people, whatever their judgment might be, were incapable of forming it on scientific grounds. They did not in the least appreciate the requirements of sound reasoning, or know what tests should be satisfied before the advocates of such an amazing doctrine would acquire a right to be heard. The peasantry, we are often reminded, are still at that stage of education in which a belief in witchcraft is possible, though it need not always exist; and it is probable that the majority of the upper classes are equally capable of believing in spiritualism; that is to say, a good round assertion of its truth would find them incapable of testing it critically. Now American believers are, very many of them, fully as intelligent as the body of English sceptics. What is more singular, they have generally a rather higher respect for the claims of science, and are apt to clothe their intolerable nonsense in a singular scientific jargon. They generally argue with naive ignorance of the subject. Thus they fancy that a belief in discoveries about electricity (the favourite name for everything that people don't understand) ought to make a belief in spiritualism easier, and run over all the fine words which will doubtless find a place in the science of Universology. The true difference between the cases is not that the general run of Englishmen are more intelligent or more sensitive to the claims of science; but simply that they have a court of appeal for which they have a good deal more respect. They have a dim belief that a spiritualist must be a fool, because Faraday or Dr. Tyndall assure them that spiritualism is folly. In America, where there is a general presumption in favour of anything that is new, there is also no one to exercise any supervision over the purveyors of novelty. They are, in short, in the same intellectual position as the youth who has read some popular books of science, but has not learnt by experience the labour which goes to form a scientific authority.

We are perhaps getting rather far from Mr. Stephen P. Andrews and his disciples. Probably their thick volume, with its eighty illustrations, will have as short a life in America as in England, and Alwato be speedily gathered to its many predecessors, if it ever comes into existence. Meanwhile, we would suggest that thirty years more spent in the recesses of abstract speculation would probably save Mr. Andrews a good deal of disappointment in the end.

CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT IN THE EAST.

CONSTITUTIONAL Government is now on its trial in the East. Greece, Moldo-Vallachia, and Servia are constitutional States. Turkey is circumscribing the despotic power of the Sultan by local institutions, and by educating his subjects in the practice of self-government, which, when united with an independent judicature, forms a surer foundation for constitutional liberty than all the written Constitutions of France since the year 1791. Even the Pasha-King-Suzerain of Egypt has packed a representative assembly, and made his dominion bear the same relation to constitutional monarchy that hyprocrisy bears to virtue. The once unchangeable East is walking onward at a quick pace, and by unknown paths, to a political future. Greece became a constitutional State in 1822, and is now ruled by a generation born to freedom. Whatever may be the shortcomings of the constitutional States in the East, their Governments are greatly superior to the arbitrary administration of Turkish Pashas and Greek Hospodars; and brigandage itself appears to destroy less property and offer fewer impediments to the progress of society than Arnaout taxgatherers and unrestrained despotic power. It is often said, however, that some nations are unfit for constitutional government, and it is an undoubted and a sad truth that many nations are not in a condition to make a good use of it. A clock is of no use to those who do not know how to wind it up, or who wind it up with such violence that it stops. There are nations at present unfit to make a good use of an equitable judicial system, but nobody would say that it is not necessary to give these nations courts of justice.

Constitutional government, like the human frame, has its childhood, and it is long of attaining strength and vigour. It is a fabric that requires to be constructed with habits, forms, and institutions, and its foundations require the lapse of more than one generation to consolidate them. In the East it has still to contend with the prejudice that might is the nearest thing to right, and with the delusion that the strongest government is practically the best government for the actual state of society. Many who hate a single personal tyrant are so convinced that tyranny must be, that they are advocates for a democratic despotism. Constitutional government is supposed not to possess strength enough to resist the democratic power which De Tocqueville regarded as tending, in the present condition of our civilization, to become an irresistible despotism. As we see, however, that the wildest passions of human nature can be disciplined by laws, surely law can become powerful enough to restrain the most democratic governments with the aid of constitutional habits and traditional institutions. The immediate problem for constitutional nations in the East is how to organize the people so that a democratic power shall respect the government it constitutes. No system of government can give any strong security that society repudiates revolution until both the law of the land and the constitution of the State place the Judicature above the Executive.

The Kingdom of Greece has been a hotbed of revolts, rebellions, and revolutions, yet the working of constitutional government there affords a practical illustration of the improvement it produces in Oriental society in very difficult circumstances. The habits and prepossessions of the Greeks kept their opinions see-sawing between despotism and lawlessness. The earliest Constitution of Greece promulgated on New Year's Day, old style, 1822, reads like an antiquated essay. It reflects the theories current in France at the time, and exhibits what Greek statesmen supposed would favourably influence public opinion in the civilized world rather than what could be practically applied in Greece. The consequence was that this Constitution of 1822 was a dead letter; neither the Government nor even the representatives of the people paid any attention to what they had enacted. Still it could be observed during the War of Independence, amidst scenes of destruction, anarchy, and suffering without parallel in this century. A party existed inculcating the necessity for settled principles of government and forms of administration in opposition to the arbitrary personal power assumed by party leaders and military chiefs. Unfortunately, no man of eminence, except the Admiral Miaoules, appeared to possess a mind with the capacity for making his executive activity conform to general laws; and Miaoules, being an Albanian of Hydra, imperfectly acquainted with the Greek language, was unfit for becoming the Washington of a nation of pedants. Count Capodistrias, who might have laid the foundations of national institutions, made every principle of liberty and law subordinate to might in order to establish his own personal government.

In 1832 Greece was made a kingdom by Great Britain, France, and Russia, and the Crown was conferred on Prince Otho of Bavaria, then seventeen years of age. In 1833, immediately on their arrival in Greece, the Bavarian Regency abolished the Constitution, in direct violation of the promises given both by the King of Bavaria and by the three protecting Powers, who have had reason to regret their connivance at this act of Royal larceny. After robbing the Greeks of their constitutional rights and incipient institutions, the Bavarian Regents and King Otho governed the Greek Kingdom despotically for ten years. During this period of personal government, the seeds of many political and social evils were sown, which yielded a rank and poisonous crop, and which still retard the formation of a good system of government. In 1843 the patience of the people was exhausted, and a revolution expelled the Bavarians, put an end to the despotic power of King Otho, and framed a Constitution on the Continental model of that time, with a salaried Senate of veteran officials, and a paid House of Representatives. This Constitution worked very ill, yet it lasted nineteen years. The Senators were named for life. King Otho filled the Senate with men of moderate capacity and extreme servility, and encouraged jobbing and place-hunting as sure means of making the members who received favours devoted to his dynasty. The House of Representatives was elected by universal suffrage, and the country was divided into large electoral districts. Personal character and local interests were swamped in a bog of democracy, over which nothing but the splay-feet of the central authorities could pass securely. Experience convinced the people that a salaried Senate of officials must be a nest of corruption, and that a House of Representatives consisting of nominees of the Executive must be a club of place-hunters. Reform by any legal proceeding was hopeless. Gradually, but slowly, the hatred of the nation concentrated itself on King Otho's head. He was stigmatized as the corruptor of the Senate, the jobber of the House of Representatives, and the enemy of national improvement. The remedy was sought in another revolution. In 1862 the Greeks dethroned King Otho, confiscated the rights which the three protecting Powers had conferred on the Bavarian dynasty, abolished the salaried Senate, established a single Representative Chamber, and endeavoured to exclude Government nominees and mere place-hunters by declaring that mayors and officials, with the exception of Ministers and military and naval officers on half-pay, cannot be elected as representatives.

Since 1822 the Greeks have lived under five written Constitutions, with an intercalation of ten years of despotism, so that they possess sufficient experience to render their last attempt deserving of attention. The Constitution of 1864 bears within it evidence that it is no mere echo of the voice of Western politicians, and of the opinions of theorists. It is what it was intended to be—an adaptation of constitutional government to the present state of society in Greece, and the general exigencies of opinion in the East. Monarchy was retained (though the difficulty of electing a suitable monarch was felt), because the necessity of having a strong and impartial head of the Executive was acknowledged, and this appeared possible only with a King. Public opinion also demanded that the King should be a foreigner, in order to dominate party corruption and restrain party passions. It was also deemed necessary that he should be the member of a Royal family, that his influence with the three protecting Powers might be greater than the Greeks supposed could be attained in Courts by talents and honesty without Royal blood. The Greeks themselves allowed that they were acquainted with no Royal Highness who possessed the qualities they sought for in their King; but they fixed on Prince Alfred of England as likely to become a better constitutional King than any other European prince who was recommended to their attention. The interest and policy of Great Britain rendered the acceptance of the Greek throne by an English prince a measure not likely, in the long run, to be satisfactory either to Greece or England. Fortunately, diplomatic arrangements had rendered the acceptance of the Crown by an English prince impossible. Earl Russell at this conjuncture, with that sound judgment on matters of fact which often contrasts so oddly with its absence as regards the choice of fitting times and occasions, gave the Greeks a lecture on the qualities they ought to look for in their future King. They were informed that the British Government considered they would do well not to choose "a king under twenty years of age, but rather a prince of mature years and of some experience in the world." (Despatch of Earl Russell to Mr. Scarlett, Nov. 29, 1862.) The Greeks were not offended at the style of didactic statesmanship which has so often given offence to other nations. Indeed, they admired the institutions of England so much the more, since they saw that those institutions had made a Socrates Secretary of State; and, in order to ensure the practical execution of the wise advice, the National Assembly invited the British Government to select a prince possessing these and other qualifications of a good king. Earl Russell had been erroneously believed by the Greeks to possess a large acquaintance among Royal and Serene Highnesses, fit, like Themistocles, to raise a small State to the rank and power of a great Empire. Earl Russell had nothing ready but the lantern of his own advice, and when he went about the Courts of Europe holding it up in the face of princes, he was not more successful in his search for a good king than Diogenes in finding his honest Greek. So, after two misadventures, the loss of much precious time, and a vast deal of diplomatic sneering, he carried his counsels into practice by selecting for Greece a king of the "mature age" of seventeen, and with the "experience in the world" acquired as a midshipman in the Danish navy. The Greeks, having received their King from England, set seriously to work at forming their own Constitution.

The Constitution of 1864 differs from the ordinary type of Continental Constitutions, and its divergencies are the result of a state of society and opinion among Eastern races that cannot fail to exert considerable influence on the political organization of the Christian governments which have been formed in the provinces separated from Turkey, and on the institutions in the course of formation in the Ottoman Empire itself. Some of the enactments of this Constitution probably foreshadow the procedure of democracy, even in the older States of the Continent, as they advance towards liberty. A new position is created for the Crown by placing it in direct connexion with a single representative Chamber, without even an Upper House or a Senate nominated by the sovereign or elected by the people. This, however, was not from any theoretical preference for a single Chamber. The Greeks abolished King Otho's Senate because it was a nest of corruption, and they found that society in the Hellenic Kingdom contained no class of men whose position of independence afforded a chance of forming a useful Senate. The alternative was a Senate like that which had been abolished, or a single Chamber, and public opinion, not merely the momentary will of the populace, pronounced an emphatic decision on the subject by abolishing a Council of State which the Constitution admitted on trial, after it had existed a year. On the other hand, this Constitution of 1864 constitutes a Cabinet as a responsible feature of executive administration, standing between the Crown, the Chamber, and the people. The Ministers are placed under increased responsibility to the Crown by being compelled by the Constitution to act in some cases in a body. The King has thus the power of restraining the assumption of too great authority by the Prime Minister, who, as party leader of an overwhelming majority in a single Chamber, might become the master of his colleagues. By holding regular Cabinet Councils, and compelling each Minister to record his opinion on every administrative measure relating to his department, the King may enforce responsibility by an appeal to facts. A dissolution will then show whether the people adopt the opinion of the King or of the leader of a majority in the Chamber.

The principle of democracy is carried out to its fullest extent by electing a single Chamber, and adopting vote by ballot and large electoral districts, without reference to municipalities or local interests. Numbers are all in all. Wealth can only make its way by corruption, knowledge by flattery of the mob, and power by intimidation. And for the present the most prominent features of constitutional government in Greece are corruption, national self-laudation, and government intimidation. The Greeks did not overlook the danger of a democracy becoming a despotism when invested with unlimited power, and they attempted to place it under some restraint by several articles of the Constitution. The representatives are invested with independence by being elected for four years. Demagogues are discouraged by the provision that, to be elected a member of the Chamber, the deputy must be domiciled, and possess political and civil rights, for two years in the district previously to the election. He must also be thirty years of age. Another provision intended to restrain both corruption and governmental intimidation excludes mayors of municipalities and paid officials from becoming members of the Chamber. Officers of the army and the navy can only be members while on half-pay, and Ministers have always a seat and voice in the Chamber, but can vote only when they sit as deputies.

This Constitution presents two important questions for consideration before we can arrive at any conclusion concerning the probability of the new type of constitutional monarchy which it presents working well in practice. The first is, how the authority of the Crown can be exercised by the King so as to control the power of the leader of a majority in the Chamber who becomes Prime Minister. The Prime Minister being the representative of democracy, and the Constitution declaring that all power in the State has its source in the people, the Prime Minister must be the most powerful man in the monarchy. The King, though superior in rank, is only, as far as administration goes, a check on the Prime Minister. The second question is, by what means the power of a single Chamber can be prevented from exercising undue authority in a democratic State. This question is far more important than the first, for good government has existed, and can exist, without a king, but is hardly possible with the exercise of unlimited power, whether in the hands of a single individual or a single chamber.

A King placed in constant contact with a single democratic Chamber is in an extremely delicate position. The authority of the Crown has not yet been clearly traced out, and in Greece both the Constitution and public opinion demand that the King should be something more than a popular pageant, and something different from a decorated puppet in politics, moved by the Prime Minister. Experience alone can determine how far the King must govern as well as reign, and how far the powers with which he is invested are available for controlling the government. The exact limits of the administrative action of the Crown and the personal action of the King in a highly centralized constitutional monarchy form a new problem. Party corruption and Ministerial violence might become irrepressible evils, unless the King possess constitutional powers for restraining them. The King, to perform the part assigned to him in such a State, must be able to speak words of wisdom and to avoid acts of indiscretion. The Greeks desire to be ruled by a King, and demand from him discernment of things and tact with men. They feared, from the experience of Otho's reign, that even a democratic Chamber might become a club of jobbers and place-brokers, unless restrained by the King. They knew that the state of society did not render the deputies sufficiently amenable to public opinion. In Greece, consequently, no sooner have the people elected their Chamber by universal suffrage, than they become jealous of their representatives, and the deputies, feeling no sense of responsibility, follow their own devices. This moral condition of the deputies breaks up the Chamber into small sections. No leader can command a sure majority without much jobbing and some violence. Public opinion looks to the King to improve the morality of the Government, and the Prime Ministers of Greece view with aversion and fear any organized exercise of the Royal authority in this direction. They endeavour to convince the people that a constitutional King must reign, and not govern; but the doctrine is directly opposed to the wish of the nation. The people want a good King who can and will govern according to the Constitution, and not a King who allows the powers with which he is invested by the Constitution to be used by party leaders for party purposes.

It was believed by thoughtful politicians that the establishment of a Cabinet or Council of Ministers as a recognised body in the executive administration would enable even a young and inexperienced King to perform adequately the duties with which the Crown is invested by the Constitution of 1864. This provision displays great political sagacity. It forms a bridge over which the Crown and the people can communicate for the purpose of controlling the Ministers and enforcing responsibility on the representatives. But to make Cabinet government different from Ministerial government as an administrative agent in a constitutional monarchy, Cabinet Councils must be regularly and frequently held in presence of the King, and a whole system of procedure and of registration of acts, opinions, and measures must be kept under the monarch's eye. The King must possess his own record of every administrative decision of his Cabinet, and of every act in each executive department of his Government, for it is his duty to see that his Government is carried on according to law and the Constitution, and not according to the mere will of a majority in a single Chamber. How the Crown is to effect this is the problem, and it must be solved, or a King becomes a superfluity, and an hereditary Crown an evil in the State. As Earl Russell's selection did not give Greece a sovereign of mature age, and of the experience in business required for organizing a machinery of checks on democracy, and for enforcing responsibility by means of a Cabinet, time must do the work.

There exists, however, in all free countries a power that can enforce responsibility on Ministers, Chambers, and majorities, far greater than any power with which a King can be invested by any Constitution. That power is public opinion. But public opinion can only be formed by complete publicity of every act of government during a long period. Unfortunately, the little kingdom of Greece has not adopted a system of publicity capable of forming a sound public opinion. Neither the Crown nor the people can yet act as shepherds' dogs of the Constitution. The second question, by what means the power of a single Chamber can be prevented from exerting undue authority in a democratic State, is a question which it is extremely difficult to answer satisfactorily. Yet, unless the power of a single Chamber be placed under some systematic and powerful restraint, there will be a constant recurrence of arbitrary power in the hands of a party majority; and though the nominal first magistrate may be in name a king, the State cannot be correctly called a monarchy. A single Chamber elected by universal suffrage can only be restrained from exerting arbitrary power by the authority of a military despot, or by national institutions and local authorities directly elected by the people, more immediately connected with their daily habits and feelings than the Chamber, and responsible like the deputies themselves only to the law, and not to the government. A centralized government, whether with one or with two Chambers, tends to become a government of gendarmes. Local institutions, or what is called self-government, can alone protect the people against the despotism of a majority, which tends to anarchy, or the despotism of a personal sovereign, which tends to elective monarchy. The Greeks are perhaps not yet fully aware of the necessity of restraining the unlimited power of a single Chamber by local institutions more directly dependent on the law than on the State. Yet a sense of the necessity exists, and the Constitution of 1864 contains provisions declaring that the election of municipal authorities must take place in the same manner as the election of members of the Chamber, "by direct, universal, and secret suffrage by ballot with balls." But there are no articles relative to the rights and duties of a citizen as a member of a municipality. The constitution of the authorities, and the formation of the national habits, by which the unlimited power of a single Chamber ought to be restrained, is relegated to a municipal law in which the principles of self-government are vitiated by the French system of government by gendarmes. There can be no permanent security for the duration of constitutional government until the people can act for themselves in spheres of local activity, with barriers circumscribing them to their local business, and protecting them by responsibility to the law alone. Local institutions to secure communal independence, and publicity to create public opinion, are still wanting in Greece to establish constitutional liberty on firm foundations.

Liberty needs to be secured in all constitutions in the East, not by a vague declaration that all citizens are equal in the eye of the law, which is never true in a government with gendarmes, but by precise enactments announcing that every citizen has duties to perform, rights to exercise, and national institutions to defend. Some of his rights and duties are inherent in citizenship in free States, others are created and regulated by the constitution and by laws. Some are national, others parochial, communal, and provincial. Local charity, primary education, sanitary measures, police regulations, roads and streets, all present local spheres of duty subordinate to the general action of government. Experience proves that in the present democratic condition of society there can be no guarantee for liberty, even in constitutional States, unless it become a recognised principle that where the people elect to an office, whether it be to the place of member of the Chamber, of mayor, common-councilman or alderman, the person elected cannot be removed from his place or restrained in the exercise of his functions except by the decision or order of a regular court of justice. The only restraint on the unlimited power of a single Chamber must therefore be sought in a framework of national institutions, and no framework of this kind can resist the strain of a central administration unless it be supported by an independent Judicature. Democracy, personal sovereignty, religious animosities, and national ambitions are all likely to be more powerful than constitutions in the East for some time to come, and they can only be permanently restrained from becoming frequent causes of disorder and revolution when society makes law, and not political organization, the supreme power in the State.

Some readers may doubt whether the constitution of the Greek Kingdom can be theoretically as good as we have represented it, when they know that the Government it has produced is practically one of the worst in Europe. But it must be observed that the last thing people learn in the highest state of civilization is to frame for themselves good administrative machinery. The constitution is only one of the requisites of good government, and with an over-centralized administrative system in Greece—a country without roads, or independent and self-acting local institutions, and with no efficient responsibility imposed by public opinion—it has not yet acquired strength to command invariable respect.

The two Governments that occupy at present the most important positions in the East are those of Greece and Turkey. The constitution of Greece has in it the germ of much good; the despotic Government of Turkey is theoretically as bad as a government can possibly be. Practically, the progress of Greece is impeded by an ill-devised system of centralization, and the progress of Turkey is advanced by the care with which the Government rears up local institutions, and allows communities, whether religious or national, to enjoy as large a sphere of self-government as is compatible with an energetic central administration. In what manner the course of events in the East may be influenced by the Constitution of the Greek Kingdom, and by the local institutions daily gaining strength in the Ottoman Empire, is a subject that opens a wide field for speculation.

BANKING FOR SMALL INCOMES.

THE Post Office Savings' Banks—originally an experiment very doubtful, as was supposed, in its result—have already assumed great importance as an item in the national balance-sheet. Details of the annual and total amounts of deposits and withdrawals appear from time to time in the newspapers, and show, in the area embraced by the Post Office system, an immense and almost incredible accumulation of small savings. Till within the last few months statistics showing the number, though not the money value, of deposits made periodically throughout the kingdom were within the reach of every one who would take the trouble to work a sum in the simplest arithmetic; every deposit receipt, and every withdrawal order, being stamped both with a date and with a current number from the commencement, till, in the course of last spring, the latter stamp had nearly reached the eighth million. The system has now been discontinued, but the latest issues showed that about 4,500 separate deposits were acknowledged from the central office on every week-day during April, and that the annual average for the previous three years had been a million and a half, or about 4,800 for every working day during the period. It may, therefore, be asked whether an experiment so completely and unexpectedly successful in the limited area within which it has been tried may not now be beneficially extended upon a wider field. Great as has been the success of the Post Office Savings' Banks, they have also been confessedly, as regards one important object of their institution, an almost total failure. They have not been used as banks of deposit for the savings of the artisan and labouring classes of the towns. They have never commanded the confidence of the men who receive two or three pounds a week; and they have never as yet invited the confidence of the men who receive a hundred or a hundred and fifty pounds a year. The causes which have produced indifference or distrust in the former class may be examined hereafter; the causes which have led to the exclusion of the latter class may very reasonably call for present reconsideration. Their operation at the first establishment of the system was natural, if not inevitable, however needless and inconvenient it may appear that they should exercise any influence now.

The Post Office Savings' Bank system was moulded upon the pattern of the old Savings' Banks, and followed their rules, being regulated for the most part by the provisions of the Acts of Parliament under which they existed and were managed. The old Savings' Banks were essentially charitable institutions. It was quite within the compass of possibility that the new Savings' Banks might prove to be charitable institutions also, maintained at the national expense. If they had failed to bring in an income equal to the expenditure on their establishment and maintenance, they would have been public "charities," and in all probability very short-lived ones. They have proved, however, to be a thoroughly sound enterprise, and have about as much claim to be regarded as charitable institutions as the Bank of England and its branches. Restrictions, therefore, which in the case of the old Savings' Banks were just and reasonable, and which limited the range of depositors to those classes in which objects of charitable assistance might naturally be looked for, would appear, in the present position of the Government Savings' Banks, to be out of date and out of place. The old Savings' Bank in the country was gratuitously managed. It was open on market-day, and the squires and clergy of the neighbourhood gave their time and trouble in rotation in receiving deposits and paying out withdrawals. The new bank is managed by the local postmaster, who receives a commission on every transaction, small in amount, indeed, since it is only a halfpenny whatever be the sum deposited, but useful in other ways, as the post-office always attracts a certain amount of additional custom to the shop of a retail tradesman.

The principal restriction imposed by the rules of the old Savings' Bank was that no private depositor might place to his account of savings in one year, from January to December, more than thirty pounds. The accumulation of his deposits, it was further provided, might not exceed 150*l.*, exclusive of interest; and both these regulations were transferred to the Post Office Savings' Banks. For all charitable trusts, societies, clubs, penny banks, or accumulating subscriptions, the Post Office system was either found to be—or, on application by the various treasurers, was extended so as to be—available to any amount required; and in many instances considerable sums are now invested in this manner, the Post Office system presenting the combined advantage of a deposit and drawing account in one. But for individual depositors the annual limit of thirty pounds remains, and excludes, with no apparent counterbalancing benefit, a very large class of persons of moderate means, who would probably be found, and in many instances are actually known to be, anxious to be admitted as depositors. The extension of the system so as to include depositors of this class was under Mr. Gladstone's consideration, and is believed to have been favourably regarded by him, towards the close of his tenure of office as Chancellor of the Exchequer; and it is a question which the Government, in the interests of public and private economy, may find worthy of attention among matters of minor detail. The old savings' bank system was not, and was not intended to be, more than a means of depositing small savings. It was not a reservoir for retaining current balances of income. It was intended to encourage habits of saving, and therefore to discourage withdrawals of sums already deposited; and accordingly the withdrawal of a deposit was often a very difficult and troublesome task. The withdrawal of a deposit from the Post Office, on the contrary, is almost as easy as drawing a cheque on a London banker, and a great deal easier than withdrawing a sum from a deposit account at some joint-stock banks. Is there, then, any reason why the possessors of small incomes, or the recipients of salaries paid quarterly, should not be enabled to invest such portions of their income as may not be required for present use in the Post Office national stock? An immediate objection which might be urged against such a proposition is that it would interfere with the business of ordinary bankers, and would bring the Government into competition with them. To this it will be at once replied, by any one conversant with the facts, that the objection is purely theoretical, and that the cases in which any interference, direct or indirect, with banking accounts would take place would be both fewer in number, and more inconsiderable in amount, than those in which the existing system has interfered with banking business by the withdrawal of charitable and trust balances from accounts in which they had been previously deposited. The holders of small incomes and the receivers of salaries and stipends under 200*l.* per annum are not, as a class, found worth the notice of bankers, and the instances in which they have banking accounts at all are comparatively rare. In fact, the rule enforced by the Bank of England, and several of the leading London banks, under which the maintenance of a certain average balance is required, directly operates to discourage, if not to prohibit, accounts of this class, which would not be remunerative to the banker, and are, therefore, not worth keeping. Another difficulty which may be urged is, that the possessors of small incomes in the middle and educated classes might object to their private affairs being known to the tradesman who keeps the local post-office. This is said, and apparently with great truth, to be one main hindrance which has prevented the artisan classes from depositing in the Post Office Savings' Banks; but it is not likely to affect in any material degree the classes socially above them, the extent of whose means, whether arising from realized property or from annual stipends, is for the most part known already with sufficient accuracy to all the local gossips who are curious in their neighbours' affairs. The resources of the widow and the old maid are known to a sovereign, at the tea-table coteries, as accurately as the income of the curate or the stipend of the parish doctor.

The practical advantages which a trustworthy and easily available means of deposit would present to this important class of income-holders are so manifest that they hardly need to be explained at any length. In the absence of any banking facilities for the receivers of periodical dividends or instalments of stipend of salary, one of two alternative courses is alone open. The money received must either be hoarded or paid away. In other words, the actual coin must either be stowed away in safe or supposably safe places, after the manner of Samuel Pepys, or else it must have been already mortgaged for the payment of outstanding debts. Perhaps it may be right to admit that, strictly speaking, there is a possible third course; you may lend the money to a friend—a course which presents the advantages of both the others combined. You hoard the money in another man's pocket, and he uses it to meet his liabilities. As an ordinary rule, the practice of hoarding the dividend or the annuity will be found to prevail among women, and that of anticipating the quarterly stipend to be more popular among men. The widow or the old maid lives at home, in her own small house or in her lodging, and she has always some pet and special piece of furniture, or hiding-place of a like kind, in which she stores her little valuables. If she is in tolerably easy circumstances, she provides herself with a davenport, containing an elaborate contrivance of secret compartments; if her establishment is of a humbler order, she has a quaintly carved cabinet brought from foreign parts, or a family writing-desk, or at least a work-box which has its peculiar corner in a chest of drawers; or, if she is a very old lady indeed, she may have retained the ancient traditional stocking. But the one and ever-present danger in all this system of precautions is, that she persists in the habit of regularly going to church, and in the occasional practice, at irregular intervals, of going out to tea. Her maid is the most respectable and trustworthy of all handmaidens; but even she is not unwilling to be settled in life, and is not insensible to the respectful, though distant, admiration of the young man who has been so regular at chapel of late, and who looks like a Sunday-school teacher. A little harmless gossip, perhaps, and then the sober-looking young man has on one occasion unaccountably been absent from chapel, and there are footmarks in the back garden, and the davenport has been shaken open, or the writing-desk forced, and the precious little hoard which "mistress" had laid by has disappeared. The wise and experienced brother or nephew from the city comes down to the suburb the next day, and shakes his head with the consoling remark that he always knew it must come to that; but when he is asked by the poor lady what else she is to do but hoard, nothing further occurs to him to say on the subject. For men, and especially for young men, hoarding is generally, if not absolutely, impossible. Even the most prudent householder and father of a family, if he be not utterly penurious and a screw, knows that the more cash he carries about him or keeps in the house, the less chance he has of carrying out those economical resolutions he made after the last autumn holiday, and of saving up for the boys' education; and, for a young man with no such domestic ballast to steady him, to have money in his pocket or desk inevitably means to spend it. And then there is the rent for the lodgings accumulating, and the weekly bills, to say nothing of the tailor; and the quarter's payment has been anticipated, and goes out as soon as it comes in. The obvious remedy for each of the two evils which we have described is to provide the class intermediate between the well-to-do and the poor with the same facilities for storing their available balances which the system of banking provides for the former, and that of the Savings' Bank for the latter class. Already in very many cases the first attempt has been made to invest, and the first quarter's twenty or twenty-five pounds placed to an account at the nearest post-office; but when the next quarter's money is paid, the old-fashioned and unmeaning barrier of the thirty-pound limit stands in the way, and no further deposit is possible till January comes round again. There appears to be no valid reason for retaining any limit at all for the gross amount of annual deposits made by a private investor in the Post Office Savings' Banks. A maximum limit to the whole amount deposited may be assigned, as is done in the case of certain accounts used for charitable purposes; and this maximum, in the case of the private depositor, may reasonably remain at its present amount of a hundred and fifty pounds. But, if any rational account can be given of a regulation which prohibits a young clerk with a hundred a year from depositing twenty-five pounds in June on the ground that he deposited twenty-five pounds in March, of which he may or may not have five pounds left—and which imposes on him in consequence the choice between the unsound as well as unsafe alternative of hoarding, and the easier but undesirable processes of spending and running in debt—it would be well worth the trouble of publishing it in detail, and would amply repay study as a singular and somewhat paradoxical lesson in modern finance.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS IN NEW YORK.

THE world knows not of its greatest men, and the greatest epochs pass without arresting the sluggish attention of mankind. According to Emmanuel Swedenborg, when the New Jerusalem descended, the great birth of heavenly time was only revealed to a single old gentleman in his lodgings in Clerkenwell; and in some such way it may surprise a faithless generation to be assured that two or three weeks ago, in what is called "New York City," an event occurred in the assembling of a Convocation "Pentecostal in numbers, interest, and results." Pentecostal in time and the calendar it was not, unless the Woman's Suffrage Convention in Washington have devised a new method for calculating the moveable feasts. Unfortunately for the world and for ourselves, the Revolution—a Woman's Right journal, published in New York, which makes this announcement—of no later date than the 14th of January has reached us; and the great Pentecostal Convention was to come off, and we dare say did come off, on the 19th and 20th of January. Considering the grandeur of the occasion and the expansive character of the female demands, one would think that the immediate gift which was expected to descend from heaven a fortnight ago was not large. The privilege to be extorted from the American Senate, or the right to be vindicated, is that of the suffrage only. The Revolution informs us, which we were not exactly aware of, that the Saturday Review has declared that "so far as giving votes to women were concerned, we did not think there was much difficulty." Whether we said so or not, we may admit that nothing is more easy; but to give the suffrage, and to say that it is right to give it, are only the same thing with feminine logicians. However, the ladies know their own policy the best. Give them the inch of the suffrage, and they may be trusted to get an ell out of it. Very likely the Pentecostal Convention has been a great success. It was not without tongues—or fiery ones either—if Miss Susan B. Anthony, proprietor, and Mrs. Elizabeth C. Stanton, editor, of the Revolution were, as doubtless they were, present. Meanwhile, pending the revelation of the 19th and 20th ult., we may extract some edification and instruction from this—we suppose authorized—organ of the ladies.

Mr. Horace Greeley, it seems—and he has won small favour with the fervid writers in the Revolution for his declaration—is disposed to think that if the women, say in Kansas, desired to vote, he (Mr. Greeley), if he lived in Kansas, would let them. He thinks that when they had got the suffrage they would find it more plague than profit. But, as Mr. Greeley happens not to be a Kansas man, he surveys the question much as most sensible people would do, with the affable contempt with which the shore-going man in Lucretius looked on a storm at sea. This is much our case. By all means let the United States men and women settle this matter as they please. For ourselves, we prefer, under the guidance of the Revolution, to see what manner of men the women, when entrusted with the suffrage, are likely to turn out. We can only argue the unknown from the known; and if, in enforcing their claims to a political—and, for the matter of that, every other—equality with man, the American women exhibit good sense, good feeling, good taste, prudence, discretion, and fair elementary morality, they have done something for their cause. If not, not.

We have just used, it may be said, a solecism, when we talked of the sort of man the woman of the future is likely to be. But such solecisms and paralogisms are of the nature of the case. What is to become of grammar and its doctrine of genders puzzles us. The Kansas Standard "does not like the word female as applied to females," and adds pertinently enough, "that a cow or a sow is as female as a woman is, and no woman calls herself a female without sharing the distinction with the brutes. . . . In fact, this indiscriminate application of the word female is something almost disgusting, and the sooner we attempt to correct ourselves in this particular the better." Yes, but how? It is not given to every woman to euphemize femality as a fine lady once did who, anxious, but timorous, to call a friend by a familar, but rather coarse, name, spoke of her as a mother of puppies. We see nothing for it but to go to the root of the matter, and for the sex to defeminize themselves. Cessante ratione cessat nomen. Mr. Darwin states, or rather repeats, as a well-known fact in ornithology, that, under special circumstances, veteran hens have been known, in the afternoon of gallinaceous life, to develop combs, and to utter semi-masculine crows. Even in the human animal a moustached old lady is not so very uncommon. Just as every man is an improved woman, so a woman is an undeveloped man; and, in a generation or two of Anne Dickinsons and Lucretia Motts, the Hæc Homo might be completely developed, and the Androgynon perfected. The difficulty, of course, is about these two or three generations. To submit to matrimony is not to be thought of by the editors and writers of the Revolution; and the Darwinian law of selection, as we understand it, requires time and training often repeated. Not that the little matter of matrimony need be so very great an obstacle. The process of developing the successive stages of married woman might be managed without going to church. Marriage is not a necessity to these ladies. Matrons out of wedlock, as the writers in the Revolution express it, if carefully selected, might have their function in unsexing the sex. The woman of the future—if there are to be any women of the future—may, however, well be trusted to grow out of the Transatlantic woman of the present. All that is wanted is a coincidence of favourable conditions; and these conditions are frankly announced. Not only are "the statutes that make woman man's chattel" to be reformed, but "theologies that make her his subject owing obedience" are to be got rid of. We must, as these New York ladies assure us, get "expurgated creeds" as well as constitutions, "in order that our Bibles and Blackstones may teach us to respect the mother of her race;" and "any one with ordinary mentality," as they remark, can see that, in this respect, there are few advances to be made from present practice. E. C. S.—that is, Mrs. Stanton, the editor of the Revolution—informs us that there are already in America "ministering women who marry, baptize, bury the dead, administer the communion, preach, pray, and, by the laying on of hands, ordain men." So that the fears of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican seem groundless. That journal regrets that "the clergy, with rare exceptions, still follow the lead of the Apostle Paul on the subject; and although they will not undertake to vindicate the soundness of the Apostle's logic, they still maintain his opinions, and insist that, if woman is not inferior to man, she is at least unlike him, and naturally incapable of governmental and public life." This corrupt following of the Apostle the Revolution very naturally laughs at. Like the German professor who horrified the Oxford Common room, and a junior fellow who had mildly suggested that St. Paul said so and so, by observing, "Yaas, Powlus, Powlus; clevaire man, that Powlus. I have read his buch, and I do not agree with Powlus." So the Revolution does not agree with Powlus, and very properly dismisses the clergy and their Scriptural argument with the exhaustive reply, that, "many new ideas on woman as well as government have obtained since the time of Paul"—a sentiment which was more tersely expressed, and in choice American tongue too, by Mr. Hosea Biglow:—

> But John P.
> Robinson, he
> Sez, they didn't know everythin' down in Judee.

But not only is a new political and a new theological world to be the result of the Pentecostal revelation and revolution, but something very like a new moral world. It has already had its apostles—just as there were reformers before Luther and ante-Christians before Christianity—in Margaret Fuller, and in Fanny Wright and Mary Wolstonecraft of the old time before them. The Woman's Rights advocates lay it down broadly that "women have the same right to violate the seventh commandment by keeping paramours that men have by keeping mistresses"; and the inference seems to be imminent that, the rights being equal, those pretty "persons" who hitherto have been restrained from incontinence by what they call "the accident of gender" may avail themselves of the masculine liberty in this as in other matters. Were it worth while to argue with these persons, who object to be called females, we might remind them that society is kept together not only by a recognition of common rights and mutual duties, but by a regard to general policy; and whether women can understand it or not, as long as society exists, incontinence on man's part will be compared with incontinence on woman's part, not as a matter solely of personal right, which here means personal wrong, but as a matter of public policy. On ethical grounds, the sin i the same in the one case as in the other; on social considerations, the adultery of the wife is, and always will be, a more serious matter than the infidelity of the husband. That American women cannot see this is not to be wondered at, while there are followers of Miss Anna Dickinson, who seems to regret that miscegenation is not made compulsory. So far do they carry this especially feminine argument of the tu quoque, that they complain of the injustice of society when it condones a husband for shooting his wife's paramour, while it condemns to death a woman for strangling her infant. "Suppose," says E. M. C., discussing the case of a woman under sentence for murdering her infant, "suppose her maternal heart; blinded and warped through love of her child, had taken its life, is that murder? Let not the jury dare to answer in the affirmative." This is the teaching, and here is the teaching reduced to practice:—

Massachusetts is shamed, if not shocked, at the spread of fœticide in that State, and Dr. Storer and others have done good service in rousing the moral sense of the State to a common crime, which is fast confining the sole increase in population to the foreign-born and foreign-descended citizens of Massachusetts. Philadelphia is alarmed at the increase of infanticide in that city, the statistics of the year 1868 showing ninety-four cases of child-murder against sixty-six in 1867. Of these, the case of alleged infanticide by Hester Vaughan is the only one which attracted public attention, though the exhibition by the coroner now prompts the Philadelphia papers to urge some legislative action which will tend to lessen the slaughter of children by their mothers.

THE MURMURING OF MANCHESTER.

ECONOMICAL and theological orthodoxy seem destined to be exposed to one and the same trial. In both cases the faith is assailed in its very citadel. Oxford is the chosen seat of Heresy, and Manchester begins to yearn for Protection. The authorities, to be sure, are sound, as well in the manufacturing as in the educational centre. There is nothing uncertain about the trumpet of the Hebdomadal Council, and we have it on the testimony of Mr. Bazley that "within the walls of the Chamber of Commerce he has not heard a doubt expressed" as to the advantages of Free Trade. But to what a state must things have come when this simple fact is thought worthy of notice and congratulation, and when the member for Manchester holds it necessary to "offer a few vindicatory remarks on the Free Trade policy!" Mr. Bazley has been among his constituents, and he has learned strange things on his travels. There are "even cotton spinners who question whether the principles of Free Trade are so beneficial as those who were chiefly instrumental in their adoption predicted." Probably Mr. Bazley does not present the fact in by any means its darkest colours. The whole tone both of his speech and of Mr. Cheetham's, at the annual meeting of the Chamber on Monday, is evidently prompted by a grave distrust of manufacturing sentiment on the subject. The truth is, that it is only by a happy accident that Protection has been so unpopular in England. The same classes who denounce it here are found to be its ardent advocates in the United States, or in our own colonies. Luckily, however, the term became associated in the minds of Englishmen with dear bread. It was the landlords who benefited by it, and consequently it took brevet rank among the other abuses, or things which pass for such, in maintaining which this particular class is supposed to spend its strength. Protection, Primogeniture, and Preservation of Game have formed a species of triad indissolubly connected in the popular imagination with oppression and selfishness, and a general tendency to be behind the age. When the very same Englishmen get abroad, they lose the associations in which they have been accustomed to view Protection, and the result is that it no longer either disgusts or alarms them. It is certainly to be desired that the accidental identification thus effected may not be shaken for some years. If people were now to begin discussing Free Trade on its merits, it is to be feared that the fallacies by which its triumph was formerly retarded would be found to have lost little of their strength. Science moves but slowly when its conclusions are not aided by interest or passion. The demonstration of Free Trade is so convincing that it cannot be resisted in the long run, but as long as sound political economy is the possession of the few, not of the many, it is well that the force of argument should for once be supplemented by the force of prejudice. After all, manufacturers are but men, and in a majority of instances very ordinary men too. They have sense enough to value economical truth when they see that it puts money into their pockets, but when a trade reverse makes it necessary to take the ultimate result on faith, they are very soon reduced to despondency.

So far as can be understood from the proceedings of Monday, the immediate source of Lancashire discontent is the operation of the French Treaty. Why this cause should be especially operative in Manchester is not apparent. The brewing interest may conceivably feel depressed at the increasing consumption of French wines, and the weavers of Coventry or Spitalfields may shrink from the unequal competition with French silks; but we do not gather that the industrial energy of France has yet been turned to the export of manufactured cotton. At all events, if such a process is going on, it must be in some secret and underhand way which has not interfered with a large increase in the export of similar goods to France. In the nine years between 1858 and 1867 the value of the cotton goods exported from Lancashire to France was multiplied more than seven times. In the former year it was 279,918*l.*, in the latter year it was 1,659,433*l.* Why the manufacturing interest should dislike an arrangement which has brought about so satisfactory a result we do not profess to understand. If the Treaty of Commerce with France had never been concluded, English manufactured cotton would have been subjected in France to duties which were virtually prohibitory. The removal of these duties was purchased by a corresponding removal of duties on those numerous articles which we require to import from France. But why the Lancashire cotton spinners should resent the introduction of claret or French ribands, when they are enabled by this very fact to sell seven times the quantity of their own goods which could formerly be disposed of in the French markets, is a problem to which we see no solution. Or at least the only explanation which presents itself is one which bears improbability on its face. Mr. Cheetham implied that the economical scepticism with which Manchester is now threatened may be traced to mistaken patriotism. The cotton spinners have not suffered by the French Treaty, but they think that the nation generally has, and their hearts bleed for their suffering fellow-creatures. A passage in the annual Report of the Chamber of Commerce describes the fact that in the year 1867 the amount of French imports taken as manufactured commodities was, in round numbers, 30 millions against 13½ millions of English exports, or "a difference of 16½ millions in favour of the national industry of France." This, Mr. Cheetham considers, is what has startled Lancashire. Thirty millions' worth of goods brought into the country, and only thirteen millions' worth sent out in exchange! If this is really the key to the mystery, into what depths of economical darkness are not the children of light still plunged? Where do the Manchester malcontents suppose the money came from which went to pay for these French goods? That practical though Protectionist nation certainly did not give them for nothing, and if our exports to other countries are sufficiently large to leave Englishmen a surplus to lay out on cheap Burgundy and gilt clocks, why should they be prevented from spending their money as they like, because the French wine-merchant or jeweller does not happen to want printed calicoes?

It is more probable, however, that the French Treaty has in reality nothing to do with the matter. The cotton trade is in difficulties, and it suffers from the tendency, natural to humanity, to fix the blame upon the first thing that comes to hand. For some reason or other, the French Treaty happens to fill this place at the present moment, and consequently it comes in for its full share of blame which is not its due. There is a great deal of capital invested in the cotton manufacture which does not yield its proper return; there is a great deal of machinery lying idle in the mills for want of material whereon to work. This seems to be the true motive which tempts Manchester to curse Mr. Cobden and die. The world will not buy unnecessary bales of calico at fancy prices, and until the reduction in the cost of cotton enables the manufacturers to produce their goods more cheaply, the trade will continue dull. Why, when this obvious explanation was forthcoming, it should have been thought necessary to abuse the French Treaty, and hint at faults in Free Trade, we cannot say. Self-interest seems to be equally unenlightened whether its sphere is a farm or a cotton-mill. The cessation of war in America has not restored the agricultural industry of the South. Military devastation, followed by political anarchy, affords few encouragements to sustained labour of any kind, and the prevalence of Protectionist theories in the United States tends to foster the consumption of cotton in situ to an extent which threatens to diminish seriously the amount of raw material exported to England. Authorities differ as to the extent to which the operation of these causes is likely to be permanent, but the better opinion seems to be that for a considerable time, at all events, the imports from America will not be appreciably increased. Under these circumstances, the prudent course is obviously to go elsewhere for material. Mr. Bazley's speech on Monday was largely made up of exhortations to this effect. The reference to India as the natural field to which Lancashire should look for her supply of cotton recalls the early days of the American war. As far as Mr. Bazley's recommendations go, no exception can be taken to them. It is the interest alike of Lancashire and India that throughout the latter country there should be better roads, more railways, and increased irrigation. Nor does the objection which existed eight years ago, against a sudden extension of cotton cultivation in India now possess anything like its former weight. In 1861 it was quite uncertain whether the civil war in America might not end in the victory of the cotton States, and in the recovery of their characteristic industry. While this was possible, there were very weighty reasons why the growth of cotton in India should not be stimulated by any exceptional action of the authorities. England governs India for India. The cry of the cotton spinners at that time was that she should govern India for Manchester. If Lord Halifax had listened to the suggestions which were so urgently pressed upon him, he would have postponed all other considerations to the one object of making India a great cotton-exporting country. Let us suppose that, after he had done so, war in America had ceased, the supplies from that quarter had flowed in again with all their former abundance, and in consequence the demand for the inferior article obtainable from India had ceased at a moment's notice. The suffering such a catastrophe might have inflicted upon the Indian cultivators is inconceivable; but the English Government were coolly pressed to disregard this possibility, because it was to the interest of the cotton trade that the gap left by the war should be immediately filled up in this manner. Now, as we have said, the conditions of the case promise a more doubtful—at all events, a very much slower—revival in the imports from the United States; and, so far as the growth of cotton can be promoted in India without unduly stimulating it by bounties, or unduly protecting it by the discouragement of other forms of agricultural industry, the results will be mutually beneficial to both parties.

THE STATUTE-BOOK.
